

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is not expedient to pass any Railway Bill which involves the payment of interest out of capital during the construction of works pending the introduction of a public measure on this subject, as recommended by a Committee of this House in 1832, especially where such a Bill practically makes the alteration of the Standing Orders of this House retrospective in their action,"—(Sir Joseph Pease),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After debate, Question put:—The House divided:
Ayes 187, Noes 117; Majority 70.—(Div. List, No. 145.)

Main Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—THIRD BATTALIONS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY, in rising to move—

"That, in consequence of the severe strain now being placed upon the British Army, an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty may be most graciously pleased to direct that the recommendation made by the Military Committee appointed in 1871-72 for the formation of a third battalion, in the event of both the line battalions of a regiment serving out of this country, may at once be put into execution," said, that this subject had been raised in 1879 and again in 1881, when Mr. Childers was Secretary for War. On those occasions he could not raise any enthusiasm on the subject; but he thought they had now every hope of attention being drawn to what was the real strength of our Military Forces. He might remind their Lordships that when he gave his present Notice of Motion, more than three weeks ago, not only had the recent events on the Afghan Frontier not occurred, but the Message from Her Majesty as to the calling out of the Army and Militia Reserves had not been communicated to Parliament. Subsequent events on the Afghan Frontier had made it all the more imperative on him to bring this subject before the House. In order to show the exact point of his Resolution, he would ask their Lordships to carry their minds back some years to the origin of the present territorial system, and to the principles on which it was based. It was now 12 years since Lord Cardwell started the scheme. Its basis was that there should be one battalion at home to be the feeder of its twin battalion abroad, and that arrangement had continued down to the present. At the same time, it was thought desirable to establish a local connection between the Militia regiments in the districts in which these pairs of battalions were supposed to be localized, two Militia battalions being affiliated to two battalions of the Line, making the third or fourth battalions of the brigade, or, as it was to be termed, the "territorial" regiment. The noble Earl, having traced the history of the system down to the present time, and pointed out in what respects it had been carried out and what still remained to be accomplished, concluded by making the Motion which stood in his name.

Moved, "That, in consequence of the severe strain now being placed upon the British Army, an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty may be graciously pleased to direct that the recommendation made by the Military Committee appointed in 1871-72 for the formation of a third battalion, in the event of both the line battalions of a regiment serving out of this country, may at once be put into execution."—(The Earl of Galloway.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, if the noble Earl meant by his Resolution that in the absence abroad of two battalions the depôts should be largely strengthened, he was preaching to the converted, and he entirely agreed with him. At the present time there were a good many regiments in that position. The noble Earl was aware that the Vote of Credit had not yet been taken in the House of Commons; but he might remind him that the depôts of the regiments referred to had been very largely strengthened, and that, according to the last Return, many of them were over 400 strong. The Motion, he thought, was a little premature. His noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had informed their Lordships a day or two ago that a statement as to the policy of the Government would shortly be made. When that statement was made he should, if the House desired it, be happy to give all the information in his power as to the military measures that might be necessary consequent upon the policy of the Government. Meanwhile, he could assure his noble Friend that the point which he had raised had not been neglected by the Government, but that, on the contrary, careful attention had been given to it.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, he thought that his noble Friend had attained his object in the answer he had elicited from the noble Earl, because what was required was that they should not make war on a peace establishment. The raising of the depôts to a larger number was practically equivalent to the forming of a third battalion, and the Government had in that way really met the necessities of the case. The steps which the noble Earl had indicated having been taken, he would advise his noble Friend to withdraw his Motion for the present, and to discuss it hereafter if there should be occasion to do so.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he had no hesitation in withdrawing his Motion after the very satisfactory statement made by the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for War.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at Five o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

FELIXSTOW, IPSWICH, AND MIDLANDS RAILWAY BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Charles Forster.)

MR. BRYCE said, that in withdrawing his opposition to the Bill, he wished to explain his reason. The Bill was provided for the purpose of constructing a railway in the Eastern Counties, and it was originally proposed to take an acre and a-half of certain common land near Cambridge for the purposes of the railway. It had appeared to those who were interested in the maintenance of open spaces in the neighbourhood of populous towns, that such a proposal would have been most injurious; and, therefore, it had been determined to offer a strenuous opposition to the Bill. Representations had been made to the Railway Company of the state of the matter, and the desirability of reserving this plot as open land. It was only fair to say that the Railway Company had met the objections in a very proper spirit, and had expressed a desire to do all that they could to remedy the evil complained of. In consequence of the communications which had taken place, an arrangement had been made by which the Company undertook to introduce a clause into the Bill in Committee, binding themselves not to take more than an acre and a-half of land, and to purchase and add to the common the same quantity and the same value of other land adjacent, and also, in the interests of the inhabitants, to make proper communications between the parts of the common which were to be severed. In that way they had removed all the ground for objection; and, under the circumstances, and realizing the fact that the public would not suffer, but would get back as much land as the Railway Company took away from them, he did not propose to persevere with his opposition to the Bill.

MR. HICKS said, he was very sorry that he felt himself called upon to move the rejection of the Bill, because he had hoped that the reasonable Amendment or Instruction which he had intended to move for the purpose of limiting the powers of the Company to the construction of a railway between Ipswich and Six Mile Bottom, would have been accepted by the promoters, and in that case he, for one, would not have offered any further opposition. At the same time, he was not prepared to admit that there was really any necessity for this railway. There were at present two lines of railway from Cambridge to Ipswich, one by way of Shelford, going away to the South, and the other by way of Newmarket and Bury to the North. The projected line proposed to take a middle course; but, as far as the locality was concerned, he could not see that there was any great necessity for an additional railway, or that it would be of very much value when constructed. There were no persons on the Cambridge portion of the line between the town of Cambridge and the borders of Suffolk who were more than four or four and a-half miles distant from a railway; and he did not think that in this country four or four and a-half miles was a very great distance for any person to be away from a railway station. If it were deemed necessary to have a railway station within a mile or a mile and a-half of every district, the whole country would be cut up into railways. He certainly did not think that any extra accommodation in the shape of railway communication was at present required between Cambridge and Ipswich. He would not, however, raise that question now, but would prefer to wait until he heard what arguments the promoters brought forward in support of their case. There was, however, one thing touching this point to which he wished he draw the attention of the House, and it was this. From information he had received, it did not appear that Petitions or Memorials had been presented to the Great Eastern Railway Company, who were in possession of this district, asking them to afford this accommodation or anything approaching to it; and he thought it would only be right and fair, before allowing a new Company to enter into a district which had been well served for many years, at great loss by a particular Company, which Company had been striving during all those years to improve their service, which was now serving the district in a way that equalled the service of any of the great Companies, and yet was only paying a very small dividend, amounting to something like $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 per cent on its capital—under such circumstances he thought it would be very unjust to allow a great Company like the Midland to come in and try to tap the traffic which naturally belonged to the Great Eastern Company. And the traffic, even when so tapped, would not be better accommodated in the district as far as London was concerned, but only in a Northern direction. All those who were acquainted with railway matters knew that a distance of five or six miles in the carriage of goods was not really of any serious importance. He had been sorry to trouble the House at this length in regard to the main line; but he would now leave that matter in order to come to the real point, so far as his opposition to the Bill was concerned. There was an Amendment standing in his name upon the Paper which, in the event of the Bill being read a second time, he proposed ultimately to move as an Instruction to the Committee. He had been in hopes that that Instruction would have been accepted by the promoters of the Bill. There was at the present moment a railway from Cambridge to Ipswich, by way of Newmarket and Bury. The distance on that line from Six Mile Bottom to Cambridge was, as nearly as possible, nine miles, or about one-fifth of the main line of the proposed railway, and it passed through a strictly agricultural population in a district which possessed a very small population, and which consequently had very little local traffic. This Company proposed to make the new railway alongside the existing railway for no less a distance than nine miles, only going through one parish or village which was not already served by the existing line, and a village containing only something like 300 inhabitants, which village was itself, at the present moment, within a mile and a-half or two miles of two other railways. Therefore, as far as these nine miles were concerned, there was really no necessity for the construction of the present line; but while there was no necessity for it, there was this very great objection—that it would interfere with the comfort of the inhabitants of the district. It would cut up the land into narrow slips; and, without affording the slightest benefit, it would do serious and permanent injury to those who lived in the district and occupied the line. His proposal was that an Instruction should be given to the Committee to strike out those nine miles of railway, and to confine the powers of the Company to the construction of a line between Ipswich and Six Mile Bottom. If that were done, it would have this effect. There had been a Petition presented to the House by Mr. Hall, a large landowner in the neighbourhood of Six Mile Bottom, complaining of the way in which his land would be cut up, and the comfort of his residence and of his family interfered with by the projected railway. It was proposed to carry the line close to Mr. Hall's premises, and the embankment which it was proposed to construct would be a very serious annoyance to him and to the residents of his house. If the proposal he ventured to make to the Committee were carried out, instead of running over the present line of the Newmarket and Bury line, the Company would require to form a junction with that line, and they would then be able to go further away from Mr. Hall's house, and with very little trouble to make a much better line through his property, instead of proceeding in a serpentine fashion and crossing his hedges backwards and forwards for a distance of three or three and a-half miles, and that, too, in a country which was not an enclosed country where there were fields of various shapes and of very small size, but in a district where the fields were of very large area. In addition, the fields would be, in the most part, cut at right angles. If his proposal were accepted, the Railway Company, perhaps by spending a little more money in filling up a hole here and a hole there over a distance of some three miles, would be able to proceed in a straight line much more easy for themselves than the meandering route they now proposed to take. That was the reason why he thought the Amendment might have been accepted by the Railway Company, and why they should allow his Instruction to be sent to the Committee. If that had been done, the Company, instead of crossing the existing line, would have formed a junction with it, and would have been able to alter their gradients in a satisfactory manner. He would now draw attention to some of the provisions of the Bill. In one instance, there was to be a level crossing, and there were various other crossings of the line with gradients as steep as 1 in 16, and in one instance as 1 in 10. He thought the House would agree with him that any gradient over a railway bridge ought not to be more than 1 in 20. He presumed that the object of this Bill was to benefit those who were engaged in agricultural pursuits; and if the agricultural interests were to be consulted, if the gradients over any part of a road were increased by the Railway Company to such an extent that the same horse-power which would take a load now along a road would hereafter have to be increased, it would really be a very serious injury to every occupier of land who would have to cart his produce over the line. He was told by a very good authority that a gradient of 1 in 20 was equal to about 1 cwt. on the horse's back over and above a ton when drawn in a cart, and if they increased the gradients from 1 in 20 to 1 in 10 the extra load upon the horse's back must be proportionately increased, and therefore its power of carrying a load up a hill would be very much diminished. He thought that was another reason why the House should not allow the measure to go forward in its present shape, but that there should be an Instruction to the Committee to provide that the inclinations of the roads should in no case be steeper than 1 in 20, and that no bridge carrying the railway over the road should be of a less span than 25 feet. On looking at the provisions of the Bill, he found that in three instances the gradients had been increased from 1 in 10, and in several others from 1 in 14, 1 in 15, and 1 in 16. There was also a further objection to the Bill—namely, that it increased the tolls upon artificial manures. That question had been brought before the House several times during the course of the last two or three years, and last year the House came to a compromise upon it, by which they allowed the Companies to charge 1½d. per ton instead of 1d., which was the toll under which all the great railways of the country had been established. This Bill proposed, previously, to benefit the agriculturists in the district, and yet it would raise the tolls paid by the occupiers of land for the conveyance of artificial manures to a much higher rate than they had hitherto been in the habit of paying. Therefore, instead of being of benefit to the agricultural interest, it would be really injurious to that interest. He would not trouble the House further; but as the promoters had not thought proper to accept what he believed to be a very moderate proposal, which would have confined the line to the first 36 miles—from Six Mile Bottom to Bury—he would move that the Bill be read a second time on that day six months.

MR. BIRKBECK said, he rose to second the Motion of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks), and he did so for this reason—the proposal was simply to construct a line of an alternative character, 52 miles in length, which would cost over £1,000,000, and the prospect which the shareholders who invested their money in the undertaking had of realizing a dividend must be poor in the extreme. The Great Eastern Railway Company had experienced considerable difficulty in obtaining any dividend at all, and, at the present moment, the accommodation of the district, traversed by the proposed line, was amply met by the existing Railway Company. The through traffic between Cambridge and Ely and Ipswich was fully accommodated, and not only did this Company ask to supplement the existing accommodation, but they further sought to obtain running powers over the Great Eastern Railway. In the interests of the county of Norfolk, he strongly objected to such running powers being granted. The Great Eastern Railway Company had given an admirable train service to Norwich, and to all that district, by placing on their line as good express trains as were to be found upon any other line from London; and if these running powers were conferred upon this new Railway Company, the traffic would most certainly be interfered with, and the county of Norfolk, instead of being benefited by the line, would find its traffic seriously impeded. He trusted that the House would not allow the Bill to go upstairs to a Select Committee, but would refuse to read it a second time. He had no interest whatever, either as a shareholder or in any other way, in the Great Eastern Railway, and he simply opposed the projected line, because he was of opinion that it was not wanted, and that it would do a great injury to the Great Eastern Company. He had not heard a single person say a word in favour of the proposed railway, and, therefore, he begged to second the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire that the Bill be read a second time on that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Hicks.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. BIDDELL said, he only intended to make a few remarks in support of the Bill. He had a very different opinion of this line to that which was entertained by his hon. Friends. It was a line which was proposed to be constructed through a part of the county of Suffolk which he had the honour to represent. His hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk (Mr. Birkbeck) said that that county had an admirable train service already for the whole of its traffic, and his hon. Friend seemed to infer that that was also the case in reference to Suffolk. He (Mr. Biddell) would call the attention of the House to the facts of the case in reference to the place in which he lived. The town of Laverham had a population of nearly 2,000, and within a radius of six and a-half miles there was a population of 33,000. Ipswich was its natural port. It was only 18 miles distant; but by the Great Eastern Railway it was necessary to travel a distance of 42 miles in order to reach it in one way, and 36½ miles by another route. Under those circumstances, he did not think that the Great Eastern Railway provided proper accommodation for the district.

MR. HICKS said, that he had said nothing whatever as to the merits of the line in regard to the county of Suffolk. He had merely confined his remarks to that part of the line which affected the district with which he was intimately connected.

MR. BIDDELL said, the inhabitants of the locality had for years past asked the Great Eastern Company to give them facilities for getting to their natural port—namely, Ipswich; but the Company had not done so, and there was, therefore, no reason why they should now come forward and endeavour to prevent other people from doing that which they declined to do themselves. The inhabitants had now induced another Company to undertake to make a line, and he could not see what ground the Great Eastern Company had for opposing the Bill, seeing that they had, in the first instance, refused to do the work themselves. When the dock accommodation was fully developed in the Eastern Counties, he thought there would be a large increase in the heavy traffic, and that in the end no loss would be sustained by anybody in consequence of the construction of this railway. The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks) said that for a considerable distance the proposed line would run parallel with the existing line. So it would, he believed, for about seven or eight miles, but not for so long a distance as nine miles.

MR. HICKS said, the distance it would run parallel with the existing line was fully nine miles.

MR. BIDDELL said, he believed that, if that was the case, any hon. Member who was acquainted with the town of Cambridge must know that there was an unusual pressure on the station there, and it would be of great advantage rather than otherwise to relieve the traffic at that station. He did not think there had ever been a line devised which had met with more approbation from the locality through which it passed than this line. Several meetings had been held where resolutions had been unanimously passed in support of the line, and he maintained that the hon. Members for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks) and for North Norfolk (Mr. Birkbeck) had not raised a single point against the Bill which could not be dealt with in Committee. Surely, the proper place to fight the question of gradients, of which his hon. Friend (Mr. Hicks) spoke, was not on the floor of that House, but in a Committee upstairs? It was quite clear that the Company would not be able to make steeper gradients on the public roads than they were permitted to make by the General Acts of Parliament. And with regard to the increase of tolls, no increase could be maintained. If it were proposed to increase the tolls at present levied, he, as an agriculturist, would be one of the first to object. But even that was a case for the Committee, and he hoped the Committee would be allowed to decide these matters. The hon. Member for

Mr. Birkbeck

Cambridgeshire said that the line would cut up Mr. Hall's estate, and injure it. Was there an hon. Member in that House who ever heard of a railway that did not cut up somebody's land? It was proposed, by the construction of this line, to effect a great public good, and if, in carrying out that public good, the property of any individual sustained injury, the Company would have to pay in the shape of compensation for the injury inflicted. He could not believe, for an instant, that the House would refuse to allow the Bill to go upstairs. As to level crossings, he was told by the solicitor of the Bill that there was not a single public level crossing upon it, and, therefore, in that respect it was a much better measure than those of many other Railway Companies. As an agriculturist, he asked the House to consider the matter seriously, and to bear in mind that, at the present moment, the agriculturists of the district to which he had referred had to pay rates for the conveyance of manures from Ipswich either for 36 or 42 miles, although they were only 18 miles away. He thought that fact alone afforded a clear case in substantiation of the want of railway communication. As he had already stated, the Great Eastern Railway Company had been asked, over and over again, to give facilities for the construction of a line to serve this district, and they had always refused to do so. Therefore, they could not come before the House with any grace whatever to oppose the present scheme. He submitted, with confidence, that the House would not allow themselves to be persuaded by the remarks of his hon. Friends the Member for Cambridgeshire and the Member for North Norfolk, but that they would allow the Bill to go before a Committee, where all the objections which might be urged against it might be fairly met. He sincerely trusted that the House would not make this Bill an exception to the general course pursued in the case of private Bills, but that they would allow all these matters to be inquired into and decided by a Select Committee, who would consider the whole of them fairly and impartially. He, therefore, left the matter, with confidence, to the House.

Mr. DILLWYN said, he had listened to the speeches of the hon. Members for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks) and North Norfolk (Mr. Birkbeck), expecting to hear some reason why the House was asked to depart from the ordinary course of sending a Bill of this kind to the Committee upstairs. The House generally required a very good reason before taking that course; but he (Mr. Dillwyn) confessed that in this case he failed to see the slightest ground for taking the Bill away from the jurisdiction of a Select Committee. He did not see how the House could be expected to come to any decision upon the merits of the Bill from the discussion they had just heard. He, therefore, hoped the House would take the ordinary course and send the Bill to a Committee upstairs. He had no personal interest whatever in the matter, except that he objected to see the public time wasted; and, in the interests of the public, he felt bound to suggest that no case had been made out for taking the Bill out of the ordinary category of Private Railway Bills.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time and committed.

Mr. HICKS said, he presumed that he would now be in Order in moving the Instruction to the Committee which had been placed upon the Paper. He would, however, ask whether, as a point of Order, the Instruction ought to be moved now or postponed until another day?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member can move it now.

Mr. HICKS, in moving—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to limit the powers of the Company to the construction of a Railway between Ipswich and Six Mile Bottom, and provide that the inclinations of roads shall in no case be steeper than 1 in 20, and that no bridge carrying a Railway over a road shall be of a less span than twenty-five feet," said, he would not trouble the House with a word, in addition to what he had already said, in pointing out the absolute absurdity of making a railway for nine miles parallel with a railway already existing. There was not a single village or inhabitant proposed to be accommodated by the projected line who was not accommodated already.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to limit the powers of the Company to the construction of a Railway between Ipswich and Six Mile Bottom, and provide that the inclinations of roads shall in no case be steeper than 1 in 20, and that no bridge carrying a Railway over a road shall be of a less span than twenty-five feet."—(Mr. Hicks.)

MR. BIDDELL said, he certainly thought the question of gradients was clearly a matter for the Committee, and he did not think that the House ought to saddle them with such an Instruction as that proposed by his hon. Friend (Mr. Hicks). The House had already heard arguments on both sides in regard to the other part of the Instruction, and if the the people of Six Mile Bottom had any locus standi before the Committee, and did not desire to have the Bill, they would have their objections heard. He did not think any case had been made out for giving any exceptional Instruction to the Committee.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND thought it would be unwise, in the absence of any knowledge as to the merits of the case, for the House to pass this Instruction. The Committee would have the whole matter before them, and it would be unreasonable for the House to declare that, under no circumstances, should the Committee consent to a gradient over a road that was steeper than 1 in 20, and that no bridge should be less than a certain span. These were mere matters of detail. So far as he was concerned, he thought this was a most unusual Instruction to give to any Committee.

MR. HICKS said, that after this expression of opinion by the House, he would not press the Amendment. He thought the object he had in view would be answered by the Committee having their attention drawn to the discussion which had taken place. He would, therefore, withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

QUESTIONS.

REGISTRATION (OCCUPATION VOTERS) BILL—REGISTRATION EXPENSES.

SIR MASSEY LOPES asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government that the increased charges in respect of the remuneration and expenses of clerks of the peace and overseers, arising out of the Registration (Occupation Voters) Bill now before Parliament, are to be defrayed by the local rates, or whether it is proposed to provide out of moneys voted by Parliament relief from the obligation to bear increased liabilities for a matter of National interest?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, such expenses were always defrayed out of local rates, and there was no intention of making any change in this respect.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ROBERT GRAHAM, CLERK OF COOTEHILL UNION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What decision the Local Government Board has come to relative to Robert Graham, clerk of Cootehill Union?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Guardians, by a large majority, have expressed unabated confidence in Mr. Graham as their clerk; and having regard to this fact and to Mr. Graham's statement in his explanation that he answered Mr. Mattheson's question truthfully according to his recollection, and that if he interpreted the Local Government Board's letter wrongly he is very sorry for it, the Board have decided not to interfere on the present occasion with the Guardians' wish to retain Mr. Graham.

MR. BIGGAR gave Notice that he would call attention to the action of the Local Government Board in this matter in Committee of Supply.

MR. HEALY: If Boards of Guardians exonerate an officer, is that sufficient for the Local Government Board?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: No; I mentioned there were other circumstances as well as the vote of the Guardians, which was very large—two to one.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—ARMAGH DIVISION OF ATHLONE.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the interference of Mr. Hynds, rate collector, in the recent Poor Law election, in the Armagh Division of Athlone; whether it is usual for officials to interfere in a Poor Law election as he did; and, whether any rule exists governing the conduct of the officials in such circumstances; and, if not, whether the Government will frame such a rule?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I understand that two charges have been made against Mr. Hynds—(1) that he nominated a candidate at this Poor Law election, and (2) that he used intimidation and undue influence in connection with it. As regards the first charge, the Local Government Board are satisfied with Mr. Hynds's explanation of his reason for seeking to have a person nominated. As regards the second charge, if the person who brings it will adduce any particular cases in support of it, which he has not done hitherto, it may become necessary to make further inquiry.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)— SCHOOL TEACHERS—AGE FOR PENSIONS.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that National School teachers who are past their work, some of whom have served nearly forty years, but have not yet reached the age of sixty-five, to entitle them to the maximum pension, are holding on because of the small amount they can claim if they retire; whether he can state what progress the actuaries have made with the calculations concerning the proposed pension scheme; and, whether he would, in the interests of education, recommend the Lords of the Treasury to reduce the limit of age, so that it would be optional for male teachers to resign at sixty on full pension, and females at fifty-five?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The powers of the Commissioners of Education enable them to deal with any such cases of inefficiency as those referred to in this Question. The valuation of the pension fund will not be finished for some weeks to come, and it would be premature to consider any alteration of the present scheme until the valuation is completed.

IRELAND—THE PHOENIX PARK, DUBLIN—THE POLO GROUND.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

By what right the officers of the Dublin Garrison have caused warnings to be erected requesting riders to keep off what they call "the Polo Ground" in the Phoenix Park, who made this plot a Polo Ground, how many acres does it contain, who allowed it to be railed off as such, is it not one of the finest levels in the entire Park, how much is now railed off in inclosures for the use of cricketers and polo players in the Phoenix Park, and are there any such privileges accorded to cricket and polo clubs in Hyde Park and Regent's Park?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am unable to answer the last query of the hon. Member, and the entire Question is one which should properly have been addressed to my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, the control of the Phoenix Park being vested in the Commissioners of Public Works. However, I have ascertained from the Commissioners that the ground on which the game of polo is played is about seven acres in extent. It is not enclosed, but the Commissioners have permitted barriers to be erected which consists of posts and handrails on two sides of the ground, to protect from accident the public who assemble there in large numbers to see the game played. These barriers are so constructed as to admit of removal if necessary when the game is not being played. The notice to which the hon. Member refers is not a warning but a request, and the Commissioners have not, therefore, objected to it. There are five cricket grounds in the Park—some, I believe, for working men's clubs—containing about 15 acres altogether.

MR. HEALY: I beg to give Notice that when the Vote in reference to Phoenix Park comes on in Committee of Supply I shall call attention to the continual encroachments on public property by the snobs and swells of Dublin Garrison. [Cries of "Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is quite out of Order. The hon. Member must withdraw that expression. It is not a proper or Parliamentary expression to be used in this House.

MR. HEALY made no reply.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member withdraw the expression?

MR. HEALY took off his hat and bowed.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—SCALE OF EXPENSES IN CROWN CASES.

MR. PATRICK MARTIN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Has his attention been called to the severe comments and observations of the Judges of Assize in Ireland on and in respect to the Circular issued by the Attorney General, varying and reducing the scale of expenses to be allowed in Crown cases in Ireland; is the decision as to the amount actually to be paid by Law vested in the Judges, and must not the sums so awarded by them, notwithstanding such Circular, be paid in the first instance by the treasurers for the several counties out of the county rates, and in case the allowances so awarded by the Judges exceed the sums mentioned in the Circular, has it been stated, on behalf of the Treasury, that they will not in future reimburse such extra allowances to the county rates; is it the intention of the Government to now insist that such extra allowances, when sanctioned by the presiding Judge of Assize, shall not in future be reimbursed to the county treasurer, and can he state the reasons which have led to the imposition of this increased charge and burden on the county rates; and, will he have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House Copies of the present Circular and the one issued in the year 1880?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I believe some of the Judges have disapproved of the Circular referred to. It must be borne in mind that the Treasury are not liable for any of the expenses of witnesses or prosecutors in Ireland, which, under the law, are chargeable to the counties. The Treasury, however, have been in the habit of recouping to the counties the amount so paid; but in assuming this responsibility they have never divested themselves of the right to fix the amount they will contribute, and Circulars with this object have been issued from time to time. In a Circular issued in 1880 a minimum and a maximum scale were laid down, and, so far as I am aware, no objection was made to this. The effect of the Circular recently issued has been to restrict the amount to be paid to the minimum allowed by the Circular of 1880, unless special reasons exist for exceeding it. I consider the amount so fixed to be fair and reasonable; and if in any special case a larger sum be paid—the right of the Judge to order this not being controverted—the burden thrown on the counties will be insignificant. I have no objection to lay Copies of these two Circulars on the Table. It is the intention of the Government to adhere to the course they have laid down.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—(SUB-COMMISSIONERS)—MR. EDWARD GREER.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Edward Greer, Sub-Commissioner, was, until his appointment, partner with Mr. R. A. Mullan, Solicitor, Newry; whether on the door the words "Greer and Mullan, Solicitors," still appears, and cheques are still issued on the Newry Branch of the Bank of Ireland in the names of Greer and Mullan; and, whether there is an agreement between these gentlemen that on the cessation of Mr. Greer's employment as a Commissioner he is to resume his place in the firm?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I must ask for longer Notice of this Question, which obviously involves local inquiries, and which only appeared yesterday.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)—HEALTH OF THE TROOPS.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked the Financial Secretary for the War Department, What are the last reports as to the health of the troops in the Soudan?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: The troops on the Nile are so scattered that it is difficult to make up from the Returns any percentage of sick on a given date, but it may be said generally that the health is good. At Suakin the latest report states there is a little over 4 per cent. of sick.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Can the hon. Gentleman say how many men have been invalided home from the Red Sea?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: I cannot say.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE KINSALE MAILS.

MR. DEASY asked the Postmaster General, Whether the Post Office authorities intend to make the alterations in the mail service to and from Kinsale which the Town Commissioners have suggested to them?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE regretted to say that he had not yet come to a decision on this matter.

MR. DEASY: I beg to remind the right hon. Gentleman that he undertook four months ago to look into this matter.

PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT, 1877—ILLEGAL LEVY ON CO. CORK—REPAYMENT.

MR. DEASY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether the Government will refund the sums declared by the Court of Queen's Bench in 1882 to have been illegally levied on the county of Cork under "The Prisons (Ireland) Act, 1877?"

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): This subject is engaging the attention of the Irish Government, and if the hon. Member will repeat the Question on a future date I will answer it.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND) — THE TUBBERCOURRY CASE—PAYMENT OF COSTS OF ACCUSED, &c.
IN DEFENCE.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, With regard to his undertaking to inquire, during the Easter Recess, into the question of the delay in paying the costs of the accused, and witnesses summoned for the defence, in the Tubbercurry (county Sligo) cases, whether those costs have yet been paid?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, that the witnesses' expenses in this case had been settled.

MR. SEXTON: When will they be paid?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) was understood to say immediately.

POST OFFICE, DUBLIN—PROMOTION.

MR. SEXTON asked the Postmaster General, If it is a fact that a Dublin Post Office Telegraphist, of twenty-two years' service, is intended to be passed over in making the promotions now about to be made in the Dublin Department; if so, for what reason; and, whether it is an accepted principle that seniority should be recognised in the matter of promotion unless when cause is shown to the contrary?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that all promotions in the Post Office Service were made by the Postmaster General alone, and as those to which the hon. Member referred had not yet come before him, he was unable to answer his Question. He might state, however, that neither in this nor any other case would anyone be passed over without his claims and qualifications being fully considered. In making promotions seniority certainly formed an element for consideration.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—THE PURCHASE CLAUSES.

MR. PATRICK MARTIN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Have any suggestions been made by the Irish Land Commissioners to the Irish Executive in respect to the complete dead lock which has taken place in the operation of the Purchase Clauses in the Land Act of 1881; has any draft Bill which proposes to remove the obstacles which prevent the efficient working of the Purchase Clauses been prepared by one of the Land Commissioners and submitted for the consideration of the Irish Government, and has any Correspondence taken place between any members of the Irish Government and any member of the Land Commission in respect to the preparation of a Bill of this character; and, will he have any objection to lay Copies of such suggestions or Correspondence upon the Table of the House?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Communications have passed between the Land Commissioners and the Irish Government on the subject of the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act, and proposals in reference thereto have been made by the Commissioners; but such communications and proposals are essentially of a confidential nature, and not such as should be laid on the Table.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS —FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE—OUTBREAK AT HAMBURG.

MR. BIRKBECK asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether there are at the present time any cases of foot and mouth disease at, or in the neighbourhood of, Bremen, Geestemünde, or any of the other German cattle exporting ports; and, if so, whether he will forthwith impose the necessary restrictions on the importation of live animals from such ports?

MR. TREVELYAN: No cases of foot-and-mouth disease are known to exist at or in the neighbourhood of any German ports from which animals are sent to this country. Information has been received from the Consul at Hamburg that two cattle were found to be affected and were slaughtered at once on the 11th instant. All the sound animals in the infected place were likewise slaughtered, and the export of animals to England from Hamburg was at once prohibited by the German Government. We have requested the German Government to communicate with us before they propose to re-open the port of Hamburg.

GIBRALTAR—ORDINANCE—ZEBEHR PASHA.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Ordinance authorising the detention in custody of Zebehr Pasha was made in consequence of instructions from the Colonial Office in London; when those instructions were given; whether they can be laid upon the Table of the House; whether the General Officer who commands the garrison exercises by himself all the functions of legislation at Gibraltar; whether the Ordinance in question was first promulgated or made known publicly some hours after Zebehr Pasha had been landed by being affixed to the Exchange Buildings, by leave of the Exchange Committee and Chamber of Commerce, at the request of the Colonial Secretary; and, whether any Ordinance was ever published in this way before?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes, Sir. On the 25th of March telegraphic instructions were sent to the Governor of Gibraltar instructing him to pass the necessary Ordinance. There will be no objection to lay on the Table of the House the despatch which followed, and which was the extender of the contents of the telegram. The General Officer commanding, who is also the Governor, is the sole legislative authority. Whether the Ordinance was published by being affixed to the Exchange Buildings or not I do not know; but it duly appeared in The Gibraltar Chronicle of the 30th of March, the day on which Zebehr landed, and this is the usual mode of promulgating Ordinances in Gibraltar.

ARMY—GARRISON RATIONS.

SIR HARRY VERNEY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will direct that in weighing the rations of meat for soldiers of the British Army the weight of bones and gristle shall be omitted?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No change is contemplated in the garrison ration. In the field, where soldiers are much exposed, the meat ration is largely increased, so that the soldier obtains more than a pound, exclusive of bone. The General commanding has always authority in the field to vary or increase the ration to meet the requirements of climate, work, &c.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—DIARIES OF COLONEL STEWART.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can give any information respecting the Journals or Diary of events (known to have been written both in English and in Arabic and of which General Gordon speaks in the highest terms) kept by the late lamented Colonel Donald Stewart, C.M.G., Chief of the Staff of General Gordon at Khartoum, who was subsequently wrecked and murdered near Merawi; and, whether he will undertake to hand over whatever papers there may be of the nature referred to, to that Gallant Officer's family, which anxiously desires to possess them?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The only papers belonging to the late Colonel Stewart which have been recovered are some pages of a rough pencil note-book of daily events kept by him. These are evidently not part of the diary referred to in the right hon. Gentleman's Question. All that have been recovered have been handed over to his brother.

MR. RITCHIE: In handing over the notes, were any conditions made as to the non-publication of certain portions of them?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No, Sir; I am not aware of any.

ARMY (INDIA)—HORSE AND FIELD ARTILLERY.

LORD ALGERNON PERCY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Horse and Field Artillery in India are armed with 9-pounder M. L. guns of 6 cwt. and 8 cwt. respectively; whether the batteries in England are not armed with 13-pounder B. L. guns; and, whether any steps are being taken to arm the Indian batteries with the more perfect weapon?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The batteries of Horse and Field Artillery are armed as stated in the Question. Some of the Horse Artillery batteries at home are armed with 13-pounder muzzle-loading guns, and the remainder with 9-pounder muzzle-loading guns; but none with breech-loading guns. No application on the subject has been received from the Government of India.

ARMY—SALE OF MILITARY CLOTHING.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether it is a fact that the usual practice has this year been departed from of inviting tenders for the purchase of military condemned clothing, and an offer from a buyer accepted without competition; and, if so, for what reason has the usual course been departed from?

MR. BRAND: The results obtained in advertising these sales led me to the conclusion that it would be better to adopt the principle of limiting competition in this particular business.

ARMY—ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT—MILITARY SWORDS.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether it is a fact that, as the result of recently testing the swords of the 2nd Dragoon Guards and 7th Hussars at Aldershot, fully one-half have been found unfit for use, even for recruits' drill, and whether the majority of the swords for the Commissariat and Transport Corps were also found to be unserviceable; whether it has been known for some time past that a number of the swords and bayonets supplied to our troops are of an unserviceable nature; if he will inform the House by whom these inferior weapons were manufactured; and, whether he will take care for the future that the lives of our gallant soldiers shall not be imperilled by false notions of economy?

MR. BRAND: I would ask the hon. and gallant Member whether he really thinks it will advance the public interest to reply to this Question? If so, I will reply. Then, Sir, the facts are these. For some time past it has been known that the pattern of sword adopted by the Military Authorities in 1882 was too light to stand severe strain. Upon the failure of certain swords of this pattern in the Soudan in 1884, a Committee was appointed under the Presidency of Sir Drury Lowe, and they recommended that the tests should be increased in severity. This has been carried out, and the whole of the swords in store and in possession of the troops have either been re-tested, or shortly will be put through that process. Care will be taken that all swords in possession of the troops are serviceable. The bayonets are perfectly serviceable. The last two Questions are argumentative, and, in reply, I have to say that the swords of which complaint has been made were strictly according to the pattern of 1882, and passed tests. Considerations of cost have not in any way influenced the question of the pattern of the swords.

NAVAL EXPENDITURE—APPLICATION OF VOTES.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, who had the following Question on the Paper:—To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, with reference to a statement made by the Member for Cardiff, in a speech at Portsmouth on the 18th March, to the effect that much of the money voted for shipbuilding purposes had been used to meet expenditure in other Departments, whether such a misapplication of the funds voted by Parliament would not constitute a flagrant violation of the pledges given to Parliament in voting Estimates for a specific purpose; and, whether, if such alleged diversion has taken place, he can inform the House how much of the money voted for shipbuilding purposes, during the past four years, has been thus diverted from its legitimate channel to meet expenditure in other Departments? said: Since putting this Question on the Paper, I have received a letter from the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed), in which he informs me that the reporter failed to catch the sense of his remarks. The speech of the hon. Member appeared in all the Liberal newspapers of the day, and therefore I copied the statement from that source.

"I did not intend to imply," the hon. Member says, "that the funds voted by Parliament were differently applied, although that was sometimes the case."

I shall, therefore, leave out the reference to the hon. Member, and ask the second part of the Question only.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: I can only say that, within the period for which the present Board of Admiralty is responsible, money voted for ship-building purposes has not been used to meet expenditure in other Departments.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—REPORTED RETIREMENT OF AFGHAN TROOPS TO HERAT.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Afghan troops have retired from Meruchak and other positions to Herat, leaving the valleys of the Murghab and the Khusk Rivers open to Herat; and, whether Captain Yate's account of the attack of the Russian Commander upon the Afghans on March 31st has been confirmed by Sir Peter Lumsden?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The latest information received from Sir Peter Lumsden is to the effect that the Afghan Forces retreating from Penjdeh were, on the 10th instant, partly at Koleh Nan and partly at Kushk. In reply to the second part of the Question, I believe a similar inquiry is likely to be made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite of the Prime Minister.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Will the noble Lord state, in reply to the third line of the Question, whether this retirement of the Afghan Forces, "leaving the valleys of the Murghab and the Kushk rivers open to Herat," has been completed? I understand Kushk is close to Herat. Is that so?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I understand that this is a matter of military opinion, on which I am not competent to pronounce.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE RUSSO-AFGHAN FRONTIER—DELIMITATION.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, who had given Notice to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Russian Government have yet consented to send their Commission to delimitate the Afghan frontier; whether the Russian Government have asked that the debatable zone shall be extended southwards some sixty miles to the line of the Parapronisus and the Murghab; and, whether Her Majesty's Ministers have offered to give up to Russia Penj-deh, Ak-Tepe, Zulfagar, and the salt lakes of Er Oilan, or any of these positions, which have all been occupied by Russia since the appointment of the Boundary Commission? said: Before I put this Question, perhaps, it would be better to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he wishes to reply to the Leader of the Opposition should he wish to ask him any Questions?

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman will probably do so, and I was about to say that I am not able to enter on the matters touched by the hon. Member in his Question.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—THE AGREEMENT OF MAR. 17, AND ACTION OF MAR. 30, &c.—REPORTED OCCUPATION BY RUSSIA OF PENJDEH.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I think it would be convenient to the House that Questions should be asked, whether we are able to get any further information or not, in order that we may know where we stand. The Question I am particularly anxious to ask the Government is whether they are yet in possession of a full account, or a sufficiently full account, of the proceedings of the 30th of March and the days following? A considerable time has now elapsed, and we should like to know whether the Government are now, and, if not, when they expect to be in possession of a full account?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no difficulty in saying that we are in possession of no full account of those proceedings, nor of anything approaching to a full account. But a request, which I think I signified before, was addressed to Sir Peter Lumsden to ask for a full and consecutive account; and my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs informs me that a telegram has arrived, and is now in course of being deciphered, which may contain that full account. I cannot say whether it does or not; but, of course, the right hon.

Gentleman will see that it would be necessary to have it compared with the accounts which may be received elsewhere before we should be in a position to give a definite or conclusive judgment to the House upon the matter. We have, however, an independent telegram from Sir Peter Lumsden which clears up an important point. The House will, I have no doubt, remember that—because I recollect that it naturally produced a considerable sensation in the House—on the first occasion of referring to this question of the engagement on the 30th of March I used, I believe, these words—that Captain Yate had met the Chief of the Russian Staff by appointment, and the Chief of the Russian Staff informed him that no such arrangement as that referred to in our telegram of the 17th of March as to the non-advance of the Russians had been received. The House will, I am sure, recollect those words. There was no date attached to that meeting between Captain Yate and the Chief of the Russian Staff. It must, of course, have been before the 29th, and we now see that it must have been two or three days before the 29th, because we have received to-day a telegram from Sir Peter Lumsden containing an account of some further communications of Captain Yate with the Chief of the Russian Staff. Writing on the 28th of March, the Chief of the Russian Staff says that—“He has received a notification from our side respecting the account which Lord Granville had given of the arrangement made;”

and he goes on to say that—

“what was stated by Lord Granville was in accordance with the orders received by us”

—namely, the Russian officers, and consequently, on the 28th of March, the Russian officers were in possession of the orders given by the Russian Government in conformity with the arrangement of the 17th. The question whether they had acted on these orders remained a matter for future consideration, and therefore the point of the communication of these orders is so far disposed of. I am bound to say that, putting together the dates as best we can, I am inclined to think that probably that was about as soon as the Russian officers upon the spot could have received the orders sent from St. Petersburg in conformity with the arrangement of the 17th of March. There is nothing else of a conclusive character in the telegram which Sir Peter Lumsden writes, nor is there anything of an unfavourable character as to the communications which are still going on.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Is there any truth in the report that Penjdeh has been occupied by the Russians, and that Her Majesty's Government have assented to that occupation?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; we know nothing more on the subject of Penjdeh than we knew yesterday. What we were informed of yesterday was that an administration had been established in Penjdeh. There is no intimation whatever of a military occupation of Penjdeh. I had better not undertake to explain what the administration is. The explanation was given in the newspapers yesterday; but whether that be authentic or not I cannot undertake to say, because we are not officially informed.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: In regard to the present position of Sir Peter Lumsden, can the noble Lord tell us whether Tirkpul, where he is now, is in Persian or in Afghan territory?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: It is in Afghan territory, but it is not far from the Persian Frontier. It is marked on nearly all the maps which are now arriving.

MR. J. LOWTHER: In regard to the despatch which is now being deciphered at the Foreign Office, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in the event of its not being injurious to the public interest, he will undertake to make its contents known to the House before its rising?

MR. GLADSTONE: That must depend upon what they are. If anything of great importance or interest should arise we will, undoubtedly, take the earliest opportunity of making it known.

MR. LEWIS asked the date of the telegram just read by the Prime Minister?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is dated Tirkpul, April 13.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: The Prime Minister has given the 17th of March as the date of this agreement, under which neither the Russian nor the Afghan Forces should advance. I would ask him if it is not a fact that the real date on which that agreement was first announced to this House was the 13th of March, and not the 17th, and that we were informed it really dated from the 2nd of March? And are we to understand that the responsibility for the attack on the Afghans is now shifted from General Komaroff to the Government of St. Petersburg; and, if so, whether, the Government of St. Petersburg have offered any reparation to our Allies, the Afghans, and have they offered to restore a considerable number of guns taken from the Afghans on that occasion? I should like to know also if the noble Lord can tell us how far the town of Kushk, not the river, is from Herat; and whether we are to understand from his answer that not only have the Afghans retired to Kushk, but that the Russians are free to follow them to the point?

Mr. GLADSTONE: With regard to the question of dates, I am not aware of having been inaccurate; but there were several statements made to the House, and it would be better that I should ascertain exactly what those statements were.

Mr. CHAPLIN: As to the administration which we are informed has been established as Penjdeh, I should like to ask the Prime Minister this Question—whether the administration has the sanction and consent of Her Majesty's Government, and whether Her Majesty's Government have made any communications with regard to it to the Russian Government?

Mr. GLADSTONE: We have made no communication on the subject. We have nothing before us except the fact that there is an administration, and the explanation of it placing it on the ground of necessity for the maintenance of peace, which I have seen in the newspapers. I cannot say whether it is authentic or not. But I am bound to say, taking the facts as they appear, there is a fair presumption attending the case which would make us desirous of having fuller information on the matter before we made it the subject of official representations.

Mr. ONSLOW asked whether it was Sir Peter Lumsden's intention to remain at Tirpul, or whether, if the Russians advanced thither, he would be driven to any other portion of Afghan or Persian territory?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I must ask the hon. Gentleman for Notice of this Question.

Mr. LEWIS asked the date of the long message which was now being deciphered?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I cannot state. It only arrived at the Foreign Office a short time before I left the Office.

Mr. LEWIS: Is it from Tirpul?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I presume it is undoubtedly from Tirpul.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to give Notice that, on Monday, I will ask the Government what is the exact position of the Russians in their advance towards Herat, and whether Her Majesty's Government have received any assurance from the Russian Government that they will not seize Herat itself?

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. GLADSTONE: It may be convenient to the House that I should now say a few words as to the course of Business for next week. We hope to close the Committee on the Seats Bill to-night; but if that should not be the case, we propose to go on with that Bill on Monday. It will be my duty on Monday or Tuesday to lay the Vote of Credit on the Table; and probably it will be convenient to the House that in laying it on the Table I should make a short statement to enable the House to understand what the demand is and for what purpose the Vote is to be applied. I presume that no appreciable time will be occupied with the Vote of Credit on that occasion. We shall proceed on Monday with Supply, taking the Navy Estimates, provided that we finish the Committee on the Seats Bill. If the Committee on the Bill is not concluded to-night, then we shall go on with it on Monday. Then it will have to be considered whether the Seats Bill cannot be taken on Report on Tuesday. ["Oh!"] That, I say, is a matter for consideration, and in any case I do not think it need call forth any strong manifestation of emotion. On Thursday, of course, it is understood that, whatever may be the progress made with the Seats Bill, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will make his Financial Statement.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The right hon. Gentleman has stated that the Vote of Credit will be taken on Monday or Tuesday. I would point out that, supposing the Seats Bill is not taken on Tuesday, the ordinary Rules of the House would give precedence to Notices of Motion, and the Vote of Credit could not come on until the Notices of Motion have been disposed of.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes; it could be presented and laid on the Table, accompanied by some such explanation as is necessary to make it intelligible to the House, but without entering into any argument.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR inquired whether, in the event of the Navy Estimates not being taken on Monday, they would be taken on Tuesday?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am afraid I cannot say.

In reply to MR. LEWIS,

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that of course the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill must be reprinted before the Report stage, and there must be, at least, a day for putting down Amendments.

MR. LEWIS thought that an interval of not less than a week ought to be given between the closing of the Committee on the Bill and the Report stage.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the Prime Minister whether the House was to understand that it would be competent for a Minister to make a statement on the Vote of Credit, but that it would not be competent for Members of the House to debate that statement?

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was a very common thing for Ministers, if it were required, to make an explanation for the convenience of the House in such cases. The statement would not, in the slightest degree, enter into argumentative matter, but would be confined to making the Vote intelligible.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the Speaker whether, when a Minister presented Papers to the House, and made a statement with reference to them, the Motion would not be made that the Papers lie on the Table?

MR. SPEAKER: The Motion would be to refer the Vote to Committee of Supply.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: And on that a debate would arise?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Will it take precedence of Notices of Motion on Tuesday?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes; it would take precedence.

In reply to LORD JOHN MANNERS,

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that he proposed to take the first opportunity, but not that evening, of bringing on the second reading of the Telegraph Acts Amendment Bill at a reasonable hour.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, with respect to his statement as to the course of Public Business, what facilities would be given by the Government for the Irish Registration Bill? There would be 700,000 new voters in Ireland who would be incapacitated from getting on the roll unless the Bill were passed. He also wished to know whether the Prime Minister was aware of what had taken place last night in the House, when an attempt had been made to bring on the Bill at 12 o'clock, and a number of Gentlemen, Privy Councillors and others, had wasted time in order to bring up the time to half-past 12 o'clock?

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot answer the contentious part of the Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monaghan; but I think I had better confine myself to saying that I am not in a position at present to depart from the rule of doing one thing at a time; and I think it is best, as far as the Bill is concerned, for the interest of all parties and of legislation, that we should direct our attention steadily to the remaining important stages of the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill. We deem it quite essential to proceed with the Irish Registration Bill, and we feel it to be our bounden duty to make provision at the earliest time we can for proceeding with it.

MR. HEALY: Then I give Notice that, in consequence of the way in which the Irish Party were treated last night, when the English Registration Bill comes down from Committee I shall block it.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) (re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 49.]

COMMITTEE. [Progress 16th April.]

[SIXTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SEVENTH SCHEDULE.
COUNTIES AT LARGE.NUMBER OF MEMBERS AND NAMES AND CONTENTS OF DIVISIONS.PART III.
IRELAND.

MR. HEALY, in moving an Amendment on the Paper to leave out from line 15 to line 8, in page 92, and insert—

No. 1.—North Armagh Division.

"Barony of O'Neiland East.

"Barony of O'Neiland West (except parishes of Armagh, Grange, Kildarton, and Mullaghbrack).

No. 2.—Mid-Armagh Division.

"Barony of Armagh.

"Barony of Fews Lower.

"Barony of Tiranny.

"Barony of Fews Upper (parish of Lisnadil).

"Barony of O'Neiland West (parishes of Armagh, Grange, Kildarton, and Mullaghbrack).

No. 3.—South Armagh Division.

"Barony of Orrior Lower.

"Barony of Orrior Upper.

said, he proposed to move the three parts into which it was divided separately, because it would not suit his purpose to move them altogether. He would point out that it was necessary, before moving the Amendments, to settle the names of the Armagh Divisions; and, therefore, it would be necessary to move the Amendments relating to the divisions separately. He had intended, after the name of North Armagh, which was assigned to this division, to move the additional name of "O'Neiland;" but his hon. Friends thought it would be better to have no alternative names whatever. If he were not allowed to have his way on that point, and names were afterwards inserted in connection with other counties, he should feel himself at liberty to move alternative names in regard to Armagh on the Report; but he hoped the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would give an assurance that in no other county would alternative names be given. He would now simply move a verbal Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 91, line 14, to leave out the word "The," in order to insert the word "North,"—(Mr. Healy,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'The' stand part of the Schedule."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that, as far as he was personally concerned, he should prefer that Ireland was treated in the same manner as England. There were, however, one or two cases in which local names were extremely popular in the district interested; and he doubted, therefore, whether he could bind the Committee as to anything like a distinct course in regard to every county.

MR. SEXTON said, that, in reply to the remarks of the right hon. Baronet, he wished to say that, as far as his memory served him, there was only one case in which there would be anything like a strong feeling in favour of including an alternative name in the division. He was not, however, aware that in that case there was any strong opinion that an alternative name was required; and he was not aware that there were on the Paper any proposals for an alternative name, except in the instance of the county of Galway, where it was proposed to call the divisions by the name of the county instead of Connemara, &c. The divisions of the Irish counties would be few enough to allow the introduction of the compass points; and there was no necessity, therefore, to introduce alternative names. The Commissioners had reported that the general feeling was in favour of the names of the counties; and he believed that the most brief and simple way of naming the divisions was to give the compass points.

MR. CALLAN said, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles W. Dilke), in the case of the English counties, had made an exception in favour of merged boroughs. He (Mr. Callan) wished to know if the right hon. Gentleman intended, in Ireland, to extinguish the name of any county in favour of a merged borough?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he did not; but it was possible that some Representative of a merged borough might desire to retain the name, and he should not stand in the way, if such a proposal were made, after the course the Committee had taken in connection with the English counties.

MR. HEALY said, there was a strong opinion among the Irish Members in favour of leaving the county names as they stood in the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HEALY moved an Amendment in the same line to omit the word "Division," which would have the effect of describing the first division in the county of Armagh as "North Armagh," instead of "the North Armagh Division."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HEALY said, he now came to the Amendments he had placed upon the Paper in regard to the constitution of the Armagh Divisions—namely, North Armagh, Mid Armagh, and South Armagh. He would, however, take the discussion upon the first proposal, which was that the North Armagh Division should consist of the "barony of O'Neiland East, barony of O'Neiland West (except parishes of Armagh, Grange, Kildarton, and Mullaghbrack)." He presumed that it would be necessary, in the first instance, to move the omission of the words of the Schedule from line 15 to line 23, inclusive. It must be borne in mind that the county of Armagh was the only three-Membered constituency in Ireland, and he thought the Irish Members had good reason to complain of the fact that the county was to receive an undue number of Representatives when the Committee bore in mind the way in which Dublin was treated. The county of Armagh was to have three Representatives; while the county of Dublin, a much more important constituency, was to be deprived of its proper weight in the House of Commons by receiving only two. The county of Dublin, according to its population, was only 12,000 lower than the county of Armagh, and that was simply because the township of included in the City of Dublin. If it were included in the county, as it ought to be, unless the other townships were also included in the City of Dublin, the county of Dublin would have a far larger population than the county of Armagh. Therefore, Dublin absolutely suffered not only relatively by the jerrymandering which the constituencies had undergone, but also in a double sense, because the intrusion of the township of Pembroke within the municipal limits of the City of Dublin prevented the county from having a sufficient population to entitle it to three Members. Dublin was, therefore, not only cheated by the way in which the proposed extension of the city had been treated by the Boundary Commissioners, but the county was also deprived of the additional Member it would have been entitled to if the county boundaries had been properly arranged. This was the first of the Ulster counties which had been brought under the notice of the Committee; but what was to be said of the jerrymandering of one county might be said of all, so far as Ireland was concerned. Whatever course had been pursued in regard to any one of them was much the same as had been taken in regard to the rest. By the first scheme which was proposed by the Commissioners for the county of Armagh, the Nationalists would have carried two divisions of the county. He fully admitted that in the original scheme proposed by the Commissioners a slight error had been committed in regard to the population. He referred to that fact because the Amendments he was now proposing were very much in the direction of the original scheme of the Commissioners, and he preferred to revert to that scheme rather than lay himself open to any charge of jerrymandering the county for Nationalist purposes. He had, therefore, simply put down on the Paper the scheme of the Commissioners as already proposed before the minds of the Commissioners were affected by listening to the arguments brought forward by the Tory Representatives. It was an extraordinary circumstance that, with one exception, the scheme of the Bill was the scheme of the Tory Party. He referred to the case of Tiranny, which barony the Commissioners had adopted in favour of the Nationalists; but they had not adopted as much of it as was necessary to prevent the Nationalist votes from being swamped. To use a catch word, there had not been too much jerrymandering, but just jerrymandering enough; and the result of it was to cheat the Nationalists out of two votes. The way in which the matter stood was this—three Members were given; the North of Ulster was, undoubtedly, Conservative; but the South was overwhelmingly Nationalist. The entire question was, therefore, how to arrange the Mid Division of the county so as to throw in a sufficient number of Orangemen from the North, and exclude a sufficient number of Nationalists of the South, the Southern end of the county being, at the present moment, overwhelmingly Nationalist. The Southern Division would be Nationalist under any circumstances; but by the scheme of the Commissioners it was made so preponderantly Nationalist, that they would have a majority of between 5,000 or 6,000 at least. That had been done, as anybody would see, who referred to the statement contained in a Paper issued by the right hon. Baronet, dated March 17th, and prepared by Major Macpherson, the gentleman who conducted the local inquiry on behalf of the Commissioners. It was somewhat extraordinary that wherever Major Macpherson had gone, with the sole exception of the county of Down, where he had made a small concession to the Nationalists, which, however, they could have done without—wherever Major Macpherson had gone a seat had been taken away from the Nationalists. He was really at a loss to know what promotion Major Macpherson was to get in return for the great services he had rendered to the Tory Party. He presumed that whenever the Tory Party came into Office Major Macpherson would be promoted to, at least, the dignity of a Major General. Hon. Members could read Major Macpherson's own notes, and would know exactly what it was that was proposed by the Tory Party in reference to this constituency. Mr. Peel, a solicitor of Armagh, put forward the Tory scheme, and Mr. Peel was a gentleman who would be a candidate for the representation of the Central Division of Armagh. He was a local Coroner, and Grand Master of an Orange Society. He was a gentleman who, on a recent occasion, had advised the Orangemen to bring in their pockets not only a copy of Sankey's hymns, but a Colt's revolver. Mr. Peel's proposal was opposed by everybody on the popular side; and it was a remarkable fact that the division of the county corresponded with the original scheme of the Commissioners, so far as the barony of Orior was concerned. The Commissioners had now cut that barony into two, and, to suit their own purposes, they had thrown the upper and Orange end of the county into the Central Division in order to make weight. The Committee had heard a good deal about the necessity of adhering to strict geographical lines, and about compactness, and the desirability of maintaining well-marked boundaries; but the moment it suited the purposes of the Tory Party this gentleman had no hesitation whatever in departing from any principle of that kind; and, as a matter of fact, in the Northern Division he had abolished all the old baronies and other well-known boundary lines hitherto adopted for the purpose of compactness; whereas in other cases, when he had been asked to take a similar course, in order to secure compactness, his answer was—"No; I must adhere to the old barony lines." This striking high and low was afterwards resorted to for the purpose of jerrymandering the counties in order to assist the Tory Party. Major Macpherson's excuse for his conduct was certainly a pretty piece of official writing. In the county of Armagh more baronies were broken up than in any other Irish county, and so much was that the case that the Commissioner had found it necessary to say something in his own defence. He, therefore, said that some of the baronies were very irregular in shape, and he considered that an excellent reason for lopping so much off of a Conservative district as it was considered necessary to fill up the Central Division. For instance, the barony of O'Neiland West was included partly in North Armagh and partly in Mid Armagh; and a piece of land, forming a narrow projection something like a wen on a man's head, had been conveniently cut off. In the barony of Fews a piece of land projecting northward was also got rid of, and the land in the barony was distributed between the Mid Armagh and the South Armagh Divisions. Major Macpherson said that he had found it impossible to avoid in any new arrangements the getting rid of the old boundaries. What was the use, then, of the Lord Lieutenant issuing Instructions to the Commissioners to respect the natural boundaries, if the Commissioners were to take a carte blanche, and act upon it just as they pleased, with the notion that whatever satisfied the Tory Party would satisfy the Government, and whatever the Boundary Commissioners agreed to the Government would force through the House of Commons? It virtually amounted to this—"If you say it would be better to have these separations, we (the Government) will use the Front Opposition Bench and the Treasury Bench as the two blades of a pair of scissors, in order to lop off any proposals that may be brought forward against your action." The Commissioners, therefore, went into the operation with a full knowledge that in whatever way they exercised their discretion they would be backed up by the Government, and by the Leaders of the Opposition in the House of Commons. He must say that no previous Commission had ever been sent out to discharge important duties with such an assurance as that. At the very least, when the Government gave the Boundary Commissioners the extraordinary powers possessed by this Commission, the first thing they should have had placed before their minds was the drag of the "rod in pickle" of public opinion. That drag had been entirely removed from them by the knowledge that any agreement come to between the Marquess of Salisbury and the Government would afterwards be ratified in the Act of Parliament; and not only had they that knowledge, but their minds were further affected by the extraordinary intimidatory address of the Marquess of Salisbury, who told the Orangemen, when they complained of the way in which the Bill might operate against them, to be of good cheer, and not to be in the least alarmed, because very much would depend on the spirit in which the Commissioners carried out their Instructions. They had now seen the manner in which the Commissioners had carried out their Instructions. They had taken out this long narrow strip from the barony of O'Neiland West, and this projection from Upper Fews, and by that means they had rendered the division practically impervious to the

Nationalists; whereas, as it originally stood, the Nationalists had a fair chance of carrying the county. This gentleman, Major Macpherson, put forward similar excuses for his operations in the barony of Tiranny and the barony of Orior; but all his precious excuses were simply so much "bosh." The evident object of Major Macpherson was to make such a boundary as would give the Tory Party an additional seat. He would like to tell the right hon. Baronet that this was a more serious matter for the peace of the North of Ireland than he seemed to think. There would be more heads broken over these jerrymandering schemes, more lives would ultimately be lost in election fights, and there would be more danger and difficulty in preserving the peace of Ireland, than by any modern invention of Her Majesty's Government. And why? Because in several counties—Donegal, Tyrone, Armagh, and Derry, the constituencies in more than one instance had been so manipulated as to make the balance of Parties pretty nearly equal. Future elections, therefore, would be scenes of the most frightful tumult; passions on each side would be strung up to the highest pitch of intensity; the Orange Lodges would issue their mandates, and the other side would be equally energetic, so that when the election came both Parties would be strung up to an extraordinary pitch of excitement, and it was highly probable that when the two Parties were running neck and neck some most deplorable occurrence would take place. It was much to be regretted that the Government should have placed this blister upon the North of Ireland. He did not complain, in the least degree, of the Tory Party getting their due proportion of seats in Ulster. They were certain to have had that under ordinary circumstances. They would have had their due proportion of seats under the original scheme of the Boundary Commissioners; but now they would have at least three or four seats they would otherwise never have been entitled to. The Catholic population of Armagh amounted to 47 per cent; and to give the Orangemen two seats out of three, under those circumstances, was to give a tremendous preponderance to the Tory Party. No doubt the Tory Party considered themselves extremely clever in having brought about these arrangements; but it still remained to be seen which Party in Ulster would be allowed to derive most benefit from them. It was certain that whenever the Nationalists felt themselves aggrieved, they would still be able to sway the balance of power as regarded Liberal and Tory; and they would take good care to use it to the best advantage to themselves, and against the other side, whichever it might be. He had made this protest not with the hope of inducing the Government to assent to the Amendment he proposed to submit. He knew that they had sworn to the Marquess of Salisbury that those divisions should be constituted as they were set forth in the Bill; but he believed that it would be found necessary, in a few years, to pass another Bill for the purpose of arranging those divisions, and the Irish Members, therefore, intended to place their protest against the present measure on record, so that it should not be said that, as far as they were concerned, those divisions had been allowed to go by default. As a matter of fact, Her Majesty's Government had only extended the franchise to one set of people, because their electoral arrangements would be such that it would be quite impossible for the National and popular Party in Ulster to obtain the number of Members they were justly entitled to. The consequence would be that in future they would only have a bogus representation of Ulster opinion in the House of Commons. Perhaps he might be told by the right hon. Baronet that the Tory Party were extremely indignant at some of the divisions recommended by the Commissioners; but he should like to know what they had to be indignant at? He would like to know what they could propose which would make things worse than they were for the Nationalists, or better for themselves? Could they suggest any division of Armagh, or of any other county, which would give them greater advantage than they would obtain under the provisions of the present Bill? He would defy the Tory Party to produce out of any county in Ulster better provisions for themselves than were to be found in the present Bill. They knew very well that the Whig and Tory Party had held a conference in that House. They had met for the purpose of putting pressure upon the Government in order to make the provisions better for themselves; but having met and considered the matter, they found that it was physically impossible to suggest any division of Ulster which would give them a single seat beyond what the present Bill gave them. He would freely make the Tory Party a present of any division of the Province of Ulster which they could make for their own purposes in a better way than the divisions already laid out for them. He could only say that the experience they had now gained of Major Macpherson, and of the other gentlemen upon the Commission who had been appointed to see fair play between the two Parties, completely proved to them that the Catholics and Nationalists of Ireland, and especially in Ulster, could place no reliance whatever on the bona fides of the Government, and that the Commissioners, like the agents appointed under the Land Act, were simply the nominees of the Orange Lodges in Ireland?

Amendment proposed,

In page 91, line 16, to leave out from the word "and," to the word "Tullymore," in line 23, inclusive, and insert the words "The barony of O'Neill West (except parishes of Armagh, Grange, Kildarton, and Mullaghbrack)."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that, as the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), in introducing the case of Armagh, had touched upon the religious question in that county between the Catholics and Protestants, it would be as well that, in answer to the remarks of the hon. and learned Member, he should place the exact figures upon that subject before the Committee. The total population of the county was 157,000, of whom 72,000 were Catholics and 85,000 almost exclusively Protestants. Now, the Northern portion of the county was predominantly Protestant, and the Southern predominantly Catholic. The hon. and learned Member was right in his supposition that that was, to some extent, a matter which had guided the arrangement of the county divisions. It was only natural to find that there would be a majority of Protestants in the Northern Division, and a majority of Catholics in the Southern Division; and no doubt the Committee would expect to find that the numbers were pretty equally divided in the Mid Division. As a matter of fact, there were in the Mid Division 22,000 Catholics, and 21,000 who were exclusively Protestants. He, therefore, did not think that any conclusion could be drawn from the figures in regard to Catholics versus Protestants, to which the hon. and learned Member had referred. There was another point to which it was necessary to refer before he came to the main argument of the hon. and learned Member. The hon. and learned Member had spoken of Armagh being unduly favoured in its number of Members. It would have three Members, and it stood exactly in the middle of the list of counties having three Members, so far as its population was concerned—among those counties being Buckinghamshire, Berkshire, Warwickshire, and the East Riding of Yorkshire. Therefore, there was not much in that point. The hon. and learned Member complained that Dublin was only allowed two Members. But there was no special grievance in that respect in Ireland, because throughout the whole country hardships had been inflicted in that way, which were quite as patent as in Ireland. Putting that matter aside, and adverting to the main argument of the hon. and learned Member, this Amendment was to restore the original proposal of the Boundary Commissioners. Of course, it was rather tempting to the Committee, at first sight, to be reminded of the original proposal of the Commissioners; but when that proposal first came out, it was bitterly attacked as having been proposed, to use the words of The Freeman's Journal, "in utter ignorance." To a great extent, he admitted that that was the fact. The map did not show the actual configuration of the country, and, therefore, did not convey the necessary information.

MR. HEALY remarked that the original proposal—the only portion attacked—was the scheme for the county of Donegal.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that very little turned upon the precise application of the words he had referred to; but he would remind the Committee that in the case of the original schemes of the Boundary Commissioners in England there was hardly an instance in which they had been rigidly adhered to. In some cases they had created as much feeling as appeared to have been produced in Ireland. For instance, the other night the hon. Member for Perthshire (Sir Donald Currie) made a somewhat plaintive appeal in regard to the division of Perthshire, on the ground that the manner in which the county had been divided would jeopardize the interests of the Liberal Party. But that was not the real matter for the Committee to consider, although similar objections had been put forward in connection with Cornwall and other places, as well as Perthshire, and large additions had been made to the original scheme of the Commissioners. The case of Staffordshire, also, was a very strong case; and there were others in which the original schemes had been subjected to what some persons considered an improvement, whereas, in the opinion of others, they had been rendered worse. The question of Armagh turned entirely upon the constitution of the Mid Division of the county, and upon whether Tanderagee should be included. If any hon. Member would look at the map, he would see that the proposed Mid Armagh Division was a much more natural and simple-looking division than the division originally proposed. It commended itself more to the eye; and he was also informed, by the proceedings at the local inquiry, that the Commissioners, having the map before them, came to an impartial conclusion. To have turned Tanderagee into the Eastern Division would have been a very artificial arrangement. The Commissioners, in their original scheme, were, no doubt, guided by some Return in reference to population, to which the hon. and learned Member had fairly and frankly referred, but which turned out to be erroneous. There was an important mistake made, the result of which was to give a discrepancy in the population of the Northern Division, so that it became necessary to include part of the district in the Mid Division. That had been done by transferring certain parishes, both from the North and South, to the Mid Division. No doubt, the Conservative Party, when before the Commissioners, applied for certain things to be done which had been done; but there were other things for which they asked which had not been conceded;

[Sixteenth Night.]

and, among other things, they urged that the district of O'Neilland should be put in the Southern Division. They further wanted to transfer two other districts to the Mid Division, which the Commissioners also refused. The Commissioners were of opinion that the amended scheme, besides being larger in population, provided in a better way for the pursuits of the population; but the equalization of the population was certainly the main reason why it was put forward. Throughout Ireland the Commissioners had endeavoured to make the county divisions equal, as far as possible, in respect of population. They certainly would have been charged with unfairness in their distribution of the population if they had not endeavoured to make each division as equal in population as possible. In England the Commissioners had endeavoured to accomplish the same object; and, no doubt, in some cases, where they had tried to equalize the population, there had been strong opposition on the part of hon. Members to the proposals put forward. He might instance the county of Cambridge in reference to the Isle of Ely, and also Lincolnshire.

MR. HEALY said, there was no parallel between those cases and that of Armagh.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the population of Lincolnshire and Cambridgeshire was very similar in its pursuits to that of Armagh. The Commissioners had endeavoured to pay deference to local sentiment; and, for all the reasons he had mentioned, he did not think it was desirable to disturb the arrangement as set forth in the Bill.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, there was one point in connection with this subject on which he desired to express his opinion. The hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) took upon himself to assume that the whole of the Catholic population of Armagh would vote for the Nationalist Party, and that a large proportion of the members of other denominations would also vote for them. Now, he begged to repudiate in the strongest terms that idea of the hon. and learned Member. He believed that there was amongst the Catholic population of Ireland a very large body of loyal men, thoroughly devoted to the Union with this country, and thoroughly devoted to law and order. He wanted the Committee to understand, speaking with knowledge on the subject, that there was not the slightest ground for supposing that the Roman Catholics would go with the Party represented by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy)—the Party which was seeking for separation from this country.

MR. SEXTON said, he would only observe, with reference to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member who had just spoken, that the interests of political Parties and the unity desired by some hon. Gentlemen in respect of different parts of the Empire was not likely to be served by attempts to cheat any section of the people. Political unity could be best preserved by showing the people of all grades that they were fairly treated by that House, and that no question of creed would be permitted to exclude them from their just share in the politics of the nation. He held that the scheme of the Bill in the present case did not do that; it excluded them from their fair share of political influence. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken had come to the conclusion that the Catholics in Ireland would vote in a solid mass as against the Nationalists, who, he implied, would not have a single Catholic vote behind them. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had had some experience—he made the remark in no invidious sense—but he would suggest to the hon. and gallant Gentleman that his political expulsion from the county of Sligo in 1880 was due to the fact that he had not a solid majority behind him. [Colonel KING-HARMAN: I had the Protestant vote behind me.] The Protestant vote was broken up into two portions. His (Mr. Sexton's) view of the question of creed in reference to the county of Armagh was that the National Party would have behind them a solid Catholic vote—and not only that, but also that of an intelligent section of the Protestants in Ireland. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had spoken of the Mid Armagh Division, and had described the division now proposed as being more symmetrical than that which appeared in the first scheme of the Commissioners. He (Mr. Sexton) said that the first scheme had

this recommendation—that it observed the instruction to have regard to the boundaries of Unions in existing areas. The original scheme of the Commissioners for the County of Armagh proposed to preserve the integrity of the barony boundaries—the North Division was composed of three baronies, with four parishes taken out; the Mid Division of several baronies, with five parishes added; and the Southern Division of three baronies, with one parish taken out. Therefore, the scheme should be acceptable from the point of view of those who wished to save expense in the revision of the electoral rolls, and who wished to give the public the convenience of well-known areas. But the final scheme of the Commissioners which the Government sought to press upon them was very different in character, and went against the instruction as to well-known areas. The list before him showed that the North Division was composed of one-half of a barony and part of another; in the case of the second division, not only were baronies cut up, but there was a string of names in one barony so long and complicated that it would be folly to endeavour to convey to the Committee by any reference to those complicated areas any idea of the merits or demerits of the scheme adopted by the Commissioners. The right hon. Baronet had referred to the question of creed, and said that in the Mid Division of Armagh there were 23,000 Catholics and 28,000 Protestants there. He (Mr. Sexton) should not mention the name of Catholic or Protestant in this debate, because he held that future political action in Ireland would not be governed or found to be materially influenced by any difference of creed. The plea taken up by the Tory Party was that Protestants, as such, were entitled to have separate representation in Ireland, and he emphasized that plea, which he (Mr. Sexton) rejected, as having no reference to the question. The Commissioners found there would be no use in jerrymandering the Northern Division of Armagh, where the Catholic majority was 20,000, or the Southern Division, where the Catholic majority was 12,000. Now, in the Mid Division the Catholics and Protestants under the original scheme were about equally divided, and there was a chance at first that the Nationalists would have what the Americans called “a fair show” in that division without running to extremes. The right hon. Baronet said that when the first scheme was devised the Commissioners had no local knowledge. But he held, on the contrary, that the first scheme of the Commissioners was more suited than their final scheme to the natural features of the county, because by the final scheme they had taken from Mid Armagh a great part of the barony of Lower Fews, and by so doing they had not only violated the instruction which directed them to have regard to the boundaries of well-known areas, but had also overlapped the great natural boundary of the division, and thrown the electors of Fews into a division with which they had no kind of interest. What was the result? The Commissioners, by disregarding the practical considerations which ought to have guided them, had produced a district which contained 25,000 Catholics and 28,000 Protestants; and they had done it by a treble operation. It was all nonsense to tell them that the Commissioners had made that change out of any regard for their Instructions. No question as to the pursuits of the people arose in reference to the county of Armagh, except in a part of the Northern Division. There were some small manufactories in Newry and in the Northern Division; but they were of so trifling a character as to be unworthy of observation. The pursuits of the people were for all practical purposes agricultural, and the fraction of them engaged in manufactures of any kind outside the town of Newry was so small as not to be appreciable, and such as certainly did not entitle them to consideration on an occasion like the present. Now, what was the character of the treble operation he had referred to? First, half of the barony of Lower Fews had been put away from the Mid Division. That was to say, the Catholic people of Lower Fews were not allowed to remain in the division of Mid Armagh, where they would have produced that equality of population which, in their opinion, would have given them a fair chance at an election. Therefore they were cut off from the Mid Division, not because there was any difference in the pursuits of the two portions of the barony—not because any considerations of boundary made it necessary, and not because the arrangement was dictated by the natural features of the country—for the pursuits of the people were identical—the boundaries had to be broken to meet the exigencies of the scheme, and for the same reason mountains had been over-leaped. What were the other alterations to be made? Two districts of opposite composition were taken—the one from the South, the other from the North—and thrown into the Mid Division of Armagh. Thus, where the Catholics had a chance they were cut off from their natural division of the county. And when he saw that one alteration threw out a large body of the Catholic people, and that the other brought in two Protestant populations—when he saw that the Catholics had been brought down to 25,000, and the Protestants left in a majority of 28,000—then, he said, it was apparent that Major Macpherson, in spite of the plausible plea in his Report, was influenced by no other motive than that of gratifying the desire of the agents of the landlord class who appeared before him, to give to them not only the North but also the Mid Division of the county of Armagh. The hon. and learned Gentleman who opened this debate invited the Committee to consider what would be the political effect of this at the next General Election. Well, the people of Armagh would probably remember then the two schemes of the Commissioners, and that the first scheme was not an unfair one—the scheme which the Commissioners drew while they were impartial, when they were in Dublin and consulted the maps of the county, and the barony boundaries, and the Census Returns, and before they came to consider the question of creeds; and the Catholic people would remember what occurred when the Commissioners went down to the county—that an Orange attorney, a Grand Master of an Orange Lodge, who would himself be a candidate at the next election in Armagh, appeared before the Commissioners and dictated to them a scheme the essential parts of which they accepted. The Catholic people would remember that at the dictation of this Orange attorney a great body of Catholic electors were thrown out of the division with which their rights and their interests were connected. The whole effect and purpose of this elaborate farce called an inquiry was simply to throw dust into the eyes of the people. He was convinced that its result would be the production of feelings destructive of the harmony which ought to exist amongst people of different creeds; that the change made from the original scheme of the Commissioners which Irish Members desired to maintain would not have the effect which the Government intended, and that the Nationalist Party at the next General Election would be able to say to them that they had tried to be dishonest and failed.

Mr. KENNY said, the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke), in his argument against the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), had stated that the Catholic voters in South Armagh outnumbered the Protestant voters as largely as the Protestant voters in the North Division of the county. But the case was the very reverse of what he had stated, and it followed that a serious injustice would be done to the people of the county of Armagh. The Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan was one which, in his judgment, ought to commend itself to the Committee, because it simplified the scheme of the Commissioners. In the scheme of the Commissioners which had been submitted to Parliament and adopted by the Government a number of divisions were proposed with boundaries never before known outside the localities. They proposed to divide localities and towns; and under this scheme it would be a most perplexing and difficult thing for persons resident in the county of Armagh to know in which division of the county they would be registered as voters. He observed that in the North Division of Armagh it was proposed to divide six parishes and about 20 towns, a course which he thought would be most inconvenient and perplexing in its effect. He contended that the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend would be infinitely superior to the scheme of the Commissioners which the Government had adopted, inasmuch as it proposed to adhere to the old boundaries known in the county for hundreds of years. Again, his hon. and learned Friend's scheme, as against that of the Government in respect of the Northern Division, was much more advantageous, because the scheme of the Commissioners was more complex in respect of North Armagh than South Armagh. The Commissioners had adopted baronial lines only in two instances, whereas they proposed to divide parishes and town-lands in 50 cases at least. Now, his hon. and learned Friend proposed to follow the baronial lines all through, except in one instance. He felt confident that if the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), or whichever Member of the Government remained in charge of the Bill, would consider the remarks he had made, and compare the relative merits of the two schemes, he would be forced to admit that the scheme of his hon. and learned Friend had advantages which were apparent. He could not understand how it was that the Commissioners had departed so very much from the original scheme which they put forward, and which was almost identical with the scheme now proposed. He did not intend to make any remarks upon the relative strength of population in the three divisions; but he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill from a geographical stand-point, and say, that whatever the result might be this scheme of the Commissioners was bad in itself, and ought not, therefore, to be accepted by the Committee.

MR. TREVELYAN admitted that hon. Gentlemen had argued the case very quietly and fairly, though the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), warming to the subject, had said that by the scheme of the Commissioners an injustice was done which would be remembered by the electors of Armagh for generations to come. He thought, however, that the arguments with which the hon. Member supported that view would hardly have produced that amount of lasting indignation in the minds of the inhabitants of Armagh. The hon. Gentleman had said that in one of the divisions of Armagh the Protestants—he (Mr. Trevelyan) was bound to use that division of the population as it had been used throughout—had an overwhelming majority, that in another division the Catholics had an overwhelming majority, and that the balance of Parties was in the Central Division. He said, also, that two additions were made by the Commissioners in their revised scheme to the Central Division, both of them consisting of an infusion of Protestants, and that there was one deduction from the division which was notoriously one of the Catholic population. The hon. Member spoke of the three operations as being all equally unacceptable from his point of view; but the hon. Member himself must allow that it was necessary to make an addition to Mid Armagh. The Commissioners had, in their original scheme, made an incorrect calculation to the extent of 6,000—the population of Mid Armagh was short by 6,000, and the population of North Armagh was excessive by 6,000. In order to bring up the population of Mid Armagh to its proper level it was evidently necessary to take the excess population from North Armagh. The hon. Member could not deny that, and that at once accounted for the great effusions of Protestants to which the hon. Member objected. That brought them to the question of the inclusion of Kildarton on the one hand, and the exclusion of Lower Fews on the other. The hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny), speaking of the North and South Divisions, had said that there was a considerable majority of Protestants in the one and of Catholics in the other; and, speaking of the third division, he had said Protestants and Catholics were in about equal proportion. The statement of the hon. Gentleman must not be taken too literally, because the proportion of Catholics to Protestants in the South was as two to one, whereas in the North the proportion of Protestants to Catholics was as 12 to 5. As to the inclusion of Kildarton in Mid Armagh, it must be borne in mind that the Commissioners were governed by two things—they were governed to a certain extent by the wishes of the population, and to a very much greater extent by the pursuits of the people. On that point they spoke very decidedly. They stated that the Northern Division included considerable industrial towns, and that in the central part of the county there were considerable though smaller industrial populations. In their description of Mid Armagh they stated that there were many flax mills, and that the district they had included in the North was more identical with the pursuits of the Northern than the Southern part of the county. The Southern part of the county, they said, was entirely agricultural. The determination of the Commissioners was suggested by the pursuits of the population. Now, as to the indignation which this arrangement would create in Armagh or elsewhere, he must say he thought the inhabitants of Armagh would admit, when they came to consider the matter coolly, that the general result of the arrangement would be to give fair and proportional representation to the county, though a slight advantage might be given to the Protestants. Turning from the question of population, he thought that anyone who looked at the map would acknowledge that no county was more naturally and sensibly divided than Armagh. North Armagh consisted of the genuine Northern part of the county; Mid Armagh was the middle of the county, and South Armagh was not only the Southern part of the county, but it was the Southern part of the county which, from its physical appearance, bore the marks of being homogeneous. He had studied very carefully the statistics of the relative populations—Catholic and Protestant—in the different counties of Ireland; and he was certainly very much struck by the manner in which the probable electoral advantages would be distributed between those counties. He believed that result had been attained by the Commissioners following the admirably clear and perfectly impartial Instructions which were laid down in their charter of appointment. He was satisfied that any slight advantage which the Protestants might have obtained in Armagh would be compensated for in other counties; and he could not but believe that the expressions of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) about the action of the Commissioners would, on the whole, be found to be as exaggerated as the counter charges brought against Catholics in other divisions.

Mr. HEALY said, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) had referred to counter charges. Who brought them?

Mr. TREVELYAN said, he referred to other counties in which complaints were made.

Mr. HEALY said, that, unfortunately for the contention of the right hon. Gentleman, the only case in which it was proposed to change a division of Ulster was that of Fermanagh. The noble Viscount the Member for Fermanagh (Viscount Orichton) was the only person of distinction in the Conservative Party who proposed to make a change in a division. The hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce) attempted to get another Member for Derry; but that was another matter. The noble Viscount was the only person who had any fault to find with any division in Ulster. But in Fermanagh there were 55 per cent of Catholics; therefore the noble Viscount's proposal was absurd. When the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) attempted to ride off on the pretence that some of the Tory Party objected to this scheme, he could not have examined the Amendments which had been put upon the Paper. The right hon. Gentleman said that the divisions had been arrived at because the Commissioners followed the admirable, clear, and impartial Instructions of the Lord Lieutenant. Why, the complaint of the Irish Members was that the Commissioners had not followed the Lord Lieutenant's Instructions; and in no county were there more glaring or more bare-faced instances of a disregard of those Instructions than in Armagh. One of the Instructions of His Excellency was—

"Subject to this important rule, each division shall be as compact as possible with respect to geographical position, and shall be based upon well-known existing areas such as baronies, townlands," &c.

In the original scheme regard was had to well-known existing areas; but in the scheme adopted parishes and townlands had been split up. Armagh afforded a very gross case. In some cases where jerrymandering had been resorted to something like decency had been observed; but there were more gross cases of splitting up baronies and even parishes in Armagh than in any other county in Ireland. It would have been bad enough if the Commissioners had split up baronies; but they had not been content with that, for they had split up parishes, a thing which had only been done in one other county—namely, Tyrone. If that was such a fine and delicate matter, he would like to know why it was, if Mid Armagh was short originally, it was now 2,000 plus—the population of Mid Armagh was now 2,000 more than that of South Armagh, and 1,000 more than that of North Armagh? It was this 2,000 which made all the difference; for there were in the district exactly 2,000 more Protestants than Catholics. The arrangement was so beautiful that it was to be admired. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) had said the Commissioners had had regard to the pursuits of the population. The Irish Members did not believe it. The right hon. Gentleman made his remarks, of course, in good faith; but he had had nothing to do with the arrangement of the divisions. He (Mr. Healy) could understand the Government saying—"We appointed as Commissioners men of character and of the greatest ability; we entrusted them with plenary powers; and we promised the Marquess of Salisbury we would stick to everything they did." That was the defence one Minister had made. But another Minister had said that in the arrangement of the boundaries the Commissioners had had regard to the pursuits of the population, while a third Minister had said—"Oh, this barony had too much, and this had too little." It was appalling to think the Irish Members had been treated in this manner, night after night, under the pretence of fairness. When the Government insisted upon adding hypocrisy to their other sins, it was a little more than he and his hon. Friends could stand. Reference had been made by an hon. and gallant Gentleman above the Gangway that the Party led by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) relied on the Catholics, but could not rely on the Protestants. Why, he (Mr. Healy) would not be in the House if he had not received many Protestant votes. The Catholics of Monaghan did not command a majority on the electoral roll when he was elected; but he was elected by a majority of 365 votes. It was nonsense to talk about religious denominations. It was like the Pyrenees—it no longer divided the people, and the Government would find that out before long. The Government had made two populations, one having a very narrow majority; they had thrown such a bone of contention into Ulster by this jerrymandering scheme that at the next General Election they would be required, in all probability, to incur an outlay of £100,000 for extra police. All the Orangemen were armed, and Party riots and tumults would occur. By this scheme a virulent poison was put into the bowels of Ulster; and at every General Election until the Nationalists got the upper hand, as they would, there would be disorders and tumults. Every one of the Ulster counties, one after another, would drop into the National phalanx. The fact that in the next Parliament there would be 85 Nationalists returned would be a great magnet to the people of Ulster. They would not care to be left out in the cold, and therefore they would flock to the one fold. He trusted the Government would see the propriety of making the arrangements in County Armagh provisional until it was seen which Party got the upper hand. If it was seen that the Nationalists gained the ascendancy let them have the advantage; if the Tories gained that position let them have the advantage. He and his hon. Friends objected to have their baronies and parishes—Lower and Upper Orior, Lower and Upper Fews, and O'Neiland West—split up contrary altogether to the Instructions of the Lord Lieutenant. Finally, let him point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan), who had said that in the original scheme there was in one division an overplus of 6,000, that the Nationalist Party proposed a scheme which would have equalized the population without touching the baronies to the same extent as the Commissioners had done; and it was a very remarkable thing that the Commissioners, in their Report to Parliament, omitted all reference to that scheme. It was scarcely fair to the Nationalists. The pledge was obtained from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) that he would present a Paper showing the reasons why the Commissioners made alterations in the original schemes respecting the counties of Armagh, Donegal, Kerry, and Tyrone, and the City of Dublin. It was very strange that in that Paper there was no mention of the fact that a scheme which would have equalized the population without cutting up the baronies was laid before the Commissioners by the Nationalists.

Mr. PLUNKET said, the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) seemed rather to call upon someone on the Conservative Benches to enter into this debate. He (Mr. Plunket) did not wish to enter into the discussion in a more heated or controversial spirit than was absolutely necessary. The hon. and learned Member had challenged the Opposition why they did not put down Amendments in the same proportion that he and his hon. Friends had done. There was one very good reason to be given for it; and that was that in order to give the Amendment which the hon. and learned Member had put down, in this instance, a colour of support, the hon. and learned Member had been obliged, with all his great ability and ingenuity, to have recourse to the most extraordinary series of arguments he (Mr. Plunket) ever heard. Amongst other things the hon. and learned Gentleman had said there was a meeting of Whigs and Tories, and they tried to invent some more favourable scheme; but they had to give up the task as impossible. There might have been such a meeting; but he could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that that was the first time he had heard of it. Well, what was another ground on which the hon. and learned Gentleman objected to the Commissioners' scheme? He said it was a violent attempt to produce something like equality in the various parts of Ulster, and that if they succeeded in doing that they would pour a most deadly poison into the bowels of the Province. He (Mr. Plunket) did not understand what was the alternative the hon. and learned Gentleman suggested, because it was perfectly plain that if they were not to equalize, as far as they could, the Protestant and Catholic populations, they must give preponderance to one or the other. If they were to give preponderance, to which Party ought it to be given? He should say to that Party which was, on the whole, in a majority. According to the reasoning of the hon. and learned Member, it was the duty of the Commissioners to give the preponderance to the Protestants, who were in a very considerable majority in the county. He did not think that argument, if the effect he had stated were given to it, would be exceedingly satisfactory to most of the hon. Member's Friends. The fact of the matter was that there was a very plain and good reason given by the Commissioners for what they had done, a reason not resting on any question of equalizing the Protestant or Catholic populations. The Commissioners reported—

"In this particular instance we have been obliged to depart from the ordinary process of going by boundaries of baronies and parishes, because in this particular county some of the baronies are very irregular in shape, and parishes in a great many cases overlap the boundaries, so we must fall back on the town-land areas to a considerable extent, so as to get the divisions as compact as possible, and containing populations as nearly equal and as similar in pursuits as possible."

They went on to say that in each of the three divisions they had succeeded in making the boundaries compact. He submitted that the Commissioners had not founded their decision on any such ground as that of giving preponderance to one Party or the other; and therefore the Committee were bound to support the conclusion arrived at.

Mr. SEXTON said, it was quite unnecessary for the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) to explain why his Party had not put down Amendments to the proposals of the Commissioners. The Tory Party had got all they could expect to get, therefore there was no reason why the right hon. and learned Gentleman should elaborately explain why that Party had not proposed to amend the scheme. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had suggested that as the Protestants were in a considerable majority in Armagh they ought to have two seats, and that the Catholics ought to be content with the one seat which remained. But wherever the Catholics had an overwhelming majority the same argument did not apply in the view of the Tory Party. No matter how small, how numerically trivial, the Protestant minority in any place might be, it was argued that they ought to have a Member. The argument which was considered very good by the co-religionists of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, when applied to the counties of Ulster, was considered by them worthless when it was applied to other counties of Ireland. After all, the Protestants had only a slight majority in Armagh—there were 72,000 Catholics and something over 80,000 Protestants. He thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman would agree with him that it would have been more absolutely fair, and more in accordance with the principles of equity, if his co-religionists—the Catholics—had had an equal chance in the Mid Division of the county. It was not fair that such a division should have been artificially procured as to give one creed a dominance, especially when the members of the two creeds in the division were ordinarily equal. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) had greatly simplified the case. He had argued the matter with a frankness which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) might be inclined to call excessive. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy had said that it was necessary to equalize the population, and to have regard to the pursuits of the people, and had pleaded those two facts in justification of the scheme now before the Committee. What did he say to the arrangement of his (Mr. Sexton's) hon. and learned Friend? It was true that the middle division would have 6,000 less of a population than the upper division in the scheme of the Commissioners. Why, then, in order to adjust the balance, had they started by taking a number out of the middle division? An easy way to adjust the balance of population would have been to take 3,000 people out of the Northern Division, there being a difference of 6,000 between the Northern and the middle. But that would not have answered the purpose. It was necessary to take a great number of Catholics, and he, therefore, said that in the alleged pursuit of equality of population the Commissioners had been guilty of a manifest absurdity, for in order to increase the population of a division they had taken a large population out of it. He challenged contradiction when he said that such manufactures as there were in Armagh did not exist in the Northern Division and in Newry. Except in Newry, the North Armagh manufactures did not exist in any part of the county. North Armagh was a manufacturing division, and Mid Armagh was agricultural. The principle of the identity of pursuits of the population had been flagrantly outraged. The Government took a large body of artisans out of the only artisan division of the county, and threw them in amongst the farmers, with whom they had no community of interest, and in like manner they took farmers from agricultural districts and threw them amongst artisans.

Mr. SMALL said, he was glad to have the opportunity of taking part in the discussion, as he possessed an intimate local knowledge of the county of Armagh, and, moreover, had the advantage of having been present at the boundary inquiry held by Major Macpherson. When the original boundary scheme for the county was issued, it was generally considered a very fair one. It divided only one barony, O'Neiland West—which from its large size would have to be intersected, and very slightly another. The Commissioners stated that the population of the Northern Division would be 55,083, of the Mid Division 51,166, and of the Southern Division 51,033. However, at the inquiry it was announced that the Commissioners had made a serious error in stating these figures, and that they ought to have been for North Armagh 56,233, for Mid Armagh 49,966, and for South Armagh 51,033. There would, therefore, have been a difference of 6,267 between the highest and lowest division, and it became necessary to make some alteration in the scheme. At the inquiry he (Mr. Small) had proposed an alteration to equalize the population, which would have necessitated the transfer of parts of two parishes only—the transfer of the part of Loughgall which lay in the barony of O'Neiland West and had a population of 3,302, from North Armagh to Mid Armagh, and the transfer of the part of Mullaghbrack, in the same barony, with a population of 1,339, from Mid Armagh to South Armagh. These changes would not have divided any baronies beyond those intersected in the original scheme, and they would have left the populations of the three divisions as follows:—North Armagh 52,931, Mid Armagh 51,929, and South Armagh 52,372. The Conservatives proposed an utterly absurd scheme, which would have intersected no less than six baronies out of a total of eight. Now, what had the Boundary Commissioners done in the revised scheme, for the division of the county? They had divided four baronies and seven parishes. In dividing two of those parishes they had adhered to barony lines which already intersected those parishes; but in dividing the remaining five they had not done that, but had actually divided the parishes by town-

lands, and that although some of those parishes laid in two baronies. They had joined together parts of the county which had no connection, either legal, business, or social, with each other, and people who had no interests in common. As regarded the question of equality of population, the plan which he (Mr. Small) put forward at the inquiry would have left a difference of 1,002 people between the highest and lowest division, the Commissioners left a difference of 2,213. Then, as to compactness, the Commissioners had framed the Mid Division so that a line drawn due North and North through it at a certain point would be about 15 miles long; but a line due North and South, a couple of miles east of that point, would be only about four miles long. It might be considered that Lurgan and Portadown would be the principal political centres in the North Division, Armagh City in the Mid Division, and Newry in the South Division; yet the Commissioners had put into the South Division some places which were about three and a-half miles from Armagh and 12 miles from Newry. The parish of Lisnadil seemed to have been particularly hardly treated. It laid in two baronies, and had now been so cut and carved that it was almost impossible to know, at first sight, in which division any townland was. In one case the Commissioners had transferred the four townlands of Cashel, Foley, Segahan, and Ballymacnabb from Mid to South Armagh. They were very near to Armagh City in the Armagh Union, and Armagh was their market town. It was rather curious that in three of those there was not a single Protestant householder, and in the fourth very few. He presented some days ago a Petition, which he understood was signed by every householder in the four townlands, protesting against the change. The Commissioners at first put the entire barony of Lower Orior into the Southern Division. Now, they had put into the Middle Division that very considerable portion of the barony which was comprised in the parishes of Kilmore and Ballymore. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Trevelyan) had said that the Commissioners stated that the Tanderagee district, which consisted of Kilmore and Ballymore, was connected with the North of the county. Then, why did they not put it into the Northern Division? Along the Eastern side of the county and through this district there ran, from North to South, the Great Northern Railway, which gave the people facilities of direct access to Lurgan and Portadown in the North, and to Newry in the South. Anyone from the district desiring to go to the City of Armagh had to make a considerable detour by rail, or else to drive by road across the entire county. The Commissioners had taken this district from the South, with which it had some connection and direct intercourse. They had not added it to the North, with which it had also some connection and direct intercourse; but they had added it to the Middle Division, with which it had not any connection or intercourse whatever. He (Mr. Small) had presented Petitions from almost every parish in the county which was affected by the alterations in the boundaries, complaining of them. He was not aware that any Petitions had been presented on the opposite side. In fact, arguments to insert in any such Petitions could not have been found. He did not see any Ulster Members present who would oppose the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy); and he hoped the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill would accept it.

MR. BIGGAR said, the discussion had spread over a very considerable amount of space in point of time, and also a very considerable amount of space in the way of argument. As to the influences which were supposed to have been brought to bear upon the Boundary Commissioners, and also as to what ought to be the decision of the Committee, he thought himself that it was rather unfortunate—indeed, that it was very unfortunate—that the Committee should be called upon to decide a question of this sort on the ground of the religious Parties who were affected by the boundaries of the particular divisions. But, at the same time, he thought it was legitimate, for the opponents of the scheme as it now stood, to endeavour to find out some reason why the Boundary Commissioners had changed the plans so very much from those originally supplied to them as the provisional proposition upon which to base their inquiry. He wished to say this—that he had had an opportunity of seeing the boundaries, not of very many counties in Ireland, but of some of them, and that he thought the original plans were superior in point of impartiality and sound judgment to the boundaries which were ultimately decided upon. He said that because he thought the reason was that the parties who drew up the plans originally were the Ordnance Survey officers, who had practical and great personal knowledge of the maps of those places—and not only of the maps, but also of the natural configuration of the land. They knew what the real boundaries ought to be very much better than anyone could who simply took their views from the plan of the Surveys, such as hon. Members were obliged to do, by means of the information supplied them for their guidance. He believed the great complaint in connection with the decision the Boundary Commissioners had come to in connection with this county of Armagh was that they entirely ignored the written Instructions given to them by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The Instructions of the Lord Lieutenant were that so far as possible the Boundary Commissioners should conform to the local boundaries, baronial parishes, and town lands. They had not the power to divide the town lands, but they had the power to divide other districts. He must say that the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had seemed to him to very much undervalue the importance of a barony in Ireland as a local description of a particular district, and for this reason. They knew that in Ireland a barony was a local area, which was especially used for taxation purposes by the Grand Juries—for laying on the taxation in respect to new roads, new bridges, and so forth. Nothing was more common than to lay a particular rate upon a particular barony, and in other places to levy it on the county at large. So that, in point of fact, the baronies were important areas in connection with the taxation of Ireland and in connection with the local county government of Ireland as it at present existed. More than that, they had bodies of local taxpayers in Ireland who met together in the baronies to decide upon certain local repairs to be effected, and which were afterwards authorized by the Grand Juries. Those baronies were much more important areas than the right hon. Baronet and the Government seemed to think them, or that Major Macpherson had seemed to think them. As a matter of fact, Major Macpherson seemed to know very little about the wishes of the Irish people in the counties. The Instructions of the Lord Lieutenant had been so flagrantly set at defiance in this instance that they had good reason to ask why the Boundary Commissioners had so acted. The only explanation they could arrive at was that Major Macpherson had adopted the course he pursued in order to favour one particular party at the expense of another. If the boundaries had been impartially drawn up, nobody would have known anything about the question of religion—certainly the Boundary Commissioners would have known nothing about it, and would not have taken it into account. As had been shown by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Small), in some places districts had been put in, and in other places taken out—place after place had been treated in that way in the county of Armagh—so as to reverse the effect of the original scheme. In districts where, if the original scheme had been adopted, there would have been a substantial majority of Catholics, alterations had been made, the result of which would be to give a substantial majority of non-Catholics. If it had not been that the Commissioners had investigated the religious opinions of the inhabitants, instead of acting altogether impartially, the result would have been much more favourable to the Nationalist Party. He did not himself value to a very enormous extent the difference between non-Catholics and Catholics, because they knew very well, as had been proved in the county of Monaghan by the fact that a large number of non-Catholics must have voted for the hon. and learned Member who at present sat for that county (Mr. Healy), that the Nationalist Party would get the votes of non-Catholics almost as readily as they got those of Catholics. What they had seen taking place at the Monaghan Election, no doubt would occur in other places. With regard to the hon. and gallant Gentleman who represented County Dublin (Colonel King-Harman), he now posed as anti-Catholic, anti-Home

Ruler, and anti-Nationalist; but he (Mr. Biggar) could remember the time when the hon. and gallant Gentleman was elected as a Home Ruler. He remembered that at the first great political meeting he (Mr. Biggar) had ever attended, the hon. and gallant Member was one of the leading speakers of the Nationalist Party. As to Irish land, he (Mr. Biggar) certainly held a very strong opinion that it would be extremely difficult to bring up a non-Catholic tenant farmer to vote against an Irish Nationalist, seeing the advantage he had to get from his support of the Nationalist Party compared with what was likely to result from his support of one or the other of the English Parties. But, be those things as they might, the fact still remained that the question of religion had been taken into account in the county of Armagh, and alterations had been made in the original scheme which should not have been made. The hon. Member for Wexford was the Coroner for one of the districts of the county, and he knew a great deal that the Committee was not acquainted with in regard to those particular transactions. He (Mr. Biggar) thought the Committee should be guided by such Gentlemen, for they had good opportunities of forming accurate opinions, and were well possessed of every local knowledge. He thought that they should agree to the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan, and show that the Committee was guided by strict rules of impartiality, and not by the principles which had evidently actuated Major Macpherson, and which had influenced him in his decisions when dealing with the county of Armagh.

MR. BIGGAR said, that in line 14 he wished to move to omit the word "The."

MR. WARTON said, that if he might be allowed, before that Question was put, he should like to protest against what took place that morning. Some hon. Members would, no doubt, remember the circumstances, which were these. After a great many hon. Gentlemen had left the House, particularly among the Tories and Liberals, that part of the Schedule affecting Antrim, and particularly those divisions in which the Conservative Members were most interested, had been considered. Liberal and Conservative Members, to whose absence he was referring, had gone away under the impression that the Committee would not proceed beyond the Scotch part of the Schedule, and that County Antrim, therefore, would not be considered. He wished to elicit now some sort of promise, pledge, or assurance from the Government that they would consult the wishes of those Members before Report as to the naming of the divisions. He did not know what names would be preferred by those hon. Members who, as he said, were most interested in the county of Antrim; at any rate, he did not wish that their silence should give consent to what had taken place that morning in their absence. He understood that some of those hon. Members were horrified that morning when they were informed as to what had taken place at the late Sitting some hours previously. The hon. Members for Carrickfergus (Mr. Greer) and Lisburn (Sir Richard Wallace) had been especially disgusted when they understood that the case of their county had been brought on, when they had been told that the Committee would not proceed beyond the Scotch part of the Schedule.

MR. CALLAN said, that if any answer to the censure now uttered by the hon. and learned Member upon the Government for proceeding with the Irish part of the Bill last night were necessary, it would be found in the condition of the Committee at that moment. Notwithstanding that full Notice had been given of the part of the Schedule which was to be considered, there was not a single Irish Tory or Whig Member present to object to the alterations. Though Notice had been given for a fortnight, there was not a single Irish Tory or Whig Member present, showing that those hon. Gentlemen had given it up as a bad game.

MR. HEALY said, that perhaps he might say, to ease the mind of the hon. and learned Member, that he (Mr. Healy) had taken the trouble to consult two hon. Members—namely, the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tipperary (Mr. J. O'Connor), who was also a Cork man, and a third, he himself (Mr. Healy)— being a Cork man—had carefully considered the question. The result of their meeting and consultation had been the Amendments that were put on the Paper. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman might feel perfectly sure that all scruples in the case had been met.

MR. WARTON said, he did not complain of that; but what he complained of was that the recommendations of the Commissioners in regard to Conservative districts had been extinguished in the absence of Conservative Members.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had answered the hon. and learned Gentleman on that point yesterday.

MR. WARTON said, the right hon. Baronet's answer had simply been that he had declared that he had privately intimated that it was his intention to proceed with the Schedule so far as it affected the county of Antrim. But the right hon. Baronet's public announcement had been that he should proceed with the Schedule until that part affecting Scotland had been disposed of. The private announcement was given after the public announcement.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that he had said what had taken place between himself and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket).

MR. WARTON again rose.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. and learned Member that he is entirely out of Order in the course he is adopting. He has addressed the Committee three times, although there is really no Question before it.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to move, on page 94, line 4, to leave out "Youghal," and insert "South-East Cork." He admitted that there was extreme difficulty in dealing with the divisions of Cork. The county consisted of seven divisions, and any hon. Member who had taken the trouble to examine the map would see that it was only after most mature consideration that the subject could be satisfactorily dealt with. A meeting of the Irish Party had been held upon the subject, and they had come to the conclusion that it was impossible to deal with the matter in any other way than that proposed in the Amendment.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he should have suggested a transposition.

The most Eastern part of Cork was in Youghal; therefore he should be inclined to call Youghal "East," and Bandon "South-East Cork." He would suggest that the hon. and learned Member should put down his Amendment for Report.

MR. HEALY said, it was quite immaterial to the Irish Members how that was done; but if the right hon. Baronet would consider the advisability of doing as was proposed, they would be satisfied. The right hon. Gentleman would, no doubt, see the reasonableness of the proposition.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that if the matter were discussed, it must be on a formal Motion. As yet the hon. and learned Member had not moved anything.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: We will discuss the matter privately.

MR. HEALY said, in moving the Amendment standing in his name, he wished to take the same course as he had taken in the case of the county of Armagh. He should confine himself to moving the omission of lines 5 to 10, inclusive, which embraced the names of the baronies and parishes which the Government proposed to include in the Northern Division of the county of Donegal, and it was upon that part of the Schedule that he would take the discussion. He regretted that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) was not in his place; but he would be extremely well represented during the discussion by the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), who, of course, took a deep interest in everything concerning the county of Donegal. He had to consider the way in which the Commissioners had dealt with constituencies in which Catholics were in the majority as compared with places in which they were in the minority. For his own part he was in favour of the fullest and fairest representation of all parties and all religions in the county; he thought the more fully they were represented the better it would be for the general interest. But a moment or two ago, on his Amendment in connection with Armagh, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) said that as the Protestants were in a large majority in

Armagh, surely it was only fair that they should have two seats out of the three that were given to the county, and that argument would have been admirable if a similar course were pursued in counties in which Catholics were in the majority. But let the Committee observe the way in which the Government dealt with the Irish counties. In every county in which Catholics were in the minority no representation had been given to them whatever except in the two instances where it could not be avoided—that was to say, in the county of Down, which had four Members, and in the county of Armagh, which had three. In the county of Antrim, where there were 55,000 Catholics, who were clearly entitled to a seat, there would be no Catholic representation at all; in Belfast, where the Catholics were in similar proportion, there would be no Catholic representation; and in Derry—the most shameful case of all—there would be neither Catholic nor Nationalist representation. In Donegal and Tyrone the most shameful jerryandering had been resorted to for the representation of the minority. They had heard a good deal from the noble Lord the other night, upon the debate about Liverpool, of the proposal to give special representation to Catholics—he “greatly deprecated the severing of the interest of Catholics from that of Protestants.” He (Mr. Healy) would remind the noble Lord of that now that they had come to discuss the case of Donegal. And what had the Commissioners done there? They had departed from all rules—geographical and common sense—as well as the Instructions of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, for the purpose of securing Protestant representation in one of the divisions of the county. He should not complain of that at all; he should rejoice to have his Protestant fellow-countrymen receive the fullest amount of representation in that House, provided the same rule were applied to Catholics. But there was no representation for them in Antrim, Belfast, and Derry, and only one out of three in Armagh. In Tyrone the Government had given two Representatives to the minority, although the Catholics were 75 per cent of the population, and, accepting the correction of the noble Lord, they were endeavouring to give the minority representation in the county of Donegal, where the Catholics were 76 per cent of the population. But why was that rule entirely departed from by the Government when they came to deal with Catholic minorities? Why was the Protestant minority in Donegal to be represented at the expense of everything in the shape of logic and common sense, and in spite of the Instructions of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland? The Instructions of Earl Spencer had been trampled under foot by the Commissioners wherever it was necessary to do it in order to give the Whigs or Tories a Member. The barony of Kilmacrenan, as was well known, fulfilled all the conditions entitling it to a Member, and in the first scheme of the Commissioners it was to have a Member allotted to it. He maintained that this barony was, on the showing of the Commissioners themselves, entitled to a Member. Why, then, was that barony not allowed to stand as the Commissioners placed it? Because, if Kilmacrenan were not split up, it would be impossible to have the two Raphoes together, and the Government considered it far more important to meet Tory prejudice in Donegal, than to follow the Instructions of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The barony of Kilmacrenan, as he had shown, was, by the first scheme of the Commissioners, to get a Member, as it was entitled to do; but the Commissioners went down to Donegal and met the noble Lord, or his representatives if he was not there in person, and the noble Lord's brother, who hoped to be Member for the constituency, and the representatives of the rest of the family; those gentlemen got at the Commissioners, they made their representations, and the barony of Kilmacrenan was now split up, and the two Raphoes, hitherto separated, were now united—the Government had crossed Lough Swilly in order to divide the Inishowens; they split up Kilmacrenan and united the two Raphoes, for the purpose of giving the Tories a Member. Under what pretences had that been done? The right hon. Baronet would, no doubt, say that there was an extreme similarity of pursuits on both sides of the lough, and Irish-speaking people also on both sides. He had taken the trouble to ascertain exactly how the matter stood. The Government had taken three parishes out of Kilmacrenan and put them with Inishowen, under the pretence that the people of those places were all fishermen. But the fact was that had they been left where they were they would have been united to an Irish-speaking and a fishing population, because more fishing was done there and more Irish spoken. So the Government had violated their own Instructions, and had taken out of Kilmacrenan the three parishes of Clandavaddog, Killygaran, and Tullyfern, and classed them with Inishowen, because the people were supposed to be fishermen. But he had ascertained that there were no fishermen and no fish to be caught in them but salmon, and his informant said that Killygaran was agricultural with the exception of two or three spots, and that Clandavaddog was more agricultural still. There were 631 families in Clandavaddog, not one of which fished; in Killygaran there were 474 families, of which 63 fished; and in Tullyfern there were 1,126 families, of whom 112 lived by fishing. Therefore, it was absurd to go to the pursuit of fishing as a reason for splitting up those parishes. If the Government had taken firm ground and said—"We are ready to give the Tories a seat in Donegal on general principles," he could have understood the position they took up in regard to that county. But the right hon. Baronet said—"All the people live by fishing, and are Irish-speaking, and therefore we cross over a distance of three miles to unite them with people of the same language and pursuits." But he had shown that that was not the case, and therefore he said that to unite them with the people on the other side of Lough Swilly would be about equivalent to uniting the people of Kingstown with those of Holyhead—there would be just as much similarity of pursuits and interest in the two cases. He repeated that he could understand the Government saying that they would give the Tories a seat in the county; but this peddling fallacy about an Irish-speaking and fishing population would not bear a moment's investigation. Then, as to crossing the lough. When Irish Members proposed that the lake in County Down should be crossed where it was only half-a-mile wide, and there was a half-penny ferry, they were snubbed and laughed at for the notion of people crossing that half-mile of water; but when it was a question of crossing Lough Swilly with its four miles of sea and a ferry that was, so to speak, only crossed once in 1,000 years, so far as the pursuits of the people were concerned, why then in the eyes of the Government the Swilly was a bagatelle, a cypher, a mere drop of water. He did not know why if the Government wanted to swindle the Irish people they should not do so openly, and not add hypocrisy to their acts. They gave a seat to the Tories, who were not entitled to it; while the Nationalists of Antrim, Belfast, Derry, Central Armagh, and Tyrone were not getting the full share of representation to which they were entitled. As he had said before, the combinations of the Government should have the word "partiality" stamped upon them, and so long as the name of Donegal remained so long would its divisions be remembered with contempt for the Government who sanctioned them.

Amendment proposed, in page 95, leave out lines 5 to 10, inclusive.—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that his family took a great interest in the divisions of this county, and he and other members of it were present and heard what took place when the Commissioners came to inquire into the wants of the locality in question. The hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had stated what at first sight seemed to be a great objection to the scheme with reference to Donegal—namely, that certain parishes had been cut up; and he had particularly referred to the case of one barony which seemed to have a population which, in respect of numbers, entitled it to one Member. He (Lord George Hamilton) felt sure that if the hon. and learned Member had been sent down to Donegal as one of the Commissioners, he would have arrived at the very same decision as that arrived at by the Commissioners. He agreed that there were alterations in the schemes of the Commissioners. In this case he believed they took the Ordnance map and marked out the districts where they were contiguous one to the other; but when they got to the mountainous parishes they found there were insuperable difficulties in the way, and that some places apparently contiguous had little or no means of communication. In the case of Raphoe they proposed to cut the barony in two and join the two districts with Inishowen. Under the other arrangement the connection would have been by railway, and persons passing from one part to another would have had to pass through two or three counties; that was to say, they would have to go by the railway which started from Donegal to Tyrone and Fermanagh. Now, there was an unanimous objection to that in the locality, and it was proposed to associate the barony as appeared in the Schedule. Now, the objection raised to that was that there was an arm of the sea between the parishes. Mr. Doherty argued the case of the Nationalist Party with great ability; but he not only asserted, but brought witnesses to prove, that the sea was the only means of communication in that part of Donegal, and that the arm of the sea did not constitute any objection to the connection proposed. Later on, when it was proposed to connect certain districts in the Northern Division with those on the East side of Lough Swilly, the Nationalist Party changed their front, and said that the lough constituted an insuperable obstacle. Of course, no one could take that as a reasonable objection. Now the hon. and learned Member had not moved the substitution of the original scheme of the Commissioners for that which was embodied in the Bill, but he proposed to substitute the scheme put forward by the Nationalists for the revised scheme of the Commissioners. The county of Donegal was a very remarkable county; there being an inner and an outer Donegal, as everyone would know who had passed any time there. The outer Donegal was inhabited chiefly by Roman Catholics, many of whom spoke nothing but Irish; it was a poor district; the farms were very small, the people very poor, and a considerable proportion of them were occupied in fishing pursuits. But the inner Donegal was quite distinct and separate in its character from the outer Donegal; there were better farms there than in any other part of the country, the people were Protestants, and were quite distinct from the neighbouring population of the county. Therefore, if ever there was a case in which the single-Member principle ought to be applied it was in respect of this portion of Donegal. He thought the Commissioners in every single instance had tried to assimilate as far as they could the population of each county, but there had been immense difficulties in the way of doing so. Now, the Commissioners in their desire to equalize had, as far as they could, preserved existing boundaries. But they had in the case of the two Raphoes added two towns which most resembled them in respect of pursuits and numbers of population. The Commissioners had undoubtedly split up a barony; but on the Nationalists' own showing it was immaterial how those baronies were cut up, because the interests and political opinions of the people were almost identical in every case, and that, as a matter of fact, the boundaries were more artificial than natural. Therefore, he was convinced that any impartial man would have arrived at the same result in this case as that in the revised scheme of the Commissioners. But the hon. and learned Member proposed to substitute for that the Nationalist scheme, which was the association of the barony of Raphoe South with the barony of Boyleagh. But Boyleagh was probably one of the most Roman Catholic districts in the North of Ireland, and the effect of adding to its population that of the two Raphoes would be at once to submerge the Protestants. The baronies were neither geographically nor socially connected. There was a high range of hills between the Raphoes and Boyleagh. But this scheme of the Nationalists had been practically put out of court by a speech made by Mr. Patrick Gallagher, one of the most prominent supporters of the hon. and learned Member, and who had been the representative of a certain district at the National Convention in the days of the Land League. Mr. Gallagher spoke to the effect that the question they had to consider was, what was best for the Nationalist Party; that they wanted to promote the cause; that they did not care a twopenny ticket if they could jerry-mander the district, and that they wanted to join South Raphoe to Boyleagh. That was the report in a Conservative organ, and he might mention that while the other papers reported the proceedings there was no report of

Mr. Patrick Gallagher's speech. The scheme of Mr. Gallagher was to dissect or cut up one Protestant barony and tack it on to the Catholic baronies of the county with which it had no connection. Now, so far as Donegal was concerned, he contended that the scheme of the Commissioners was a perfectly fair one. The Nationalist Party had 75 per cent of the population, and certainly they would carry 75 per cent of the representation of the county. He thought it very doubtful that the Loyalist Party would carry Raphoe; but still, whatever the result might be, the object was to give the minority a chance of representation, and this scheme gave them that chance. The hon. and learned Gentleman showed great skill in putting forward all these instances in which he thought his friends were unrepresented; but he had omitted to mention all those cases in which the Loyalists would get no representation at all. It was probable that in all the other three divisions the Loyalists would have no representation. In Armagh, the Party which the hon. Gentleman represented would have a majority of three to one, and therefore he thought he had rather weakened his case by bringing this charge of jerry-mandering and unfair treatment against the Government. Whatever the Commissioners did, the hon. and learned Gentleman and his Friends tried to make out some charge of unfair play against them. But the hon. and learned Member himself, a shrewd politician, showed that he hardly believed those charges. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), speaking of the Bill, had said that the result of the alterations in the schemes as to the North of Ireland would be that the political Parties opposed to him would retain 23 out of 33 seats; but the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) said now that the Nationalists would hold 83 out of the 103 seats. [Mr. HEALY: I said 83 in Ireland and two or three in England.] He thought he had shown that this scheme with regard to Donegal was adopted by the Commissioners on its merits; he did not believe that any other scheme was practicable; and he was quite sure that to substitute for a scheme which had been considered by a judicial body, a scheme declared by one of its most prominent supporters to be a jerry-mandering scheme, was a proposal to which the Committee would never consent.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, there was very little for him to add. The real contest in Donegal had turned upon whether Boylagh and Raphoe should be thrown together or kept separate. The argument of the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) on this subject was a very strong one. Boylagh was admittedly a very poor district, whereas Raphoe was a wealthy district. Boylagh was a district of 160,000 acres, but its rateable value was only £10,000; Raphoe, however, had an acreage of 223,000, and a rateable value of £100,000, 10 times the wealth of Boylagh. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was not one of those who believed in distinctions being made with regard to the pursuits of the population; but it was part of the agreement which was made between the Leaders of the two Parties that divisions should proceed on that principle, and therefore he found himself bound to support such distinctions. If regard was had to the pursuits of the population the divisions which had been drawn in the case of Boylagh and Raphoe was a good one. Now, great objection had been raised to the Northern Division of Donegal, on the ground that it was crossed by a lough. Mr. White, the Boundary Commissioner, held the local inquiry, and, in the Report he had laid before Parliament, he stated that he did not attach any serious importance to the fact; and he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was bound to say, after the most careful examination he had been able to give the matter, that the difficulty of this lough had been greatly exaggerated. In County Down there was a lough which was crossed, and it was much wider than the lough crossed in Donegal. He was sorry that they were obliged, in dealing with these Irish cases, to refer to questions of religion; but as reference to such questions had been made during the debate, it was just as well he should mention the result of the Religious Census in Donegal. The Catholic population of Donegal was 127,000, and the Protestant 47,000. The Roman Catholic population was in a considerable majority in all the divisions, as the divisions had been set out by the Commissioners; and, therefore, if it was true, as stated, that the Nationalist Party were likely to command all the Catholic votes, that Party would win all the seats in County Donegal. Even in the division in which they had some doubt of carrying the seat there were upwards of 31,000 Catholics and 20,000 and odd Protestants. He was bound to say that those who had published in Nationalist newspapers forecasts of the results of the elections in County Donegal, and also those who had made speeches on the subject, had estimated that all the four seats would be carried by the Nationalist Party. The Catholic Bishop, who took a very active part in the inquiry, and who was the first to take exception to the Commissioners' scheme, had said the Nationalists would carry all the four seats in that county, although, as had been pointed out, the Protestants were more than one-fourth of the population. ["No, no!"] Well, there were 76 per cent of Catholics. There was this security that fairness was done as between religion and religion—namely, that the Commissioner who held the inquiry was himself a Catholic, and that the Chairman of the Commission, to whom the matter was referred in London, was also a Catholic. That being the case, he hardly thought that any unfairness would be done to those who belonged to the Catholic religion. He was sorry that questions of religion were raised in this matter; he certainly was not the first to raise them.

Mr. SEXTON said, he could not agree with any man on any subject more heartily than he agreed with the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) in the concluding part of his speech. It was not only disagreeable, but painful in the extreme, whenever he (Mr. Sexton) had, in arguing political questions, to refer to religious differences. He could not conceive why religion ought to prevent men who were born in the same country from acting together. But if the right hon. Baronet did not begin the reference to the differences of creed in Ireland, he (Mr. Sexton) could plead that neither did the Members of the Irish popular Party. [Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: I did not say you did.] The reference was begun by the landlord party in the North of Ireland when they raised the cry that the Protestant creed would not have adequate representation under the Bill. The landlord party, it appeared, would not be satisfied unless representation was given to the Protestant population proportionate to their numbers, without regard as to whether the Protestants did or did not live in one part of the county. He did not see any other way in which the claims of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) could be met than by placing the Protestants of a county in one division, and thus assuring them of a Representative. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) amused him very much when he said that the Commissioner who held the inquiry in Donegal was a Catholic, and when he seemed to infer from that fact that any decision arrived at by that gentleman would be or ought to be satisfactory to Catholics. There was nothing more familiar to those acquainted with Ireland than that a Government having the power of the purse and the power of administration in any country could get men to do just what they pleased. He need simply remind the Committee that when the Government found it necessary to attack and insult and defame and injure the Catholic priesthood in Ireland, it was a Catholic Judge, the late Mr. Justice Keogh, who did so. Now, the Commissioners had admitted that they had made certain errors; but they endeavoured to make a point against the Nationalist Party by saying that, whilst they were in favour of uniting in South Donegal two baronies which had an area of the sea between them, in North Donegal they disapproved of a similar state of things. Now, the Bay of Donegal did not run to any considerable extent into South Donegal, or, at least, when it ceased to be a broad inlet it became exceedingly narrow and threw no difficulty in the way of communication. The Bay of Donegal, in respect to width, was not to be compared with Lough Swilly. Lough Swilly ran into the very heart of County Donegal, as far as the town of Letterkenny, and it attained a width of no less than four miles at one part of it. In point of fact, he was assured by a gentleman who well knew the county of Donegal, that there was no communication between the western and eastern sides of the lough. Touching the question of similarity of pursuits, he might say that there was really a fishing industry in South Donegal. He saw by the last Report of the Inspectors of Fisheries

that in and around the town of Donegal there were about 1,000 men and boys engaged in the fisheries; so that if there was any force to be attached to the argument that Donegal Bay had a dividing influence, it was more than compensated for by the fact that the fishing industry was very large. The case was entirely different in Lough Swilly. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) made a point at the expense of Mr. Patrick Gallagher, who was reported by a Tory gentleman to have said he did not care for the Instructions of the Government; all he wanted was to jerrymander the division. He (Mr. Sexton) was not aware that Mr. Patrick Gallagher made the observations attributed to him; but, assuming that he did, it appeared to him that Mr. Patrick Gallagher was exceedingly frank. He (Mr. Sexton) did not suppose that any Nationalist in Ireland had any other desire than that the Nationalists should return as many Members as it was possible for them to do; and, on the other hand, he did not suppose that the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton), or any of his hon. Friends, desired that the number of Tory seats should be diminished if any possible means could secure the retention of the present number. The only difference between the noble Lord and Mr. Patrick Gallagher was that Mr. Patrick Gallagher said what he meant, and the noble Lord abstained from going through that operation. What was the argument of the noble Lord? He stated that one-fourth of the people of Donegal were of the Protestant creed. He (Mr. Sexton) had just pointed out to the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) that they were not. The Catholics of Donegal numbered 157,000, and the Protestants 47,000. It followed there would have to be 4,000 more Protestants in the county to give them one-fourth of the population, and thus entitle them to one seat. But wherever the Catholics were massed together in such numbers as to entitle them to return a Member the Commissioners divided them here and divided them there, even to throwing them over a range of mountains; in fact, everything that was possible was done in order to procure a division in which the natural predominance of the Catholics should be neutralized. What was done in Donegal? The Protestants were nowhere in sufficient numbers to entitle them to a Member; but the Commissioners took the barony in which they existed in the greatest numbers, and disregarding all the conditions of compactness, pursuits of the population, and well-known areas, they sent out scouts in every direction and took in from every quarter of the county such districts as contained large bodies of Protestants in order to swell the total number in the given division. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, in speaking of the creeds in the barony of Raphoe, showed that ignorance of Irish affairs which made it exceedingly difficult to discuss such affairs in the House of Commons. The right hon. Baronet said that the Catholics in Raphoe numbered 31,000, and the Protestants upwards of 20,000. He (Mr. Sexton) thought the figures were incorrect; but, assuming them to be correct, the right hon. Baronet drew from them an unjustifiable inference. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the political power of the Catholics of Raphoe would be according to those numbers. That was altogether contrary to the fact. The Catholics in Raphoe occupied the position of domestic and farm servants. The land was held by Protestant farmers, who were the inheritors of the policy of plantation, and the descendants of the planters in Ulster. Many of the Catholics were the servant boys and girls whose parents lived in other counties in Ulster; in fact, a very great part of the 30,000 Catholics in that district was made up of those who occupied the position of servants who had not votes. The 30,000 Catholics, therefore, would not exercise political power at all proportionate to their number. The 20,000 Protestants inhabiting the homesteads of the division would count among them a greater number of Parliamentary voters than the 30,000 Catholics, who were accurately described as "hewers of wood and drawers of water." If there was any county in Ireland the natural configuration of which dictated the divisions for Parliamentary purposes, it was the county of Donegal. Let them glance at North Donegal. The promontory of Inishowen was separated by Lough Swilly from the rest of the county. It contained within 10,000 of the number of people necessary to form a Parliamentary division itself, and the Commissioners in their first scheme thought it a reasonable and sensible course to regard Inishowen, shut off as it was from the rest of the county, as the basis of the unit, adding to it a part of the barony of Raphoe to bring the population up to the required number. Then with regard to Kilmacrenan. That was a barony which contained the precise number of people to entitle it to a Member. It was a division formed by nature on the western side of Lough Swilly. It was separated from the district of Inishowen by Lough Swilly, and from Boyleagh in the South by an almost impassable range of mountains. In the South the baronies of Tirhugh and Banagh were separated from the rest of the county by mountains. Thus there were three natural divisions—Inishowen, Kilmacrenan, and the baronies of Tirhugh and Banagh. It was plain that the Commissioners should have accepted the divisions which Nature had made for them, and then to have added a fourth division in the shape of the baronies of Boyleagh and Raphoe. Both of those baronies were agricultural. There was certainly in Raphoe a small flax industry, but agriculture was the chief industry; Boyleagh was purely agricultural. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) made a great deal of the range of mountains which he said ran between Boyleagh and Raphoe. There was a range of mountains there, but it was a range which had passes through it. Between Boyleagh and Kilmacrenan, however, there was an impassable range of mountains; no one ever passed over it except occasionally at one remote point where there was a footroad. There was no practical thoroughfare between the baronies of Boyleagh and Kilmacrenan, which the Commissioners had put in one division; so that when the noble Lord spoke of a range of mountains as a very good reason for shutting off a division which had many Catholics in it, he should bear in mind that there was a bigger range of mountains separating Boyleagh and Kilmacrenan baronies, which the Commissioners had linked together. Instead of taking the divisions formed by Nature, the Commissioners started with the barony of Raphoe, making that the unit. The barony of Raphoe was the ground of the old plantation of Ulster. It was divided between the people of the imported and favourite creed, and the Catholics were driven to the outskirts of the mountains of Inishowen and Kilmacrenan. The Commissioners had added to the barony of Raphoe those parts of the baronies of Inishowen and Kilmacrenan which contained the Protestant population. They had actually pursued in 1885 the policy of the old plantation of 200 years ago; they had shut off the Catholic population, and had taken into the barony of Raphoe all those parts of other baronies where a majority of Protestants could be found, without having any regard to the well-known boundaries of baronies, or the natural configuration of the country. To such an extent had the Commissioners carried out that policy that the chief town of Kilmacrenan was actually taken away from that barony and added to the barony of Raphoe. The inhabitants of Boyleagh knew as little of Kilmacrenan as they knew of the most distant parts of Ireland. Mr. White, the learned Commissioner, in endeavouring to account for the union of places upon both sides of Lough Swilly, had delivered himself of a very extraordinary argument. Mr. White said he did not place any serious importance to the fact that Lough Swilly ran in through the Northern Division; that fact was counterbalanced by the consideration that the riparian inhabitants on both sides were of a homogeneous class. He (Mr. Sexton) might say, in passing, that he had always understood that riparian inhabitants were persons living on the side of a river. Lough Swilly was not a river, but an arm of the sea, four or five miles wide. Now, was it a fact that there was any intercourse between the inhabitants of both shores of Lough Swilly? The fact was this—that Lough Swilly formed as absolute a division between Kilmacrenan and Inishowen as the Atlantic Ocean formed between Ireland and America. Lough Swilly was four miles wide, it was an inlet of the sea, even visited by storms, and the only means of safe transit across it was one ferry. They were told that the people had to cross Lough Swilly because they had fishing occupations. Now, some of the parishes which had been cut off from Kilmacrenan and added to Inishowen were parishes not bordering on the lough at all; they were parishes in which there were no fish, and consequently where there were no fishermen. And with reference to the parishes beside the lake, he said that the fishing industry was more active upon the western side than upon the eastern side. And if the fishing industry were to be considered at all, it would be better served by allowing the inhabitants to go over to the western side of the lough. Again, it was true that the people along the shores of the lough spoke the Irish language; but they spoke the English language also, and therefore there was no peculiarity established in that regard. The fact was, that in the barony of Kilmacrenan and along the shore there was a considerable number of people who spoke the Irish language alone. Therefore, if there was any force in the argument of the Commissioners with regard to uniting the Irish-speaking populations of this part of the county, it was a force which told against their own decision. Now, when they found officials driven to such extremes as these in order to find a colourable reason for a scandalous division of the county, he thought it was time to say that all argument was at an end. The more he looked at the question, the more clear it appeared to him that the Commissioners, who had at first made a tolerably honest scheme, and who only departed from it when they found there was perfect unity with regard to it, had violated every one of the Instructions given them by the Government—the Instructions as to compactness of boundary and similarity of pursuits—and that, in order to justify their scheme, they set up an illusive argument as to the identity of pursuits of the people which had no foundation. The county of Donegal was agricultural; there was no independent industry, and no extensive fishing population, the number of those who fished being only about 3,000. The argument of identity of pursuits had, therefore, no application to Donegal except in the Southern Division, where, perhaps, the main part of the fishing industry, slight as it was, would be found. No; the Commissioners started from the areas in which English Kings, 200 years ago, founded Colonies for the benefit of Protestants, and they cast out from the divisions the Catholics, and added to them as many Protestants as they could. They scorned the Instructions given to them by the Government, and they exerted themselves to form a scheme which would enable a member of the house of Hamilton to find a seat for the county. That was the object they had in view. But he did not believe that a member of that family would sit for Donegal, because the people at the next General Election would have learnt that their interest did not lie in returning a Tory to Parliament. Finally, he said that, for the purpose of preventing a political result in Donegal which both they and the Government desired to avoid, the Commissioners had violated all the Instructions distinctly laid down for their guidance in respect of this Bill.

Amendment negatived.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members found being present,

MR. SMALL said, it was difficult to understand why, if the Commissioners had kept in view the conformation of the County Down, they should have given to the four divisions the designations which appeared on the Schedule. He thought it would be more correct to call the 2nd Division the North-West Division, or it should be called the West Down Division; that No. 3 should be called the East Down, and No. 4 the South Down Division; and, therefore, he would move to leave out the word "The" from line 4.

Amendment proposed, in page 96, line 4, to leave out the word "The."—(Mr. Small.)

Amendment negatived.

MR. SMALL said, at the inquiry a large body of evidence was given before the Commissioners to show that the inhabitants of Upper Ards were much more closely connected with the people of No. 3 Division than they were with Lower Ards and Castlereagh Upper. The proposed arrangement of the Government was most inconvenient, and the suggestion he made would render more equal the populations of the different divisions of the county—that was to say, that the entire of Upper Ards, with the exception of one parish, should be joined to the 3rd Division.

Amendment proposed, in page 96, line 7, to leave out the words "Upper Ards."—(Mr. Small.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'Upper Ards' stand part of the Schedule."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the proposal of the hon. Member appeared to be one of the proposals made at the inquiry, respecting which the Commissioners reported to the effect that there was no ground in favour of it. It had not been shown that there was any advantage in the arrangement proposed; and, in view of the Report, he could not agree to the Amendment.

MR. HEALY said, that the proposal of his hon. Friend was in no sense a political one, and, therefore, he thought that the right hon. Baronet would do well to consider the matter. The Party to which he belonged had got all they could extract out of County Down; that was to say, they had one seat—namely, for the Lower Division; and they would have had that in any case, even if the Commissioners had not changed their original plan. He did not think that the right hon. Baronet quite appreciated the local feeling in regard to Lower Ards. He found that at the time there was only one individual who opposed the plan put forward by his hon. Friend; and the fact that the Tory Party had shown no opposition whatever with regard to the change now proposed was a proof that the Tory Party were better served in County Down than anywhere else in Ireland. Their representative, Mr. Finigan, was a gentleman who possessed a good deal of the suaviter in modo, and he remained perfectly silent throughout the proceedings, and, as he had said before, only one gentleman opposed the arrangement suggested. He did not agree with the right hon. Baronet that it would have the effect of unshaping the entire county. If he looked at the map he would see that it was not so. On the other hand, the feeling at Upper Ards was very strongly opposed to the Government proposal; the inhabitants had to go to Downpatrick on business connected with the Police, Poor Law, and County Court, as they were in the Downpatrick Union, and, therefore, they found it hard to be divorced from the district with which they were familiar. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would reconsider this reasonable proposal of his hon. Friend. He would point out also that the entire population of Lower Ards were engaged in market-gardening, and only went to Belfast with their goods; whereas he had shown that the people of Upper Ards all went to Downpatrick, and, therefore, there was no connection between them. As a politician, he assured the right hon. Baronet that the Nationalists could not gain anything by this proposal.

MR. PLUNKET said, he was disposed to agree with the finding of the Commissioners in this case unless some stronger arguments were forthcoming than those yet brought forward. He accepted the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) that there was no political object underlying the Amendment; but, as the matter now stood, he should certainly vote in favour of the conclusion arrived at by the Commissioners, which appeared to offer the most satisfactory mode of settlement.

MR. BIGGAR said, he should support the Amendment of his hon. Friend, on the ground that they would probably have a Government Bill in a short time dealing with local matters; and he thought it desirable that the centres of localities should be, as far as possible, the centres of the Poor Law Unions.

MR. HEALY said, that whatever were the arguments which he and his hon. Friends brought forward, they received no consideration from the Government. The opinions of the Commissioners, who spent half-an-hour in these places, were more important in the eyes of the Government than the opinions of Irish Members who had been in them all their lives; the Commissioners went down by one train and returned by another, and their opinion was regarded by the Government as final. If they had had the County Government Bill, it would have dealt with the county in the way his hon. Friend proposed; but this scheme of the Commissioners absolutely wrenched the people asunder, so far as concerned the natural boundaries, and he was really surprised that the right hon. Baronet was unwilling to give Irish Members satisfaction on this matter. Under the circumstances, he thought they were justified in dividing the Committee, although, whatever they might do, he knew that they could get nothing whatever from the Government in respect of these arrangements.

MR. KENNY said, the Amendment before the Committee would have the effect of making the population of the division equal, and generally of covering the main points on which the Government had instructed the Commissioners. He thought the right hon. Baronet would admit that the Amendment of his hon. Friend had much to recommend it in the fact that it was not due to any political motive. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) had recommended his hon. Friend not to go to a division, but to raise the question again on the Report.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 23: Majority 28. — (Div. List, No. 111.)

MR. SMALL moved to leave out lines 12 to 15, inclusive, in order that they might be inserted after line 21.

Amendment proposed, in page 96, to leave out lines 12 to 15, inclusive.—(Mr. Small.)

MR. HEALY said, the proposal was of a kind that would affect a good many counties besides County Down, and he would suggest that the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) should consider the matter between now and the Report, and endeavour to arrange the different parts of the divisions in a more orderly manner.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he should be glad to do what was suggested, if that were thought the best way; but he did not think it would matter whether they took that course or dealt with the question at once. He was quite willing to allow the alteration now proposed, and as the Committee had already agreed to make certain alterations in regard to this county, perhaps it would be better to take the Amendments in order, and deal with them now.

MR. SMALL said, as he understood the right hon. Gentleman did not offer any opposition to his proposal to alter the order in which parts of the divisions were placed in the Schedule, he would ask the Chairman to put his Amendment.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I do not object.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, line 16 came next, and he supposed the hon. Member (Mr. Small) would propose to leave out the figure 3 in that line.

On the Motion of Mr. SMALL, the following Amendment made:—Page 96, line 16, leave out 3, insert 2.

On the Motion of Mr. SEXTON, the following Amendment made:—Page 96, line 16, leave out "Mid Down," insert "East Down."

On the Motion of Mr. HEALY, the following Amendment made:—Page 96, leave out lines 20 and 21, insert "No. 3, West Down."

MR. HEALY wished to call the attention of the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to the fact that, in all the divisions of the Schedule, there were dashes running on the paragraphs, which was a mere printer's mode of setting out the lines. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would not have those dashes omitted?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, Sir.

On the Motion of Mr. HEALY, the following Amendment made:—Page 96, line 22, leave out "South West Down," insert "South Down."

Amendment proposed,

In page 97, line 4, to leave out the word "Ballbriggan," and insert the words "North Dublin."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Balbriggan' stand part of the Schedule."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE desired to call the hon. Member's attention to the fact that the proposed alteration of the title of the 1st Division of County Dublin might tend to create confusion as between the divisions of Dublin City and Dublin County.

MR. SEXTON said, it would be in the recollection of the right hon. Baronet that at a previous stage of the Bill he had proposed to amend the divisions of the City of Dublin, as recommended by the Commissioners and as fixed in the Schedule defining the borough divisions, by calling them after the historic sites or areas of the city, and one of the reasons he then gave was that he was desirous of preventing confusion, and of having the points of the compass inserted as the titles of the county divisions.

MR. HEALY said, they had the advantage of the presence of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman); perhaps he would favour the Committee with his views on this proposal?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he had not the slightest objection to it.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. SEXTON said, he had now to move the next Amendment. He desired to express the extremely strong objections felt by himself and his hon. Friends to the division of the county of Dublin proposed by the final scheme of the Boundary Commissioners. This was another case in which they were obliged to appeal from the Commissioners to the Commissioners themselves. The first scheme proposed by the Commissioners was just as satisfactory to the public as the second scheme was faulty and objectionable. In other cases, it could be alleged that the Boundary Commissioners had discharged their duties in the most thorough manner, although they had not very much time for consideration; and it might also be said of them that, in preparing their first schemes, they had to deal with matters with which they were not perhaps very well acquainted, and that, therefore, they fell into certain errors, which they were obliged to correct when they were called upon to frame their final schemes. But with regard to the county of Dublin, he had no hesitation in saying that the Commissioners had had plenty of time to consider their original scheme, and that two of the Commissioners permanently resided in Dublin, and were therefore dealing with a county and a population with the circumstances and pursuits of which they were perfectly well acquainted. The first scheme the Commissioners had presented met with the complete approval of the Representatives of the National Party, as expressed at the public inquiry; but he had to note, as a very extraordinary fact, that whenever the Representatives of the National Party in Ireland offered any objection to a particular scheme, the points objected to were sure to be upheld against them; while, on the other hand, whenever the Representatives of that Party agreed to the general features of a scheme framed by the Boundary Commissioners and declared it a satisfactory one, the chances were that the scheme was sure to be so altered as to render it unsatisfactory in almost all those respects wherein it had received their approval. He wished to point out that the first scheme of the Commissioners in relation to the division of Dublin County was a convenient one, and one which satisfied the Instructions given by the Government for the guidance of the Commissioners. For instance, it fully satisfied the Instruction that they should have regard to the principle of equality of population, because in the Northern Division of the county of Dublin—the Malahide Division—the population was put down as 73,100, while the population of the Southern Division was estimated at 72,400; so that the Commissioners had divided a county with a population of 145,500 into two divisions so equally that the disparity between the two was only 700. This result was accepted as a satisfactory discharge of the obligations imposed on the Commissioners by the Instructions of the Government that they were to have due regard to equality of population. He had next to inquire whether the first scheme suggested by the Commissioners satisfied the Instructions they had received with regard to compactness of area and with respect to the preservation, as far as possible, of well-known existing boundaries? The map which he then held in his hand offered a view of the four divisions of the county as recommended by the Commissioners before their scheme had come under the influence of the agents of the Tory Party. A glance at that map would suffice to show that in the first division the Commissioners proposed to take four baronies also to the North of the city, and to add to them five parishes to the North of the city, and form them into the Northern Division of the county, the Southern Division being formed of the whole of the remaining area. Under that scheme the county was divided into two nearly equal parts; the baronial boundaries were respected and preserved intact with the exception only of five parishes, and in the fixing of these equal areas security was taken in regard to the future increase of population; for it was obvious that when large equal areas were included in divisions the fluctuations of population would in all probability be equalized, not only with regard to the present time but in time to come. The first of the Commissioners' schemes having been one of so satisfactory a character in regard to equality of population and compactness of areas, it might be asked how had it come to pass that the Commissioners had been induced to alter the scheme? The alteration they had made was one which might have been satisfactory to the Commissioners themselves, but it certainly failed to satisfy the people. He was sure the Committee would be puzzled to imagine any reason why the Commissioners, having formulated a scheme such as he had just described, should afterwards have departed from their original plan in so fundamental and objectionable a manner. Upon this point he should like to quote a few expressions of public opinion in reference to the second scheme of the Commissioners. The Kingstown branch of the National Association had characterized the proposal of the Government as a flagrant departure from the Instructions they had given to the Commissioners, and as an attempt to deprive the National Party of their legitimate share of the representation. The Rathmines branch of the Association had described the proposed division under the second scheme as most absurd and unfair, and a palpable concession to the Conservative minority. Other branches of the Association had characterized the scheme as utterly at variance with every principle of justice, as well as with the Instructions given by the Government, and had asserted that the Commissioners had in the most degrading manner abrogated their functions. The Committee had already had the opportunity of seeing that the two divisions of the county as proposed by the first of the Commissioners' schemes were equal. Let them now glance at the divisions recommended by the Commissioners in their second scheme. One of those divisions was formed from a small segment of the county, which in point of area was only 1-20th of the whole, while the other division contained the remaining 19-20ths of the county area. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) seemed to think that examples of a similar kind could be found elsewhere; but he (Mr. Sexton) should be very glad if the right hon. Gentleman would point out to him a single instance in which, where there were only two divisions, one of them occupied an area of 19-20ths, while the other contained only the remaining 1-20th. The solicitor to the Emergency Association had appeared before the Commissioners at Rathmines. He had represented that Rathmines was an urban district, and ought not to be thrown into the county.

Mr. ION HAMILTON asked who was the solicitor referred to?

Mr. SEXTON said, the solicitors to the Emergency Association were Messrs. Dudgeon and Emerson.

Mr. ION HAMILTON asked who was the counsel?

Mr. SEXTON replied, that the counsel was Mr. John Gibson. Their objection to the first scheme, which had been shown to be so rational and convenient, was that part of Rathmines was taken into the North of the county of Dublin, and that it was an urban district and ought to be formed into an urban division. He should not greatly object to the inclusion of Rathmines in an urban division, if it could be shown that that object could be really effected, or that that purpose was really held in view by those who advanced the plea. But it was a very strange fact that while the Commissioners of Rathmines refused to have the place attached to the City of Dublin and strove to show that it was of a rural character, they also urged that it was an urban district. When they wanted to utilize all the Tory votes it was an urban district; but when they wanted to escape the taxes of the city it was a rural district. It was true that in the Southern Division of the county of Dublin the townships of Blackrock, Kingstown, Killiney, and Bray were included, and the villaholders of Blackrock were to be found in the same division with the quarrymen and farmers of Tallaght. That was not an urban district at all. It included a large proportion of the agricultural population, and it shut out the urban population of all the seaboard towns from Balbriggan in the North down to the City of Dublin. The whole arrangement of this scheme rested upon a sham and a pretence. The Commissioners had acted on the suggestion of the Marquess of Salisbury that they should divide the counties in a spirit favourable to the Tory Party. They had taken three or four townships chiefly inhabited by persons who were supposed to have Tory predilections and proclivities, and had thrown them into one division, and all the rest into another. The divisions were different in point of area, in regard to boundary, and in regard to the probable increase of population; and the Commissioners had entitled themselves to be branded with the imputation of gross partiality. He asked the Committee to assent to the first scheme of the Commissioners, which would still include a great portion of the urban population, which would have regard to the baronial baronies, and which would give an equal population. He could not imagine what argument could be advanced against it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 97, to leave out from the words "Balrothery West," in line 6, to the words "herein described," in line 16, inclusive, and insert the words,—

"Barony of Nethercross, Barony of Coolock,
Barony of Uppercross (parishes of Saint Catherine's, Saint James's, Saint Jude's, and St. Peter's), Barony of Rathdown (parish of Rathfarnham.)"—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'Castlenock, Coolock, Nethercross, and Newcastle' stand part of the Schedule."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the case of the county of Dublin had been raised on more than one occasion. It was said that what was proposed for that county did not follow any of the precedents, and he had been asked by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken to produce precedents. The hon. Gentleman had now narrowed his question to the case of counties with two Members; but even when thus narrowed, there were other cases very similar to this. One was the case of the area around Newcastle, where the division was extremely small. That was a very striking case to which no objection had been taken. Other cases were those of Perth and Renfrew, where the Liberal Party had raised just the same objection as was raised here. The counties of Perth and Renfrew were counties with two Members, divided into one very large and one very small division—the small, a populous division; the large, a rural division. In the present case there was a very dense population in one part of the county, and a thin population elsewhere. Of course, the Commissioners had endeavoured to put the dense population together and the scattered population together, and if he had been the Commissioners, acting under the Instructions which were given to them, he should have taken the very same course. The question was whether, given that course, the Commissioners had acted rightly, and there might be more doubt about that, owing to the fact that there were urban districts not included in the small division, but included in the agricultural division. But that objection applied more to the first scheme of the Commissioners than to the present one. If it was an objection to the scheme, it had been greatly diminished indeed, if not removed, by the later changes in the scheme. If the Commissioners had tried to make the urban division contain the whole of the urban population, they would have made a district in the form of a ring right round Dublin. He was not going to argue that they might not have taken that course. It had been taken, in the case of the Bootle Divisions, right round Liverpool; but it had not been very successful, so far as local feeling went, and there had been considerable opposition to that narrow strip around the town. He was not sure whether it was not wise to adopt a more concentrated form. He thought the Commissioners had interpreted their Instructions rightly in forming one very small and one very large division in the county of Dublin, and with less certainty he imagined that they were probably right in forming the divisions in this particular way; but, as to that, he should not like to speak positively.

MR. ION HAMILTON said, that when the Commissioners were sitting, there was a very strong feeling, and all the parties interested were in favour of some scheme like that now adopted by the Commissioners. He himself had representations from people representing all classes—not merely his own Party, but others—in favour of the scheme. There was not a doubt that when the scheme was first proposed by the Commissioners on going to Dublin, it was one which startled a great many persons, for it brought together a great many people who were thoroughly inharmonious, and who could not have established any concert at all. But, by the present arrangement, it was evidently intended that the agricultural population should be left to itself, and the urban population to itself. He thought the Commissioners had acted with discretion. He certainly did feel that the Metropolitan county ought to have had an addition to its representation—he should have liked to have seen it with a third Member. But taking things as they were, he thought no better apportionment of the population could have been made; and he trusted the Government would adhere to the last scheme of the Commissioners.

MR. HEALY said, he did not care a straw about this division one way or the other. He was only sorry that the Tory Party had been played upon with such false hopes, for they would not carry either division—they would not come within a mile of it. His only regret was that the Government were giving them double votes—one in the City of Dublin, where they carried on business, and one in the country where they lived. But they might jerry-mander as much as they pleased—they could not carry the county of Dublin if they jerry-mandered ten times worse than they had done. It was a sad thing that the Committee should now be taking almost its last look at Gentlemen, the Tory Members for the county of Dublin, who had so distinguished themselves in Church and State. Their complaint about the Dublin boundaries was that a resident in Rathmines, which was part of the city, was technically in the county, and thereby acquired a double vote because he carried on business in the city. He did not think it was a proper thing that those people should have this advantage, for they had no superior claims, and were not entitled to more consideration than anybody else. They were just ordinary mortals like other people, and it was hardly fair to imbue them with this tremendous political preponderance. Although the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board had declared that it was not unusual to pick out bits of urban population and form them into separate divisions, so far as Ireland was concerned, this was the only case in the entire country in which it had been done. On reference to the English maps, it would be found that the case of Tyneside showed no parity whatever. He knew the Tyneside Division perhaps better than the right hon. Baronet. But Northumberland possessed 10 Members for the county, and that entirely destroyed the possibility of jerry-mandering the divisions in the way which had been done here, for it became absolutely necessary to pick out the suburban districts from the rest. But the case of Dublin was quite different. There were these little bits of villa areas which had been treated by themselves without any necessity or excuse whatever, and this was the only case in the whole country in which the thing had been done. How had it been done? He knew the hon. Member for Dublin County (Mr. Ion Hamilton) was at the county inquiry; but was he at the city inquiry? [Mr. ION HAMILTON dissented.] The hon. Gentleman was not present, so he (Mr. Healy) would ask his attention and that of the right hon. Baronet to what occurred. At the inquiry for the county of Dublin, where he (Mr. Healy) represented the National Party, there was not one word about this present proposal; but next day, when they were holding the inquiry into the case, not of the county, but of the city, a very distinguished and able lawyer—Mr. Jackson—representing the Emergency people, came in and held up a map, and said to the Commissioners—"I was too late yesterday. I did not get my map prepared in time." (He Mr. Healy) would not pledge himself to the exact excuse made, but it was some excuse of that kind. Mr. Jackson went on—"Would you kindly look at this map?" Everybody in Court roared, it seemed so extraordinary a proposal. But that was the proposal of the Government. No chance was even given for debating it, and he thought it was most unfair that it should have been adopted by the Commissioners. It was not a fair thing to propose that scheme on a day when nobody knew that it would come on, and to adopt it without discussion. It was never supposed that the city inquiry would take up the county scheme; and when the map was handed in, nobody ever dreamed that it would receive any attention—the thing seemed so idiotic.

Mr. ION HAMILTON said, that was the first time he had heard of the circumstances described by the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. HEALY said, everything had occurred just as he had stated it; and he asked, when Mr. Jackson handed in the scheme—"Is that the scheme of the Emergency Association?" In other words, he made a joke of it, for he did not think for a moment that it could be adopted. But the Government had adopted it; and by so doing they had put another nail into the coffin of ascendancy in Ireland, because those things always impressed the minds of the people better than anything else. The Government were playing the game of the Nationalists—they could not do it better—for they were making the people believe that they could have no fair play on any subject whatsoever. Let the Government appoint a Commission on any subject whatever, and the Nationalists were bound to get no show upon it. The loss of three seats was a small matter compared with the fact which would be fixed on the hearts of the people who were to be crucified under these divisions—that, so far as the Government could manage it, they had been cheated of their rights. This was a matter of very great importance to have fixed upon the minds of the people; and he was sure that every man in the Kingstown Division would believe that he was being unjustly treated—every man in the Northern Division would believe that he had been juggled. He congratulated the Government on the way in which they had played into the hands of the Nationalists. The loss of three or four seats was a small matter when compared with the hatred and contempt which would be stored up in the minds of the people of Ireland by their conduct on the Seats Bill.

Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN wished for some explanation of a curious and remarkable fact. How in the world had it happened that the Tory propositions in every borough, whenever they had made any proposal to amend the original scheme of the Commissioners, had been adopted? How had it happened that the moment the Tory and Orange Party placed before the Commissioners their arguments, schemes, and facts, the Commissioners were converted, and all that was proposed was done? If that had happened in only one or two cases it might be supposed that it was the superior merits of the Tory scheme that went home to the hearts of the Commissioners; but when it was found that the same thing had happened all along the line the matter really required an explanation. The simple facts, which were patent to every man who looked calmly at them, were these—that the first schemes of the Commissioners were made and drawn up irrespective of Party considerations, because the Commissioners did not know the lines and locations of the political Parties in Ireland. But no sooner were they informed by the agents of the Tory Party than they gave way to them. He had heard no defence to that, and he wished hon. Members would take the trouble to look at a map of the county of Dublin, and at the original and the present scheme of the Commissioners, and they would find that there was nothing elsewhere to compare with the jerryandering which had been going on in that county. The first proposal made a somewhat equal division of the county, which was apparent on the face of the map; but no sooner did the Tory gentlemen go before the Commissioners and open their eyes and show where the Party advantage lay than the whole scheme was withdrawn, and another one forming a little Tory preserve in a corner of the county was constructed. That was manifestly unfair; and not only there, but all over Ireland, North and South, had the Commissioners yielded to the Tory representations, except in those parts where the Tories had nothing whatever to represent, because their case was hopeless. Wherever they could, by any trick or stratagem, add to the advantage of the Tories they had done so. They had gone North, South, East, and West to pick up bits and scraps of territory wherever it would suit the purposes of the Tory Party, and had yielded to the representations made to them in this unfair, irregular, and improper manner. He had heard the Tory Party jocosely spoken of as the stupid Party; but in this matter they had shown themselves a very wide-awake Party indeed. No doubt it was very right and proper on their part so to do; but what right had the Commissioners or the Government to play into the hands of those gentlemen, and to make themselves political partizans? They had a certain line of instructions; but they evaded them and did not abide by them, and they had strained everything in order to concede all that those Tory gentlemen could possibly demand. There was only one instance in Ireland in which they had not conceded everything that the Orange and Tory Party asked for. But the whole of this debate was a sham. What was the use of argument? All that the Nationalist Party could do was to make a protest. As to any effect upon this Committee, they did not expect to produce any. The Committee were nominally free to do as they liked, but practically the whole thing had been settled—the bargain had been made, and he and his Friends were only talking to the empty air, because freedom of discussion in this instance was only a sham and a farce. Nothing was to be had from it except the gratification of showing that they understood the game, and complained of it to the people of Ireland, who also understood the whole matter, and who would, at the General Election, show their appreciation of the scandalous way in which they had been treated.

MR. PLUNKET said, he thought it only fair, after what had been said by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down about this being an attempt to play into the hands of the Tories and Orangemen, that he should say a word or two upon that charge. He could speak of one gentleman who took a principal part in this inquiry—Mr. Piers White, one of the most distinguished Queen's Counsel at present at the Irish Bar, a Roman Catholic in religion, and a gentleman who had been all his life a decided Liberal in politics. [Several hon. MEMBERS: No, no!] He begged pardon of hon. Members who denied that statement. He was sorry to say that his public life had been much longer than that of some of them; and he could state of his own knowledge that Mr. Piers White had always been a decided Liberal in politics as well as a Roman Catholic. Therefore, he said that, so far as he was concerned, it was absurd to charge against him any connection with the Orange Tory faction. He had lived at Kingstown all his life, and knew every inch of the district as well as he knew the interior of that House, and he would state to the Committee what was really the condition of the problem. It was perfectly true that if they looked at the map of the county as it had been left by the decision of the Commissioners, they would see that the Kingstown Division, or, as it was to be called in the future, the Southern Division of the county, was contained within very narrow limits. That was true. It was the South-Eastern corner of the county. It contained a population of 72,000, and the division, so far as the rest of the county was concerned, was exactly equal; but it was almost impossible for the Commissioners to avoid making one a very small division and the other a large one. It would have been impossible to avoid some such division as that which had been chosen. Why was it that the Commissioners had chosen this particular way of producing the inequality of population? It was because they were instructed, rightly or wrongly, to have regard to the pursuits of the people. All those who lived in the South-Eastern District had the same pursuits. [MR. SEXTON: What are they?] A certain number of them were professional men, some were landlords, and some were merchants. At any rate, they were all of the same avenue of life, so to speak. With regard to the rest of the county, it had a much more rural population. He knew there would be some voters in the South-Eastern District who would be what they might call thoroughly agricultural people—rural people, in the ordinary sense—just as in Youghal or Balbriggan they would have a certain number of urban residents. It was obvious to everyone who knew the county that, in the course the Commissioners had adopted, they had done their best to carry out their Instructions. It was true that the Balbriggan District was much larger and much more sparsely populated. He should not have thought it necessary to intrude in the debate if it had not been for the charge of partizanship advanced against the Commissioners, which, so far as the gentleman of whom he had been speaking was concerned, was as baseless as it could be.

MR. JOHN REDMOND said, that he must say he failed to see the applicability of the remarks of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down with reference to one of these Commissioners. After all, what did the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman amount to? He told them that Mr. Piers White was an intimate friend of his own. That was, no doubt, a testimony to the character of Mr. White; but it did not affect the question at all. Then the right hon. and learned Gentleman told them that Mr. Piers White was a Roman Catholic and a Liberal. How, in the name of goodness, did that contravene the contention of the Irish Members? Their contention was that this jerrymandering had been carried on with the consent of the Liberal Government as a part of a bargain which they had made with the Tories. [A laugh.] The right hon. and learned Gentleman laughed. It was easy to do that; but no one knew better than he did what the full extent of that bargain between the two great English Parties really was. No one knew better than he that a large part of that bargain was based upon a certain arrangement being made in Ireland, so as to facilitate the return of Tory Members in certain cases where, if the rules of fairness had been observed, those Members would have had no chance. So that the fact of Mr. Piers White being a Liberal in no way exonerated him from the blame which the Irish Members justly attached to him for carrying on a policy of conceding what he could to the demands of the Liberal Party. The excuse which had been repeatedly put forward for the Commissioners, that they had made their division in order to keep together as far as possible those engaged in the same pursuits, did not, to his mind, apply to this case at all. It was absurd to talk of one of those divisions, the smaller one, as being in an urban part of the county, and the other being in an agricultural part. The Northern Division was not an agricultural division. As had been pointed out, it included a number of suburban districts, such as Malahide, Swords, and Skerries, to the North of Dublin. That was no more agricultural in reality than the Southern District. This was almost the first time that he (Mr. J. Redmond) had taken part in any of these discussions. He had listened most attentively to almost all of them, and had certainly brought to bear upon the subject a thoroughly impartial mind. He had been impressed night after night, more and more, with the conviction that these Commissioners had acted unfairly in forming these divisions in Ireland, and that they had acted unfairly with deliberation. He agreed with what had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) when he said that after all, though the Nationalists might lose some seats through this jerrymandering, they would yet have substantial consolation in the knowledge that the more such jerrymandering went on, and the more instances were recorded of the influence upon popular representation of the English Government in Ireland, the stronger would the National cause become, and the more inevitable would be the failure of that power which had been from the very commencement, and which was that day in Ireland, founded on injustice and trickery.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, that what the hon. Gentleman had just said showed the tone that had been adopted by hon. Members below the Gangway. The hon. Member presumed upon a geographical ignorance on the part of English Members when he tried to impress upon them that a large population had been included in the Northern Division. The hon. Member said that the Balbriggan Division was not a rural constituency at all, and that it included such important places as Skerries and Swords. Well, he (Colonel King-Harman) should like to ask how many people were included in that way? Those places were nothing but wretched villages, as the hon. Member well knew—

MR. JOHN REDMOND said, he mentioned other instances. He did not mention those two alone.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, that Malahide was the other—a town which in the summer season contained a certain population who went down for the sea-bathing. At other times the place could hardly be called a town at all, certainly not a town of any importance. With regard to other towns which had been mentioned in the course of the debate, they could be easily disposed of. The first Amendment moved as to County Dublin constituency was moved by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), who preferred that the name "North Dublin" should be used instead of Balbriggan, and yet he wished to see a part of the county included in the Southern Division.

Mr. John Redmond

MR. SEXTON said, he had never made any attempt of that kind at all.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he did not say that the hon. Member had made any attempt in the matter; but he had moved that Balbriggan should be called North Dublin, and the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had complained that townships included in the North should be included in the South Dublin Division. It was impossible to separate the language of one hon. Member from that of the other. Then the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. T. D. Sullivan), in common with other hon. Members, spoke a great deal about the Orange Tory Party. They had spoken about the collapse of the Government, and of the surrender of the Government to the Tory Party. It was said that these demands were made by the Orange Tory Party, and no one but the Orange Tory Party, whoever those unfortunate people were, had anything to do with it, and that a shrinking and trembling English Government had had to give in to that Party. The remarks to which he was referring were equally correct with the statement which he was sure was not made with an intention to mislead the Committee, but which would mislead the Committee—namely, that a certain scheme had been put forward by the solicitor to the Emergency Committee. Hon. Members would lead the Committee to imagine that this Emergency Committee was a body of men banded together for the suppression of all Ireland; and certain hon. Members below the Gangway especially would have it thought that those people had employed some diabolic firebrand for the purpose of blowing from the breach certain gentlemen, and misleading the Commissioners, and bringing in some dreadful scheme. But it happened that the Emergency Committee had nothing whatever to do with the county of Dublin as a political body, and nothing whatever to do with any of the schemes which had been put before the Commission. He was absent from Ireland at the time, but he believed it was a fact that the solicitors to the Emergency Committee did instruct, on behalf of certain ratepayers who were not in any way connected with the Committee, and who, to the best of his belief, were not subscribers to the Committee, and never had been—did instruct Mr. Jackson to bring in a certain scheme; but the fact that he happened to be a solicitor to the Emergency Committee was taken hold of by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, and the scheme was put before the Committee as being that of the Emergency Committee, whereas that Committee had had nothing whatever to do with it. That was an instance of the manner in which hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway strove by innuendo to mislead the Committee as to what was being done by the Orange Tory Party and the Emergency Committee—Gentlemen who did not happen to agree with him (Colonel King-Harman) in politics. He did not think that the statements of those hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway deserved much reply, because their statements were not arguments. He merely wished to point out that their innuendoes about the Orange Tory Party were a sort of bluster, to give the Committee a wrong idea, to impress upon the Committee that the Commissioners had either been Orange Tories themselves, or fools enough to be misled or coerced by them. He knew something about the solicitors to the Emergency Committee, and he was aware that they had submitted a scheme totally different from the one propounded by Mr. Jackson, and who would have brought before the Commissioners a scheme to which he (Colonel King-Harman) could have consented. [MR. HEALY: What was it?] It was one that would not have improved his (Colonel King-Harman's) position in the county of Dublin.

MR. GRAY said, that he did not think that, under all the circumstances, even the indignation of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down would have supported his position in the county of Dublin very materially. That position was so strong and so unassailable at present that it did not require that to strengthen it. He took it that if any doubt existed in the minds of the Committee as to the connection between the Orange Tory Party and the scheme which was put forward by Mr. Jackson, solicitor to the Emergency Committee, and adopted by the Commissioners, that the speech of the hon. and gallant Member had completely set all doubt in that respect at rest.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I never saw the scheme in my life until now.

MR. GRAY: The hon. and gallant Member has satisfied us on that head, and has told us what the scheme is.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I did not.

MR. HEALY: What do you know about it?

MR. GRAY: He told us that an original scheme had been propounded.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I rise to explain. What I said was, that I knew, as a matter of fact, what the scheme propounded by the two gentlemen, the solicitors to the Emergency Committee, happened to be. Whether they propounded that scheme or not before the Commissioners I cannot say. I do not know whether that was the original scheme, and I never saw it before two days ago.

MR. GRAY: That was what I said.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: You said the original scheme.

MR. GRAY: That is now one of the amended schemes that they adopted on further consideration.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: No.

MR. GRAY said, that the hon. and gallant Member acknowledged that they were the same people; but his contention was that their two capacities had no connection whatever. He (Mr. Gray) took it that innuendo was not required under any circumstances, and that assertion must take the place of innuendo. He was satisfied that those hon. Gentlemen who had listened to the speech of the hon. and gallant Member had had all the doubts in their minds now set at rest. The senior Member for the county of Dublin (Mr. Ion Hamilton) in his speech had said that he was sorry that three Members had not been given to the county of Dublin; and he (Mr. Gray) quite agreed with the hon. Member that in view of the population very nearly approaching to the number which would have secured three seats in the scheme, and in view of the character of the Metropolitan county, that three Members might very well have been given to it. But what was the nature of the scheme as it stood? The real effect of it was to give to the county only one Member. The arrangement which had now been adopted for the Southern Division—what was called the Kingstown Division—he did not know what its ultimate name would be—did not look like a division of the county at all. It was simply a group of boroughs. The Committee had decided that they would not adopt the system of grouping boroughs, the Government having said that their experience of it led them to conclude that it was not desirable. The Committee were of opinion that it was an arrangement they should not attempt to adopt; but in the present case they had grouped certain boroughs under the name of a county constituency, and given to Dublin County one Member. No one could contend for a moment that the Kingstown Division, with Blackrock and Rathmines included in it—no one could conclude that the legitimate and proper name for such a division could be other than "Kingstown," "Blackrock," or "Rathmines." It was not a county division at all. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) had said that, in order to comply with the requirements of the directions given to the Commissioners to secure equal population, it was almost impossible to adopt any scheme but that which was now before the Committee. Well, how was it that the Commissioners had, as a matter of fact, adopted a totally different scheme? Remember, they were not promulgating a scheme of their own. They said that the original scheme of the Commissioners was the better of the two—namely, the scheme which divided the county—he did not say into absolutely equal divisions, but into practically equal divisions. It would have given two constituencies to the county of Dublin. What the hon. and gallant Gentleman thought was out of the question in regard to forming two equal divisions was actually done until this solicitor—whether he was a Tory solicitor or a solicitor for the hon. and gallant Gentleman did not matter—came in with his pet scheme. When this pet scheme was brought forward the Commissioners adopted it right off. He (Mr. Gray) felt the hopelessness of arguing this question. They all knew, of course, that the Government were not going to modify the scheme in any way; but let them, at any rate, have the effects of it put plainly before the Committee. What it would really do was this—No matter what the political character of hon. Gentlemen who were returned to that House for the Kingstown Division might be, he would not in any sense be a County Member. He would be a Metropolitan Member. This division, with its large number of inhabitants, would, to all intents and purposes, have a single County Member representing it. If the Government had intended to do that it would have been better to have made this division the borough of Kingstown. He could then have understood what it meant. If it had been proposed to associate a Member with Kingstown—Kingstown having certain townships added to it to bring the population up to the required number—everything would have been above-board; but if that had been done it would have then been impossible to resist the claim of Dublin County for another Member. He thought the scheme of the Government was objectionable, and that if the Committee were left to form a free decision upon the matter, they would be likely to go back to the original scheme of the Commissioners. He would urge all who could possibly do so to protest against the proposal of the Government. It was only necessary to glance at the matter to see its absurdity; and it only required the slightest knowledge of the neighbourhood and of the character of the constituency to convince anyone that what he (Mr. Gray) stated was really a fact. The Government had practically manufactured a borough constituency out of one corner of Dublin County; and anyone who had the slightest knowledge of the neighbourhood could see that the scheme practically left only one County Member for Dublin.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was sure, from the character of the speech they had heard from the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the county of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman), it would be easily understood with what joy they all welcomed his coming amongst them in that House. The hon. and gallant Member had spoken with a certain amount of heat. In fact, to say that he had spoken was to imply that he had spoken with a certain amount of heat. With regard to the statement made as to the Emergency men, the hon. and gallant Member had thought it necessary to repudiate it very warmly. Surely the hon. and gallant Member represented the whole of the Irish people on this matter. He (Mr. O'Connor) had listened with great interest to the speech of the senior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket); and he was sure no better case could be made out for the proposal of the Commissioners than had been made out in that speech. The case was a bad one; but to his mind it had been made out by the right hon. and learned Gentleman as well as it was possible to make it out. What did the case amount to? The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said that the people in this Kingstown Division were all of similar pursuits. Well, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), who had rather a Socratic method of dealing with fallacies, had interjected a question to the right hon. and learned Gentleman as to what were the similarities of pursuit, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman had said—"Oh, some are professional men, some are landlords, and some are merchants." Well, he (Mr. O'Connor) had yet to learn that in Ireland persons who belonged to the trading classes were persons in a similar class of life to the landed aristocracy. He knew that in England nothing would be more resented by the county families than the insinuation that they belonged to the same class as the unfortunate wretches who got their living by trade. If a clear distinction between the county gentry and tradespeople had been distinctly kept in England, à fortiori it had been maintained with much greater clearness in Ireland, where the landed aristocracy had such a high regard for the privileges of caste. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had meant, no doubt, that there were large classes of persons who had their business or occupation in other parts of the county, and went out to Kingstown for private residence. But let them examine that statement for a moment. He knew very well that it was a habit of very many people in Dublin who pursued their trades in the city to spend their nights outside the city. In fact, when an unfortunate person like himself went over to Dublin, the first thing he noticed was the facility which the people of Dublin enjoyed for getting out of the smoke and turmoil of the city, by paying a small fare and taking a short railway journey to the sea or into the country. He would call the attention of those familiar with the county of Dublin, or that part immediately adjacent to Dublin, to the fact that Kingstown was only one of many places outside Dublin which the citizens resorted to for their residences. Some went to Clontarf, some to Drumcondra, some to Howth. In fact, Kingstown, Blackrock, and Bray were only some three, with a dozen or score of health and seaside and country resorts, to which the citizens of Dublin were accustomed to go for their residences. Another argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was that the populations of the two divisions were closely alike in numbers. So they were. In the Balbriggan Division there were 72,992, while in the Kingstown Division there were 72,636. No doubt, as far as the equalization of the population was concerned, the present scheme was as good a one as could be devised; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman forgot to inform the Committee of the most important fact that the original scheme of the Boundary Commissioners approached as nearly as this final scheme of theirs to that desirable and necessary equalization of population. The fact that the Boundary Commissioners themselves put forward the original scheme showed that they thought that an equalization of population was fairly reached. He had not the exact numbers by him at the present moment; but his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) informed him that the difference between the populations of the two districts in the original scheme was only 700. The difference in the population in the present scheme was 354; in other words the two schemes were alike in this—that the Boundary Commissioners were able to reach a degree of equalization in population which was unparalleled in any of the divisions of any other county in any of the three countries. Now, wherein did the old scheme differ from the new one? His hon. Friend the Member for County Carlow (Mr. Gray), whose acquaintance with County Dublin was not surpassed by any Member of the Committee, had pointed out the very important fact that the scheme with which they were now dealing was one not for giving two county Members to the county of Dublin, but practically one for the enfranchisement of the town of Kingstown. The enfranchisement of Kingstown might or might not be a desirable proposal; if the proposal were put to the Committee the Committee would deal with it on its merits, and he had no doubt hon. Members sitting above the Gangway would find many good reasons in favour of it. But it was not exactly the enfranchisement of Kingstown that had been secured by this scheme, because Rathmines had been torn from the bosom of the city to which it belonged, and had been, so to speak, pitchforked to Kingstown. Rathmines had a greater population than Kingstown, and therefore the present scheme might fairly be described as one for the enfranchisement of the town of Kingstown, which might be called Rathmines-cum-Kingstown. That, again, he maintained was a proposition which could have been fairly discussed on its merits. Some of them would have objected to the ugliness of the name, and some of them would say that Rathmines, which to all intents and purposes belonged to Dublin, should not be separated from that city, and be hung on to another town which was seven miles distant. The present proposal was one for the enfranchisement of a constituency which he would call Rathmines-cum-Kingstown; in other words it was a proposal for the grouping of boroughs of different character, a system to which all the Members of the Government concerned in this Bill had declared their inveterate hostility. In one of the first speeches which the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) made upon the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman declared that the Government were distinctly unfavourable to the principle of grouping of boroughs; he said that the plan had been tried in former Redistribution Bills, and it had not been very successful in its results, and that while the Government might be disposed under the stress of circumstances to permit existing groups to remain, they had no intention whatever to make additions to that anomalous and unsatisfactory state of things. When the right hon. Gentleman said that he had not the case of County Dublin in his mind, he could scarcely have contemplated being called upon at a later period of the Bill to stand up and defend a scheme which really amounted to a grouping of different boroughs in one constituency. No doubt, he (Mr. O'Connor) and his hon. Friends were speaking against a foregone conclusion; but they might console themselves with the reflection that they had obtained a moral victory.

MR. HEALY said, that this was a matter in which the Tory Party were quite as much interested as he and his hon. Friends. He asked the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) to consider for a moment the figures in this case. Armagh, as he had said, was the only constituency in Ireland which was to have three Members. In 1841, Armagh had a population of 231,000; in 1861, 180,000; in 1871, 179,000; and in 1881, 160,000—a sinking population all the time. What was the case with regard to Dublin? In 1841, Dublin County had a population of 140,000; in 1861, 155,000; in 1871, 158,000; and in 1881, 170,000—a rising population all the time. Now, that was a very important fact; and he asked the Government whether, as the Armagh population was always falling and it had three Representatives, and the Dublin population was always rising and it had only two Members, he and his hon. Friends were not entitled to some reconsideration of the matter? Of course, if the Bill passed in its present cast-iron form they would be unable to get redress when the population of one county very much exceeded that of the other. The Tories were interested in this matter, for he imagined that out of the three Members they would certainly be entitled to one, whereas out of the two Members they would not get one. When the Irish Land Act was under consideration the Government were willing to accept a proposal that at the end of seven years a Commission should issue for the purpose of taking facts into consideration as to the continuance of the Land Commission; and he thought it would be well on Report, if the Government were unable to do so now, to consider whether a Commission should issue in five or six years' time to re-adjust the relative representation of the counties of Armagh and Dublin. This was not a small matter. The population of the Metropolitan county in any country would always rise, whereas a rustic population like that of Armagh would in Ireland be found to decrease. There was more emigration from Ulster than from any other Province in Ireland. The population of County Dublin had increased 30 or 40 per cent in the same number of years. Now, if this Bill was to last for 20 or 30 years, the population of County Dublin would in all probability by the end of that time have reached 250,000. The population of Armagh, however, would have sunk to perhaps 120,000 or 130,000; and still, by reason of the fact that there was no adjustable principle in the Bill, Armagh would have three Members and Dublin would only have two. An additional reason why a reconsideration in this matter should take place was that Dublin City had been very badly treated. He would be quite content to leave it to the Lord Lieutenant to say that when Armagh had sunk to a lower population than Dublin a Commission should issue to adjust the representation. This was not a matter upon which there could be any political feeling, because he had no doubt that in course of time the Nationalists would be able to win two of the three seats in Armagh. Catholics were gradually gaining the North of Ireland, and in a short time they would equal, if not exceed, the Protestants. Anyone who knew the North of Ireland knew that in certain counties when there was a farm for sale a Catholic always stepped in and bought it, while the emigration amongst Protestants was a higher percentage. In consequence of that there would, in course of time, be a much larger Catholic population than there was now. He hoped the Postmaster General would be able to see his way to provide that in a given time there should be a reconsideration of the representation allotted to the counties of Armagh and Dublin.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the question of a third Member for County Dublin had been discussed several times.

MR. HEALY: Not in relation to this particular point.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: No; in relation to the general subject. But it had never been stated where the additional Member was to come from.

MR. HEALY said, that the right hon. Gentleman had not understood him properly. What he asked was that a provision should be put in the Bill by which, when the population of Armagh sank below that of Dublin, the Lord Lieutenant should have power by Commission to allot the third Member from Armagh to Dublin.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he quite understood the hon. and learned Member. The proposal was that the Lord Lieutenant or some other authority should have the power when, as it was expected it would, the population of the county of Dublin became greater than that of the county of Armagh, to give to County Dublin the third Member now allotted to County Armagh. Such a proposal seemed to him (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) to introduce a very extraordinary principle, one which, if adopted in the case of Dublin, would be claimed for a great many other constituencies with an increasing population. The principle was one which he was persuaded the Committee would not accede to. The fact was that the Members had been allotted to the various counties upon the Census of 1881, and quite irrespective of the question whether the population was an increasing or decreasing one. After a certain number of years there would, no doubt, be a disproportion between the various constituencies—the population of some would be lower and that of some higher; but that was a matter which would have to be determined some 10 or 20 years hence, when the question of redistribution came up again for consideration. The immediate question before the Committee was whether the boundaries now determined upon were proper ones or not; whether the determinations of the Commissioners were or were not in conformity with their Instructions. That was a question which really laid in a nut-shell. In his opinion, anybody who looked at the map, and at the condition of the population, and at the Instructions given to the Commissioners, would admit that the conclusions come to were just and proper.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 70; Noes 19: Majority 51.—(Div. List, No. 112.)

MR. HEALY said, that before they left the county of Dublin he should like to ask the right hon. Baronet opposite why Ballyrobe was omitted, and what precautions were being taken to prevent mistakes?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that every precaution was being taken which could be taken. The Irish part of the Schedule, as the hon. and learned Member would notice, had not been printed with the same care as the Scotch and English portions. That was owing to the fact of their having been delayed in their Irish work. The Scotch work had been very light; but the Irish work had been very heavy, like the English. The Irish Schedules had been printed in a great hurry; but every care had been taken to amend them as they had been going along.

MR. HEALY said, he should like to say a word by way of caution. It would be well for the right hon. Baronet not to rely too much on discovering mistakes in connection with the Irish divisions through the agency of the Irish Members in the House, because the Irish Members had been directing their attention to the political aspect of the matter; whereas in regard to the English part of the Bill hon. Members had been looking as much after names as after political matter. In that way many glaring mistakes might have escaped the Irish Members. He would, therefore, ask that the right hon. Baronet would pay especial attention to this point, in the endeavour to be accurate, and to make the Bill so. He hoped that before Report the right hon. Baronet would put in train all the inquiries he could in order to make the measure as perfect as possible.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that his noble Friend (Viscount Crichton), who had an Amendment on the Paper, had been called away; and he (Lord George Hamilton) was not able to make the proposal, as he was not sufficiently acquainted with the localities. He would, however, give Notice that his noble Friend would move an Amendment on Report.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: And I give Notice that I shall be obliged to oppose it.

MR. KENNY said, he had a Notice on the Paper to move, in page 98, line 4, to leave out "Connemara" Division, and to insert "West Galway" Division. There were two slightly conflicting Amendments on the Paper in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Galway (Colonel Nolan); but he might say that he substantially agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman's proposals, and that he would therefore modify his own original Amendment, and would, in place of it, move, in line 4, to leave out the word "The," and let the word "Connemara" stand.

Amendment proposed, in page 98, line 4, to leave out the word "The."—(Mr. Kenny.)

MR. KENNY said, he wished to move to leave out "The Tuam Division," in order to insert "The North Galway Division."

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 98, line 7, to leave out the words "The Tuam Division," in order to insert the words "The North Galway Division."—(Mr. Kenny.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'The Tuam Division' stand part of the Schedule."

MR. JOHN REDMOND said, that before the Amendment was put he thought it only fair that it should be stated that the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway County (Colonel Nolan) felt very strongly upon these points. He had asked him (Mr. Redmond) to take the opportunity of mentioning the fact. The hon. and gallant Member had not asked him to press his Amendment, especially as there was a difference of opinion amongst the Irish Members with regard to it. But he had asked him to state his opinion, which was entertained by a large part of the people of the district, that the name of "Tuam" should remain. It was unnecessary to state the reasons which lay at the bottom of that opinion. Tuam was the name of a very ancient place, the seat of an Archbishopric, and one that was well known and respected. He thought it should be retained. However, he was fulfilling his duty by mentioning the objection the hon. and gallant Member entertained to the Amendment. No doubt, on Report, the hon. and gallant Member would bring forward an Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HEALY said, that he would now move that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. It would be understood that they had only got to line 20, and that, of course, saved his Amendment. When they came to line 20 they would take the Northern Division of Londonderry, and they would have to alter the title. He should like to ask the right hon. Baronet, in order that they might know exactly where they stood, when, as they had made very fair progress that night, they might expect the Bill to come on again?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Healy.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the Navy Estimates would come on on Monday, and this Bill would be taken on Tuesday, and he hoped it might be finished in reasonable time, judging from the Amendments that were on the Paper on that day. He would propose that the Report should be taken as the first Order on Monday week.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he had heard the statement of the right hon. Baronet with extreme surprise. They had discussed this matter at Question time that day, and the Prime Minister had given them to understand that if the Bill was not finished that night it would be continued on Monday. Everyone knew at that time that there was no chance of the Bill being finished that night. It was one of those open secrets that everyone acquainted with Parliamentary Business was well acquainted with. He knew several Gentlemen who, on going away that night, were going out of town, and had left under the impression that this Bill would come on on Monday. He must express his strong objection to a sudden change of opinion being arrived at at that late hour of the night, and after a statement of a different kind had been made in a full House earlier in the evening.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had consulted with hon. Gentlemen opposite on the matter, and the arrangement he proposed to carry out had been the result of that communication. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) was anxious that the Navy Estimates should be taken, and the Government had agreed to take them on Monday; because otherwise they did not know when they would be able to bring them on. The Government felt that they could not get to Report of the Bill on Monday, and that if they had put the Bill down for that day they would have lost all opportunity of taking the Navy Estimates, without gaining anything.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that he had had a conversation with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), and his impression of that conversation was opposed to what seemed to be the impression of the right hon. Baronet. The inconvenience of the course proposed was undoubted. It must be inconvenient to all those Members who left the House that evening at 6 o'clock, fully persuaded that this Bill would come on on Monday, and not on Tuesday. He (Mr. Balfour) should feel bound to raise this question again.

MR. HEALY: I hope the hon. Member does not consider that the Irish Members are getting any advantage.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, no!

MR. HEALY: Because, as far as we are concerned, we would far rather that the Bill should come on on Monday.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that he communicated on the subject with the Leader of the Opposition, and had understood from him that the course now proposed would be the most convenient.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that he agreed with the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Balfour) that the alteration of the original arrangement would be very inconvenient to Members who were not now in the House; but, on the other hand, he believed there would be a great deal of advantage in the course proposed, because they would all agree that it was desirable to get through the Bill as soon as possible, and that it was desirable to make progress with the Navy Estimates. It was clear that if these were not taken on Monday it would not be possible to go on with the Government Business for some days.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that if they did take the Bill the first thing on Monday it would lead to considerable difficulty, and they would not be able to take the Navy Estimates for a considerable time. The Budget proceedings would occupy a long period.

MR. WHITLEY agreed that the course the Government was proposing was inconvenient. Indeed, this was not the first time arrangements which had been made earlier in the evening in a full House were upset by agreement subsequently entered into. On two or three occasions when the Prime Minister had announced a certain course of proceeding he had observed that later on that course had been altered.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to hon. Members that this discussion is becoming irregular. The question as to what day the Bill should be deferred to does not come on until I have made my Report to Mr. Speaker. If there is to be a discussion at all, the proper time to raise it would be when a Motion is made to appoint a day for the resumption of the Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, after what had fallen from his noble Friend and the right hon. Baronet opposite he would not press the matter further; but he trusted that the Government would not in future suddenly, and at the close of a Sitting, alter the course of Business arranged in a full House at Question time.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, it was definitely understood that the Committee would be continued on Monday, if not finished at the present Sitting. The Prime Minister was asked when the Navy Estimates would be proceeded with, if not taken on Monday, and he replied that he could not then fix a day for them; and as it was evident to everybody the Committee on the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill would not finish that night, Members interested in the Navy Estimates had gone away with the understanding that the Estimates would not be taken on Monday.

MR. HEALY said, perhaps it might abate the indignation of hon. Gentlemen to know the reason for the change. If the Committee finished on Monday, then Tuesday would be set free for Motions; and it happened that Irish Members had the first place for the Motion impugning the conduct of the Speaker, and that the Government wished to get rid of.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he was a party to the re-arrangement; but he was not aware what Business was down for Tuesday; he was sure the hon. and learned Member would take his word for that.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday next.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

EGYPTIAN LOAN BILL.—[BILL 122.]

(Sir Arthur Otway, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Hibbert.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. HEALY said, so far this Bill had proceeded without the intervention of the Irish Party in the debates; but he could not, as an Irish Member, allow it to pass without a protest, and he intended to divide against this stage. He had not intervened, and would not do so now, except to offer a protest against the proposal to grant a loan of an immense amount to a bankrupt Power, while advances for desirable and necessary public works in Ireland were refused. Protesting against this disposal of public money, and that afterwards it might not be said that the Bill passed nemine contradicente, he should challenge the question, and take a division.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 42; Noes 17: Majority 25.—(Div. List, No. 113.)

Bill read the third time, and passed.

TELEGRAPH ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 121.]

(Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Hibbert.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Second Reading be deferred till Monday."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

MR. WARTON said, he noted what was said about this Bill in the afternoon by the Postmaster General—namely, that it would not be taken until it could be reached at a reasonable hour. Now, was there any hope of that opportunity being found on Monday? Why not put the Bill down for Friday, when there would be far more chance of finding a reasonable hour for it?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, it would be better to set down the Bill for Monday. Of course, he should adhere to his undertaking not to bring it on except at a reasonable time; but that time might be found on Monday.

Motion agreed to.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (EXPENSES OF CONFERENCES) BILL.—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. Leake, Mr. Algernon Egerton, Mr. Agnew, Mr. Arnold.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 10th April.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2 (Expenses of local authorities may be allowed).

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 13, after the word "Board," to insert the words "in that behalf."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HEALY said, when the Amendment was moved on a previous occasion he expressed a hope that the Government would see their way to the insertion of a clause extending the Bill to Ireland. Since then he had been given to understand the Government had agreed to that suggestion, and perhaps it would be convenient to the Solicitor General for Ireland at that point to state his proposal.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he saw no objection to the Bill being extended to Ireland, and he had prepared an Amendment in the form of a new clause to come in after Clause 3.

MR. WARTON said, he was willing to do whatever would facilitate progress, and would withdraw his Amendment if the hon. and learned Gentleman wished to introduce words making the clause applicable to the Local Government Board (Ireland). Understanding from the hon. and learned Gentleman's gesture that was not so, he would move the insertion of the words.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Interpretation).

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, as consequential upon the clause to follow and to make Clause 3 applicable to England he proposed to put in the words "in England."

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 26, after the word "that," to insert the words "in England."—(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

New Clause (Application of the Act to Ireland,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. HEALY asked what was the clause?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, it was to the effect that the term Local Government Board should mean the Local Government Board (Ireland), substituting the Act of 1878 for the English Act of 1875, and that the term "Local Authority" should mean Rural Sanitary Authority and Urban Sanitary Authority.

MR. HEALY said, he was not so conversant with the Act as he ought to be. Did the term "Urban Sanitary Authority" include "Town Commissioners?"

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Yes.

Clause agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be reported to the House."—(Mr. Leake.)

MR. HEALY said, there was a small matter in connection with the Preamble which, perhaps, it was scarcely worth while referring to; but the Preamble set forth that "whereas doubts have arisen," &c. Those doubts, however, never had arisen in connection with the Irish Act, and it would be better to strike out the Preamble. Those Preambles were all humbug, and were generally omitted. Why have a Preamble at all?

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. and learned Member that the Committee have agreed to the Preamble. Of course the hon. and learned Member could move to omit the Preamble on Report, and the Bill having been amended there must be a "Report" stage.

Motion agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday 27th April, and to be printed. [Bill 129.]

MOTIONS.

MEDICAL ACT (1858) AMENDMENT BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend 'The Medical Act, 1858.'"—(Dr. Lyons.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked, did the hon. Member mean to re-introduce the particular Government Bill of last year?

DR. LYONS said, that was not at all his object. It would be a small Bill having for its object the removal of disabilities of certain practitioners who were Members of the Irish College of Physicians, with reference to certain appointments in England, where it was a condition that candidates should be Members or Fellows of certain Colleges, and also to insert on the Register the title of Master of Obstetrics granted by the University of Dublin.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Dr. LYONS.

CIVIL SERVICE EXPENDITURE.

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. NOEL be a Member of the Select Committee."—(Mr. Hibbert.)

MR. SEXTON said, he thought this Committee was badly nominated. Of the proposed 15 Members only one belonged to the Irish Party, and he, though very competent for the duty, was not now in attendance in the House, nor did he know when his hon. Friend could attend. The subject of the proposed inquiry had particular interest for Irish Members, inasmuch as Ireland contributed more than her share towards the general expenditure, and received much less than her fair proportion in return. Several of the Departments were starved to the disadvantage of Ireland, and the whole system of Civil Service administration in Ireland deserved the serious attention of the House. For instance, in the Board of Works Department it was the custom to prepare inflated Estimates spent in the increase of the pay and allowances of permanent officials, by a system very nearly approaching fraud. He maintained that a representation of the Irish Party by one Member was altogether inadequate, and whenever his hon. Friend (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) could not attend a meeting they would have no Representative. He would suggest a postponement of the subject, unless the Government would give them something like a real representation. It could not be pretended that a fifteenth was an adequate representation of the Irish Party on a subject in which Ireland had a special and peculiar interest.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he understood that his noble Friend who had charge of the arrangement of these matters had consulted the Representative of hon. Members on the Benches opposite in reference to this Committee.

MR. SEXTON said, yes; but offered only one nomination.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, this was the first intimation of any dissatisfaction with name or number; there had been no suggestion of it, and they were taken quite by surprise. These arrangements were made, as necessarily they must be, by understandings arrived at beforehand.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) said, in reference to the constitution of the Committee, that his hon. Friend the Member for North Lincoln (Mr. Winn) had only nominated five Members; not that he complained of that—no doubt it was a proper arrangement. He was one of those nominated; but owing to a change of circumstances, of which the House was aware, he was afraid he should be unable to give much attention to the proceedings. But what he desired to point out was that this Committee was not struck in the usual way; the object had evidently been very naturally and properly to put upon it Gentlemen selected rather with a view to their acquaintance with the subject of inquiry than with regard to the balance of Parties. He apprehended it was not a question into which political feeling would enter. He only mentioned that to show that Irish Members were only in the same position, as regarded proportion, as the Conservative Party.

MR. SHEIL said, he did not understand that his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was dissatisfied with the name of the hon. Member (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) on the Committee. He (Mr. Sheil) was responsible for that nomination; but it must not be assumed that when the noble Lord (Lord Richard Grosvenor), coming for a name, received it, that thereupon the Irish Party were necessarily satisfied. It was no part of his duty to point out the faults he might think existed in the constitution of the Committee. So far as his duty was concerned, it was fulfilled by handing in the name of the hon. Member (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) when asked to nominate a Member.

MR. HEALY said, it must be understood, as observed by his hon. Friend, whose zeal and activity was well known, that his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) in no degree desired to cast any slur upon the nomination—quite the contrary. There was some force in the remark of the Home Secretary; and all must feel that in the delicate duty of appointing a Committee it was necessary to have some understanding as to what should take place, to avoid, as far as possible, discussions of a personal character. If the noble Lord had instructions to put in a Member of the Party, of course he would go to his hon. Friend the Irish "Whip" (Mr. Sheil), and so the name would be settled. But in the House the Party had a perfect right to challenge the proportion of their representation. Surely the Home Secretary would see they were entitled to some consideration. Apart from any other considerations, why not treat them fairly in proportion to their numbers? It might be the Committee would not finish its task, and would have to be re-cast after the General Election. Why wrangle over such a point for an hour at such an hour? If the Irish Party had more than their right, would it "set the Thames on fire?" Was there anything of a revolutionary nature to be apprehended from the proceedings of this Committee? Why show such an ungracious grudging spirit? Indeed, they were under an obligation to his hon. Friend for his endeavour to get Ireland properly represented in this matter. He would ask the Government, who demanded 14 Representatives and Ireland one, were Irish Representatives such formidable persons that another could not be trusted on the Committee? Surely they would not pay Irish Members the extravagant compliment of supposing that another of their number would upset the balance?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he might mention that in the nomination of another Committee, a Motion for which was on the Paper, though it would not be moved, were two Members from the Party opposite below the Gangway out of a total of 15—more than the proper portion. He would suggest that it was open to Members to increase the numbers of this Committee.

MR. HEALY asked, would the Government agree to that?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he could not promise that.

MR. HIBBERT said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not present; the arrangements for the Committee had been agreed upon with his right hon. Friend, and it would be inconvenient to alter those arrangements in his absence. He (Mr. Hibbert) would suggest that the Committee should be appointed as proposed, and that subsequently a Motion might be made by any hon. Member to increase the number of the Committee by two; one of these might then be a Member from Ireland. He might mention that already there were two Irish Members nominated out of 15.

MR. HEALY said, one was merely a Liberal Member.

MR. HIBBERT: Of course, if two Members were added to the Committee, Ireland would have a fair claim for another Member.

MR. BIGGAR said, the best way of ending the controversy would be to adjourn the debate to Monday, giving the Chancellor of the Exchequer the opportunity of making up his mind. He therefore moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. HEALY said, he would ask the Speaker on a point of Order whether, if this was the first time—as he believed it was—that this Notice of Motion had appeared on the Paper, objection taken was not in itself sufficient to bring the Motion within the operation of the Half-past 12 Rule, and necessitate a postponement?

MR. SPEAKER: The nomination of a Committee is excepted from the Half-past 12 Rule.

MR. HEALY said, he thought it was brought within the Standing Orders.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member is referring to a separate paragraph in the Standing Order relating to Standing Committees. The nomination of an ordinary Select Committee is also exempted from the Half-past 12 Rule.

MR. HIBBERT appealed to the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) not to press his Motion. He would certainly use his influence with the Chancellor of the Exchequer to increase the number on the Committee to 17. He was not in a position to promise that that would be done; but he would promise to use his influence in favour of it; and if the number was made 17, two of the whole should be Members of the Irish Party.

MR. SEXTON said, if they were satisfied that this would be done their object would be gained. He did not doubt the goodwill and bona fides of the Secretary to the Treasury; but a speech hostile to their desire had been delivered by the Home Secretary. Neither of the Cabinet Ministers present had offered to support the Secretary to the Treasury. If either would promise their aid there would be no objection to the appointment of the Committee.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 14; Noes 36: Majority 22.—(Div. List, No. 114.)

Question again proposed, "That Mr. NOEL be a Member of the Committee."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock till Monday next.

SUPPLY—THE VOTE OF CREDIT.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, there was an understanding last week, correctly or incorrectly, on this side of the House, that the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would be prepared to make some statement to the House to-night preparatory to the statement which is to be made in the House of Commons on the subject of the Vote of Credit. It would be satisfactory to know what the intention of the noble Earl is.

EARL GRANVILLE: It is a fact that a statement is to be made in the House of Commons on the Motion for the Vote of Credit, and I shall make a somewhat similar statement to your Lordships at the same time. I believe the Vote of Credit will be asked for to-morrow, and I shall then avail myself of the opportunity of addressing your Lordships. I may state that a telegraphic despatch was received from Sir Peter Lumsden on Friday, and that the character of that despatch was confirmatory of his own statement of the case, and in contradiction to that which has been put forward by General Komaroff. We are expecting still further details from Sir Peter Lumsden on the subject.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: Is the House to expect a further statement from the noble Earl on this important matter?

EARL GRANVILLE: Yes.

HONORARY FREEDOM OF BOROUGHES
BILL.—(No 61.)

(The Marquess of Ripon.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that its object was to give to all municipal boroughs in England the power of conferring their honorary freedom on distinguished men. Burghs in Scotland possessed the power, as did also the City of London; and he knew of no reason why other important towns in England should not be placed in the same position. His attention had first been drawn to the subject in his capacity of High Steward of Hull. The citizens of that town desired to have the power which the Bill would confer, and he had endeavoured to effect their object by introducing a clause for that purpose in a Private Bill. The noble Earl on the Woolsack, as Chairman of Committees, had, however, objected to that course, and he had consequently introduced the present Bill, which had the approval of the Home Secretary and of the Leader of the Opposition in their Lordships' House.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

MALTA—SALARY OF THE GOVERNOR AND OTHER OFFICIALS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the salary of the Lieutenant-Governor of Malta has been placed on the Civil List of the Island contrary to Her Majesty's instructions of 11th May 1849, to the promises of the Malta Government conveyed to the Elected Members of Council by letters dated 8th February and 1st April 1868, to a Resolution in Council 7th April 1868, and to the despatches of the Duke of Buckingham of 20th March and 16th May 1868; and, whether any instructions on this subject have been given by the present Secretary of State to the Governor for the last occasion on which the matter was brought before the Council? The noble Lord explained that not long ago the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) proposed that a considerable addition should be made to the salary of the Chief Secretary of Malta, upon whom the title of Lieutenant Governor was conferred, and to the salary of the Chief Justice. Now, ever since 1848 it had been a part of the Constitution of Malta that any proposal to make additions to official salaries should be communicated to and made through the Council of the Island. This practice had not been adhered to in the case to which he wished to draw attention. The Elected Members of Council also complained that the noble Earl's plan was only ratified by the interposition of the Governor, who gave his casting vote in favour of it, their objection being that he ought not to have exercised his right to vote in connection with a matter of local, and not Imperial interest.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that he had no difficulty in giving the explanation which the noble Viscount asked for, and he thought it would be satisfactory. The question which was brought before the Council of Malta was not one involving an addition to the expenses of the Civil List. It was, in fact, of a contrary nature. According to the arrangement that prevailed two years ago, the Governor received £5,000 a-year, which came entirely from the local Revenues. The Colonial Secretary received £1,000. Some complaints were made that the salary of the Governor was received by him partly in respect of services rendered in his military capacity, and it was argued that such services ought to be paid for out of Imperial instead of local Revenues. Thinking that there was some justice in these complaints, and with the view of relieving the finances of Malta, he made the arrangement which came into operation two years ago. By that arrangement the duty of paying a part of the Governor's salary—namely, £2,000—was transferred to the War Department, and so far the salary became an Imperial instead of a local charge. That set free a sum of £2,000 a-year upon the Civil List; and as in consequence of the arrangement the duties of the Colonial Secretary were considerably increased, it seemed fair that some portion of the sum so set free should be used to increase his salary. He was accordingly given £1,600 a-year instead of £1,000; but the net result of the transaction was to benefit the local finances to the extent of £1,400 annually. As to the question whether the Governor had a right to vote on the occasion referred to, he had to say that he could not agree that questions involving the transfer of part of the Governor's functions and the creation of a Lieutenant Governor could be regarded as exclusively local, and not Imperial.

MALTA—LIST OF THE NOBLES.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH, in asking the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will cause a list of the Nobles of Malta, whose titles have been recognized by Her Majesty, to be published in The London Gazette, as was recently done in the case of a Canadian nobleman? said, that the nobility of Malta was not a mushroom nobility, but had existed for hundreds of years. Many of the titles went back as far as the 13th century, and the rights of the nobility had been over and over again confirmed in Statutes by the Grand Masters; and when Malta was handed over to this country a solemn engagement was given that all their rights and privileges should be respected. It was felt by them as a great grievance that the recognition formerly accorded to them had been taken away by despatches from the Colonial Office. When Queen Adelaide visited the Island he was present, and the nobility occupied the place of precedence. Things went on in the same way until His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was in the Island. On that occasion the matter was referred to the Governor, and he understood that the Judges somehow or other claimed to take precedence of the nobility contrary to all precedent. The question was referred to Lord Carnarvon, then at the Colonial Office; and though he would be the last person to accuse his noble Friend of neglecting any matter that came before him, he could not help thinking that the noble Earl could have paid but slight attention to the subject, for he wrote back that the precedence always allowed to the nobility should give place to that of the Judges, and in a subsequent despatch he extended the precedence to the Judges' wives. That had created a very unpleasant feeling in Malta. He had been long acquainted with the Island, and he could say that the nobility were strongly attached to the British connection, and that many of them were of considerable wealth, cultivated intelligence, and eminently fitted to adorn the high station they before occupied. They naturally felt grieved that their position and their representations had been persistently ignored by the Colonial Office. The noble Earl was asked on a recent occasion whether he would permit their titles to be published in The London Gazette. Unless that was done they would have no status at the English Court. Considering this as a matter of policy, he thought that the claims of the nobility of Malta should be recognized. In India we should not attempt for a moment to refuse their high rank to the Princes and nobles of that country, nor ought we to do it in this case, because we had no danger to apprehend. What he would ask was whether the noble Earl would allow those titles to be published in The London Gazette, so that those gentlemen might take their places at the English Court?

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that there was no intention on his part, and he was sure there had been none on the part of any of his Predecessors, to treat with disrespect or neglect the Maltese nobility. They were a very respectable but not a numerous body, consisting of between 20 and 30 families. When he saw the Question of the noble Viscount on the Paper he referred the matter to Sir Albert Woods, Garter King-at-Arms in Heralds' College, who was the highest authority on such points; and he received an answer the purport of which was that what the noble Viscount proposed—namely, the publication of the list of those nobles in The London Gazette, would certainly not have the effect the noble Viscount desired. It would not, he was informed, give the possessors of Maltese titles rank or precedence in England; and, with respect to the rank and precedence they enjoyed in Malta, their status had been fully recognized. What the noble Viscount proposed, therefore, would not alter their status in any respect. The noble Viscount raised another question—that of their precedence as compared with the precedence of official dignitaries in the Island. That was not the Question which the noble Viscount had given Notice of, but referred to an entirely different matter; but he believed it was a general rule in the Colonies and in India, as well as in Malta, that official rank took precedence.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH said, what he wished to state was that the grievance felt most strongly was that the conditions upon which Malta had been annexed to this country had not been observed. It was promised that all the rights of the nobility should be preserved, and that they should enjoy the same position with respect to public functionaries as they had enjoyed at the time of the Grand Masters.

THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH: Perhaps your Lordships will allow me to say a few words on this matter. Your Lordships must be fully aware that the intercourse between the English and Maltese societies does not always run quite smoothly, and I think that if the noble Earl, although he may not be in the position to accord entirely what the noble Viscount's Motion proposes, could yet in some way further recognize the position of the nobles of Malta, it would be a great benefit. There is one point to which I would venture to allude as creating a difficulty between English and Maltese societies, and that is the absolute refusal of the members of the club to receive the Maltese within the club. I think—and I have always expressed myself at Malta in the same sense—that that is the greatest possible mistake, and a great injustice to those high-minded Maltese gentlemen who are so anxious to become members there. I think, perhaps, if the Government could in any way give some further recognition to the position of the nobility in Malta, it might act as a great inducement to the members of the club to elect Maltese to it; and I am certain that the result would be that intercourse there would run far more smoothly, and I am sure would only tend to strengthen British rule in that Island.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the subject referred to by the illustrious Duke was not within the competence of the Government. He was quite sure the Maltese nobility would feel very grateful for the interest shown in their position by their Lordships' House; and he cordially concurred in what had been said, that it was most desirable that the social relations between the Maltese and the English should be closer and more cordial than hitherto.

POISONS BILL.—(No. 33.)

(The Lord President.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read, and discharged.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL), in moving that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, said, that the measure was a very necessary attempt to improve the law relating to the registration of poisons. The subject was one of some perplexity and no little difficulty, and he hoped their Lordships would agree to the Motion.

Moved, "That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee."—(The Lord President.)

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN, who had given Notice that on the Motion for going into Committee on the Bill he would move — “That the House resolve itself into Committee on the Bill this day six months,” said, he felt very strongly that a measure on this subject was necessary, right, and proper. At the same time, however, he was of opinion that the Bill now before their Lordships was not a good one, and that it was extremely likely to harass and hamper legitimate trade. It had been brought forward without any reference to the interests of the trade or to the interests of the public; and on that ground he appealed to the noble Lord some time ago to refer it to a Select Committee. The noble Lord did not at the time see his way to respond to the appeal, but had now done so; and he had no doubt that the inquiry on the subject would prove to be of great value even if the Bill did not pass this Session. He should withdraw his Notice on the Paper, and he hoped the Motion of the noble Lord would be carried.

Motion agreed to.

Bill referred accordingly.

AFRICA (RED SEA COAST) — THE ITALIANS AT MASSOWAH.

QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked Her Majesty's Government, If it is true that Arab prisoners have been handed over for custody to the Italians at Massowah; and, if so, by what right under the Law of Nations the Italian forces can be asked to become gaolers of these prisoners, since making prisoners of war carried with it the responsibility of feeding them properly, and if these prisoners attempted to escape the Italians would have no right to use force to detain them? He also asked whether it was true that forced labour had been employed on the railway near Wady Halfa, and that these labourers were kept 12 or 13 hours at work, and worked under the lash?

EARL GRANVILLE, in reply, said, that he was unable to give any answer to the first part of the Question of the noble Lord, as Her Majesty's Government had no communication on the subject. As to the second part of the Question, the information of the Government appeared to be contrary to that of the noble Lord; because, so far from the railway being laid by forced labour, it was being constructed by Egyptian soldiers.

House adjourned at Five o'clock,
till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY (VARIOUS POWERS) BILL.

SIR ARTHUR OTWAY said, he had to make a Motion in regard to this Bill which was almost of a formal character, and had been made on similar occasions in previous years. There was a matter coming before a Select Committee connected with the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway; and, as he was formerly a Director of that Railway, he thought it better that the Bill should be adjudicated upon by some other person than himself. He had consulted the Chairman of the Standing Order Committee, who had been good enough to consent to take this particular Committee; and he, therefore, begged to move, as on previous occasions, under Standing Order No. 109—“That the Chairman of the Committee on Standing Orders be appointed Chairman of the Committee on the Bill.”

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Chairman of the Committee on Standing Orders be appointed Chairman of the Committee on the Bill.

MOTION.

—o—

POST OFFICE SITES [PURCHASE OF LAND AND EXPENSES].

RESOLUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, To-morrow, resolve itself into Committee upon Post Office Sites [Purchase of Land and Expenses]."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

MR. HEALY asked if the Government proposed to set up this Bill to-morrow?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Yes. It is simply a Motion to enable a Bill to be set up in Committee of the Whole House.

MR. HEALY appealed to the Speaker whether the course proposed to be taken was regular?

MR. SPEAKER said, there was nothing irregular in it.

MR. HEALY remarked that if that were so, how was it that the Bill had not been printed?

MR. SPEAKER: I understand that this is the first stage to allow the Bill to be introduced.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: This is merely a formal stage in order to enable a financial Bill to be set up.

MR. HEALY: I understand that this is a Money Bill, and I ask why this stage was not taken in the first instance, instead of waiting until after the Bill had been read a second time? I presume that, this being a Money Bill, the Half-past Twelve o'clock Rule would not operate; but really the way in which the measure has been dealt with makes it extremely difficult for the House to understand whether it is a Money Bill or not. I understand, Sir, that you have now ruled that the Bill is a Money Bill, although the Orders of the House have not been complied with, and the measure was not introduced in Committee of the Whole House in the first instance. I think the question is one of some importance to the House generally, or we shall never be able to know whether a Bill is a Money Bill or not; I submit with respect, as the sanction of no Committee has yet been obtained, the Half-past Twelve o'clock Rule should operate.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The Bill was not brought in as a Money Bill, and, as a matter of fact, it was blocked, and could not be brought on after half-past 12 o'clock. At present, the Bill is not a Money Bill.

MR. HEALY: I understand that you, Sir, have ruled this to be a Money Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General now says that it is not a Money Bill, and I wish to know which view is correct?

MR. SPEAKER: This is entirely a different proceeding for the purpose of setting up a Bill, and it is necessary to pass a Resolution in Committee for the purpose of sanctioning a Money Clause in a Bill. The Bill itself is not entirely a Money Bill; but it will contain a clause which is a Money Clause, and in order to bring that clause in harmony with the Rules of the House it is necessary to set up the Bill in Committee, so that the Money Clause may be inserted in it.

MR. HEALY: I perfectly understand that point; but if it is not yet a Money Bill it will be perfectly possible to block the measure to-morrow. For the purpose of obtaining your ruling upon the point to-morrow, I propose to block the Bill to-night.

MR. SPEAKER: I understand that the Bill itself is before a Select Committee. When it comes back from that Select Committee it will be in the power of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) to take the course he has just suggested.

MR. SEXTON: How can a Resolution in Committee set up a Bill which is already before the House, and which has been read a second time?

MR. SPEAKER: The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman has reference only to a clause which it is proposed to insert in an existing Bill. There is no proposal to set up an entire Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee thereupon To-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

—o—

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—KILLESHANDRA, CO. CAVAN.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Is he aware that, at the recent election of Poor Law Guardians for the Killeshandra Division of Cavan Union, the voting papers of Captain Beresford for said division were collected and given in to the returning officer with the name of Captain Beresford written thereon, he being in London at the time, and could not possibly have signed the voting paper in person; is he aware that the said voting papers, after being left by the police at the residence of Captain Beresford, were taken away by a young gentleman lately appointed to the Commission of the Peace, and sent back in time for the constabulary collector with the name of Captain Beresford inscribed thereon; whether the action of the Justice of the Peace is justifiable in Law; and, are the said voting papers still in the hands of the returning officer of the Cavan Union?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Returning Officer rejected two voting papers issued to Captain Beresford, as he was of opinion that the signatures to them were not genuine. He has no knowledge of what occurred between the issue of the papers and their return to him after collection; but if the name of the gentleman who is accused of taking them away is furnished further inquiry on the subject can be made. The papers are in the hands of the Clerk of the Union.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — NORTH DUBLIN BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Irish Local Government Board have withdrawn, or resolved to withdraw, their veto against the resolution of the North Dublin Board of Guardians, appointing the Hibernian Bank their treasurer?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: This matter has been fully inquired into. It appears that the Bank of Ireland, on full knowledge of the circumstances, is willing to lend the Guardians the money required for building purposes; and as no reasonable complaint can be made of the manner in which that Bank acts towards the Guardians in regard to temporary overdrafts, there are no grounds for depriving it of the treasurership of the Union. A communication explaining the decision of the Local Government Board will be before the Guardians at their next meeting.

MR. HEALY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if the Bank of Ireland is willing to lend money at the same rate of interest?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I do not know that that is the point.

MR. HEALY: Yes; that is exactly the point.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—DUNFANAGHY UNION—REFUSAL OF A CONVEYANCE.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Whether, on the 17th ult., the wife of Charles M'Sweeney, of Lunniaghmore, Gweedore, county Donegal, went, by direction of Dr. Thomas Finlay, Medical Officer, Gweedore Dispensary District, Dunfanaghy Union, to apply to Shane O'Donnell, Relieving Officer at Falcarragh, ten miles distant from her home, for an order for a car to convey her son, John M'Sweeney, to the county Donegal infirmary at Lifford; whether Shane O'Donnell, three days later, replied that he would give a conveyance to Dunfanaghy Workhouse Hospital, but not to the county infirmary; whether the ticket to admit John M'Sweeney to the county infirmary was issued on the 26th ult.; whether, on the 30th ult., John M'Sweeney himself applied to Shane O'Donnell at Bunbeg to grant him the conveyance, as he was not able to go on foot, when O'Donnell asked him "Isn't your father a National Land Leaguer," and refused to give the conveyance; whether the ticket of admission issued on the 26th ult. is still unused, the invalid being unable to go to Lifford, and the relieving officer still refusing to have him taken there; and, what order the Local Government Board will make?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: A relieving officer has no authority to provide conveyance to a county infirmary, nor to any place other than a workhouse or fever hospital of a Union. In this case the relieving officer was away from home when the application was made; but he wrote by first post pointing out what his powers were, and offering a conveyance to the workhouse. He denies that John M'Sweeney applied to him personally.

MR. SEXTON: Is not this power given to the Union for a conveyance if necessary?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: That I do not know.

MR. SEXTON: I will put a further Question on the subject.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—DUNFANAGHY UNION.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Rev. James M'Fadden, P.P. Gweedore, county Donegal, was, on the 24th ultimo, during the scrutiny of the votes in the Poor Law election for the Dunfanaghy Union, expelled from the board room of the returning officer; whether the Rev. James M'Fadden had not a legal right to be present; whether, after the expulsion of the Rev. Mr. M'Fadden, the returning officer allowed Captain Murphy, Dunfanaghy, Mr. Beattie, Crossroads, and other persons who were not concerned in the elections, either as proposers or candidates, to remain in the board room; what notice will be taken of the conduct of the officials; whether illegalities and irregularities affecting the elections for the divisions of Magheraclogher, Meenacaddy, and Dunlewey have been reported to the Local Government Board; and, what decisions they have given, especially as to claims to vote which have been made by occupiers whose valuation is under £4 per annum, but is higher than their rent, and who are liable to pay Poor Rate on the difference between the rent and the valuation, and are not entitled by Law to deduct the Poor Rate on the amount of such difference from the rent?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Mr. M'Fadden was allowed to be present at the counting of the votes for the division for which he nominated a candidate; but he had no right to be present at the counting for other divisions. The Returning Officer states that Captain Murphy and Mr. Beattie were not admitted until their divisions were called, and that there were no persons not concerned admitted during the day. The Local Government Board have received complaints and objections from Mr. M'Fadden in reference to the recent elections for five divisions of this Union, and they are in correspondence with him on the subject.

MR. SEXTON: Is it not a fact that Father M'Fadden was entitled to be present?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that the proposers were entitled only to be present during the scrutiny of their own division.

ARMY—THE CAMERON HIGHLANDERS.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the 79th Cameron Highlanders is the only Line Regiment without a linked Battalion available for Foreign service; if it is a fact that this regiment has been in Egypt since 1882; and, if it is contemplated to add a second Battalion to this Regiment in view of the probable augmentation of the Army?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Cameron Highlanders are the only regiment with but one Line battalion. They have been in Egypt since 1882. There is no present intention of proposing to give it a second Line battalion.

CHINA—PROPOSED OPIUM CONVENTION.

MR. CROPPER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give the House some information respecting the terms of the contemplated agreement with the Chinese Government in respect to opium, and when he expects to be able to lay the Papers upon the Table of the House; whether, in the Treaty negotiations now pending with China, there is any understanding come to between the two Governments on the subject of Likin; whether, in the Treaty negotiations with China, there is embraced any provision on the subject of taxation on Native opium, direct or indirect; and, whether any of the Clauses of the Chefoo Convention, hitherto unratified by the British Government, are embraced in the new Treaty?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The negotiations on this subject are still in progress, and I cannot, therefore, state what the precise result of them will be. Information on the subject will be given to the House as soon as it can properly be made public. The Chinese Government has lately been in circumstances of great difficulty.

MR. CROPPER: Has the noble Lord any idea when the information will be laid on the Table of the House?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir; I am afraid I cannot say. It depends, not so much on Her Majesty's Government, as on the Government of China.

LOCAL OPTION—LEGISLATION.

MR. WHITWORTH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When he proposes to introduce the measure for carrying out the Resolution passed by the House, and supported by the Government, which declared that entrusting the inhabitants of localities with a legal power of restraining the issue or renewal of licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors was required in the best interests of the Nation?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am afraid that I am not able at the present time to fix any date.

NAVY—NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to recommend that the Naval Artillery Volunteers shall be allowed a capitation grant, similar in amount to that which is now paid to the Volunteer Auxiliaries; and, whether it is intended that they shall be transferred from Admiralty control to that of the War Office?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: I much regret that I cannot yet announce any decision on this subject. The Admiralty highly appreciate the services of the Volunteers, and they have received with much gratification satisfactory reports as to their efficiency, both in their drills and when serving afloat.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—PROMOTION.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in November 1882, three junior Head Constables of the Royal Irish Constabulary were promoted over the heads of others who were quite as suitable for the rank of District Inspector, also one other was promoted who was five years over the prescribed age; and that since then no promotions have been made from the ranks of the force to that of District Inspector, while there have been thirty-six Cadets, chiefly Englishmen, appointed during the period in addition to three who have passed examination in January last, a total of thirty-nine, since any Head Constable attained to the position of District Inspector; how many vacancies are now due to Head Constables, and why the appointments, which he stated in December last were due to them, have not since been made, though an examination for Cadetships was held subsequently; and, whether the Head Constables of the force generally have expressed their dissatisfaction at this treatment?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The three head constables of the Irish Constabulary who were promoted in 1882 were the men who obtained the highest places in a competition among several men of their rank. One head constable, who was two years over the ordinary limit of age, was promoted on special grounds. Of the 36 cadets who have been since appointed, only 12 are Englishmen. The competition held in January last was among officers' sons, who are much behind head constables in their share of the appointments due to the force. It is intended to promote three eligible head constables as soon as vacancies arise for officers; but there are no such vacancies at present. The Inspector General has not heard of any dissatisfaction among the head constables on this subject.

MR. HEALY: Has the right hon. Gentleman any objection to giving a Return setting forth the way promotions have been made?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Setting forth what?

MR. HEALY: How many head constables have been promoted, and how many nominations of Englishmen as cadets have been made into the Constabulary?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I should think that to a Return of facts there would be no objection.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)— NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS— RESULTS' FEES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Commissioners of National Education (Ireland) have recently, in several cases, deprived teachers of all results fees obtainable for passes in extra subjects under note xiii. (b) on Extra Subjects Programme, when the number of passes fell as low as twenty per cent.; and, what is the minimum per-centage of passes for which the Commissioners will award fees in such cases?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: There is no hard-and-fast rule on this subject. Each case is decided on its merits; but those cited by the hon. and learned Member, where the number of passes fell as low as 20 per cent.—in other words, where only one child in five could make satisfactory answers—were obviously cases in which the Commissioners should refuse to make a grant.

MR. HEALY: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, will the Commissioners make a hard-and-fast rule, for the teachers complain very much of the doubt on the subject?

[No reply.]

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF BIGGAR AND CARUTH.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the case of James Biggar, disposed of at the last County of Antrim Assizes, held in Belfast; is it true that Biggar received wounds that caused him to be detained for some weeks in the Belfast Royal Hospital; was a man named James Caruth arrested, charged with inflicting the injuries on Biggar; were Biggar's dying declarations taken; was Caruth, at the instance of the police, sent for trial to the Assizes for causing the injury to Biggar; did the Attorney General for Ireland refuse to carry on the prosecution against Caruth; was Caruth's prosecution carried on by the police up till the Assizes, when the Attorney General directed them to abandon Biggar; what was the reason for giving up the prosecution against Caruth; did Mr. Justice Johnson permit Biggar to send a bill to the grand jury against Caruth; did the grand jury return a true bill, and was Caruth convicted and sentenced for the assault on Biggar; is it true that, in the same case, the Attorney General ordered an indictment to be preferred against Biggar, and if it is true that Caruth's charge against Biggar was a private prosecution, and why the Attorney General took up that case, and abandoned the charge made by the police against Caruth for assaulting Biggar; is it true that Caruth got Biggar prosecuted at the expense of the Crown, and that Biggar had to bear the expense of prosecuting Caruth; will the Government pay Biggar's expenses in taking up the case and successfully prosecuting Caruth, and will he direct such expenses to be paid; will the Government lay upon the Table all letters and telegrams addressed to the Attorney General in this case; and, did the Attorney General, when Biggar had gone to the expense of instructing counsel to prosecute the bill found by the grand jury against Caruth, assume the prosecution, and prevented Biggar's counsel from interfering, and by what authority the Attorney General so acted?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The two men Biggar and Caruth quarrelled when under the influence of drink. Both sustained injuries. There was no dying declaration, for neither died. Biggar, who appeared to be most to blame, was prosecuted at the Assizes and convicted. Subsequently Biggar—as he was entitled—sent up a bill against Caruth for assault; and, it having appeared on Biggar's trial that Caruth was also to blame, the Crown counsel, by direction of the Attorney General, without any objection being made, took up the prosecution in this case also. Caruth was convicted. Both men were fined. No application has been made by Biggar with regard to his expenses in the case; but if made it will be considered. It is not necessary to lay any Papers on the Table.

CHARITABLE BEQUESTS (IRELAND)— BEQUEST OF CATHERINE EATON, WICKLOW.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If anything has been done in the direction indicated in his reply to a Question on the 3rd November, with regard to the bequest of Catherine Eaton, who, as stated in the last Report of the Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests, left the residue of her property, by will made in 1793, "for the foundation and support of a Woolling Manufactory in the parish of Wicklow;" and, whether, as the Commissioners state the fund has remained so long in Court unused and unclaimed, some steps will be forthwith taken to fulfil the intentions of the testatrix for the benefit of her native town?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): The subject referred to in this Question has been before the Law Officers. The sum consists of a legacy left by the will to the Gardner family, of Seathly, in Cheshire, and which was not claimed by them, and has consequently accumulated. If any one of that family survived the deceased it would seem the residuary clause did not come into operation. In 1805 the Attorney General of that day advised that the residuary gift mentioned in the Question was not a valid charitable one. If this view be correct—and I think it will be difficult to dispute it—the persons probably entitled in default of the Gardner family would be either the next-of-kin of deceased, or the Crown if next-of-kin could not be traced. Inquiries and proceedings have been directed with the view to having ascertained and decided the questions of law and fact I have referred to, including the validity of the supposed charitable gift.

EGYPT (AFFAIRS IN THE SOUDAN)— FORCED LABOUR AT DONGOLA AND ESNEH.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the 2,000 forced labourers collected last August by the Mudir of Dongola, and who were placed under the orders of Colonel Grant, and the 2,000 forced labourers collected at the same date by the Mudir of Esneh, and placed under the orders of Colonel Inglefield, have now been released; whether he is aware that the courbash was employed in regard to these labourers, that they were forced by its use to work for about twelve hours per diem, and that those who attempted to escape were brought back in chains; and, whether there is now any forced labour being employed between Wady Halfa and Dongola; and, if so, whether the same means are being used to oblige them to work?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have no knowledge of the facts to which my hon. Friend alludes; but a copy of his Question will be sent to Sir Evelyn Baring to-day.

EGYPT (AFFAIRS OF THE SOUDAN)—
TREATMENT OF PRISONERS.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in a Letter published by The Roma, an Italian newspaper, from Massowah, asserting that 500 prisoners have arrived there from Suakin, and that they are now in the custody of the Italian authorities; whether this statement is correct; whether there are any women and children amongst them, and what is to be their fate; whether he has observed a telegram from Sir G. Graham to the Secretary of War, dated 15th April, in which it is stated that the mounted infantry have brought in 40 prisoners, including women and children, who were "evidently on their way to Osman Digna," together with 12 camels and 500 sheep, although there was "no fighting;" whether these men, women, and children are being detained in custody, after their property has been confiscated; and, whether it is in accordance with the usages of civilised war that non-combatants, including women and children, should be taken prisoners, and that they should be deprived of their flocks and herds?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true (as circumstantially stated in the public prints), that Natives taken prisoners in the Suakin Country are transported to Massowah in the steamers of the Egyptian Government, loaded with irons, and treated as felons?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: In reply to these Questions I may state that Her Majesty's Government have no knowledge of the despatch of any prisoners to Massowah. With regard to the second Question of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), I am informed by the War Office that in a telegram from General Graham, which appears in this day's papers, he reports that the prisoners referred to in his telegram of the 15th have been released, but the cattle kept, the flocks and herds having been supplies on their way to the camp of Osman Digna. I may add that these Questions would more properly have been addressed to the War Office.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (SCOTLAND)—FEES OF RETURNING OFFICERS.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he has considered the fact that, in Scotland, the expenses of Parliamentary candidates are now strictly limited by Act of Parliament, except in respect of the costs chargeable by returning officers, who are in the habit of employing advocates from Edinburgh as presiding officers, at a fee of £3 3s. each per diem (which, allowing one day for going and another for returning, amounts to £9 9s. for each presiding officer, with their travelling expenses in addition); and, whether, considering the additional expense entailed upon Parliamentary candidates by the increase in the number of polling stations, rendered necessary by the extended franchise, he will take into consideration whether sheriffs of counties may be directed to obtain competent presiding officers from sources which do not entail such heavy travelling expenses, and three days' remuneration of gentlemen for one day's work?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): The fees of presiding officers are limited by Section 16, Sub-section 5, of the Ballot Act of 1872, which provides that the fee to be paid to each presiding officer shall in no case exceed the sum of three guineas per day. I am under the impression that in some cases in which sheriffs employ gentlemen belonging to the locality to act as presiding officers complaint was made that they were connected with one or other of the political Parties there, and that it was suggested that it would be desirable to have for presiding officers gentlemen not having such local connection. I shall, however, communicate with the sheriffs on the subject, and I shall also be glad to learn from hon. Members from Scotland whether they consider that any further restriction could be placed upon the employment and payment of presiding officers consistently with obtaining the services of independent and duly-qualified men. It is to be kept in view that the extension of the hours of polling will make it more difficult than before for presiding officers to return to their homes at any considerable distance on the day of election.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION TO SUAKIN)—THE INDIAN CAMP FOLLOWERS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Secretary of State or the Government of India have any communication with the Brigadier General of the Indian Army at Suakin and the Transport Officers regarding the treatment of the Indian camp followers attached to the expedition, the losses sustained by them, and the circumstances under which they were surprised and cut up; or, if not, whether the Secretary of State will procure Reports on the subject from the Indian Officers? The hon. Member also asked the Secretary of State for War, whether he has yet received any reports of the losses sustained by the Indian and Native camp followers attached to the Suakin Expedition, especially on Sunday March 22nd, and full explanations of the causes which led to the surprise of that date; and, whether there will be an inquiry into the conduct and management of Generals Graham and M'Neill, and full opportunity for hearing any complaints regarding the management which led to great losses and sufferings among the camp followers?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In reply to the Question addressed to my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India, I may say that it would be a most unusual course to call upon a Brigadier General for any such Report as that suggested by the hon. Member. The Commander of the Expedition is responsible for all such matters. I have no reason to suppose that the treatment of these camp followers was not what it should have been. Their losses were 43 killed, 120 missing, and 19 wounded. As to the second Question which the hon. Member has addressed to me, I have referred to Sir Gerald Graham's despatches giving an account of the operations in question to Lord Wolseley, who is in chief command of all the Forces in Egypt and the Soudan, for his opinion whether proper dispositions of the troops were made, and whether due caution was exercised.

WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE
—RECEIPTS FROM INCOME TAX, 1881-4.

MR. ROLLS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the figures at pages 8 and 9 of the Statistical Abstract from 1869 to 1883 are correct in showing the amount received for Income Tax during the four years ending March 31st 1884 as exceeding that for the four years ending March 31st 1880 by the aggregate sum of fourteen millions one hundred and seventy-three thousand pounds?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): Yes, Sir; the hon. Member's figures are quite correct.

CEMETERIES—LEGISLATION.

MR. RICHARD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in accordance with the promise given last Session, to bring in a Bill dealing with the question of Cemeteries?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill on that subject. The Bill was already drafted, and he hoped that before long it would be introduced by the Judge Advocate General.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—DELAY IN GRANTING BAIL.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the complaints, as published in The Belfast Morning News of 13th April inst., made about the difficulties prisoners labour under in getting out on bail when the magistrates have ordered bail to be taken; and, will an officer in future be attached to the Court to facilitate bail being taken and prevent unconvicted prisoners being kept for two days in gaol?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Resident Magistrates assure me that no more delay than is absolutely necessary occurs in these cases, and no cause is shown for the appointment of a special officer to deal with them.

MR. BIGGAR: Might I be allowed to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether or not prisoners bailed out lie in cells sometimes for 48 hours?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not think that can be so.

PUBLIC HEALTH (METROPOLIS)—THE METROPOLITAN ASYLUM DISTRICT
—THE EASTERN HOSPITALS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the Metropolitan Asylums Board, and several Boards of Guardians in the Metropolis, have requested the Local Government Board to institute an inquiry into the expenditure of the eastern hospitals of the Metropolitan Asylums District; whether such inquiry has been intrusted to Mr. Hedley, Dr. Bridges, and Mr. G. Taylor; and, whether the Local Government Board have declined to appoint a person experienced and skilled in the taking of evidence, and in determining the value of conflicting statements, and competent to conduct the inquiry in question, as provided by section 22 of the Act 10 and 11 Vic. c. 109; and, if so, on what grounds?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: We have been asked by the Metropolitan Asylums Board and several Boards of Guardians to institute an inquiry into the expenditure of the Eastern Hospitals, and the inquiry has been intrusted to three of the Board's Inspectors, Mr. Hedley, Dr. Bridges, and Mr. George Taylor. These gentlemen have all had much experience in taking evidence. Since the arrangements for the inquiry were completed we have been informed by one of the Metropolitan Boards of Guardians that they have passed a resolution in favour of the appointment of a special Inspector for the purpose, and that they have forwarded a copy of it to the several Boards of Guardians in the Metropolis, and asked them to pass similar resolutions. We believe that three Boards of Guardians have expressed concurrence in their view. The Board, however, see no reason whatever for making any alteration in the arrangements as to the Inspectors by whom the inquiry is to be held.

LORD ALGERNON PERCY asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the Local Government Board has appointed Inspectors to inquire into the expenditure of the Eastern Hospitals of the Metropolitan Asylums District; and, whether it will be the duty of the Inspectors to discover the evidence necessary to elicit the facts in respect of such expenditure, or how otherwise the evidence is to be obtained, and by whom the necessary witnesses will be examined, in order that the facts of the case may be established?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: It will devolve on the Inspectors to summon such witnesses as they deem necessary for the purpose of the inquiry, and the witnesses will be examined by the Inspectors on oath.

NAVY—PAYMASTERS.

MR. GABBETT asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether every officer promoted to Chief Engineer in the Royal Navy becomes at once senior to upwards of eighty Paymasters to whom he was previously junior, and whether this seniority injuriously affects the latter officers as to their accommodation whilst on passage in transports and troopships; and, whether the relative rank of Paymasters and Assistant Paymasters will be considered by their Lordships at the same time as that of Engineer Officers?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: A chief engineer on promotion takes rank above paymasters of less than eight years' seniority, and would then necessarily pass over many paymasters. This question of relative rank, however, is extremely complicated; and it is quite possible that the chief engineer, whose promotion is slower than that of the accountant officer, is senior in the Service, having become an assistant engineer before the accountant officer became an assistant paymaster.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS— COLONNADE OF OLD BURLINGTON HOUSE.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the junior Member for Leeds, If he is aware that the carved stones which have now for some years laid exposed to wind, weather, and wanton mischief on the river bank at Battersea are the disjecta membra of that Colonnade of which Horace Walpole wrote—

"At daybreak, looking out of window to see the sun rise, I was surprised with the vision of the Colonnade that fronted me. It seemed one of those edifices that are raised by genii in a night time," and of which Sir William Chambers spoke as "one of the finest pieces of architecture in Europe;" and, what is the intention of Her Majesty's Government as to their destination?

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: I am aware of the history of the disjecta membra of the Colonnade now lying in Battersea Park. Hitherto the Government has not been able to make use of them, and no suitable site for their re-erection has as yet been even suggested.

POST OFFICE—POSTMASTERS AND PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS.

MR. BUSZARD asked the Postmaster General, with reference to the political action of Postmasters, Whether the latest instructions to Head Postmasters are dated in 1873; whether the restrictions therein imposed on officers of the Post Office as to elections were founded on stat. 9 Anne, c. 10, s. 44; whether that statute was repealed in 1874 by stat. 37 and 38 Vic. c. 22; whether Rule 77, of Rules for Sub-Postmasters 1884, does not expressly recognise that "the former disabilities in regard to officers of the Post Office voting at elections and taking part therein have been removed;" and, whether he will state upon what grounds he has imposed, by the replies referred to, restrictions upon the political action of Postmasters not sanctioned by Act of Parliament?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The instructions of 1873 are out of date, the law having since been altered. But although Postmasters and other Post Office servants are now relieved from the political disabilities which formerly attached to them, it by no means follows that they should be allowed to act as political partizans. Indeed, at the time the law was altered it was distinctly contemplated by Parliament, as a reference to Hansard will show, that some regulations might be necessary to control the conduct of Post Office servants in political matters. The right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon, who had charge of the Bill, spoke as follows:—

"It was clearly undesirable that officers of certain branches, at all events, of the Public Service should take an active part in electioneering contests. And, therefore, although he quite agreed . . . that the law should be altered, and that old, obsolete, and inconvenient restrictions should be removed, he thought the House should do nothing to restrain the Executive Government from taking such steps as they might find necessary for preventing any unseemly or inconvenient interference of their own officials in electioneering contests."—(3 Hansard, [219] 799.)

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) BILL—TOWN CLERKS OF IRISH BOROUGHS.

MR. JOHN REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received a Memorial, addressed to him by the town clerks of nineteen of the Irish boroughs merged under the Seats Bill, praying for compensation for the loss which will be entailed upon them by superseding them in the duties, at present imposed on them by Law, in connection with preparing voters' lists; and, what answer he has sent to this Memorial?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I have received the Memorial referred to, and have acknowledged its receipt. The claim does not appear to me to be one that could be admitted, except in the extremely improbable event of its being recognized in England.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) BILL.

MR. WARTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he would have any objection, before the Report Stage of the Seats Bill be taken, to grant the Return relating to Counties at large which have been divided by the Boundary Commission?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I should not feel justified in granting a Return to the effect suggested until the boundaries have been definitely settled by both Houses, as the preparation and printing of the Return would necessarily be expensive, and it would be liable to mislead if all necessary corrections were not previously made. I think that a Return giving in full the contents of each division, both of boroughs and counties, as finally settled, would be found very useful; and I will lay such a Return on the Table as soon as the Bill becomes law. This Return might not be in the precise form suggested by the hon. and learned Member; but I will take care that it shall supply all the information which I believe it is his desire to obtain.

MR. HEALY asked, whether care would be taken that the revised edition of the maps should be issued giving the correct names of the divisions as settled by the House?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The maps will be very costly. The Return will be a very full one.

MR. SEXTON asked the right hon. Baronet whether, in the interval between the Committee and the Report stage, the Bill would be reprinted, so that the House might be able to understand it?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It is being reprinted now as far as we have gone.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—RUSSIAN OCCUPATION OF BALA MURGHAB AND KHUSHK.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Afghan Forces still hold Bala Murghab and Khushk; whether General Komaroff, who has inspected the "positions" from which the Afghans have been driven, has established a provisional government in the country up to the Paropamisus Hills; and, whether it is true that the following proclamation has been circulated by the Russians throughout Northern Afghanistan:—

"You will have learned that your deceased master, Shir Ali, not only was the true friend of Russia, but also frequently admonished the Sultan of Turkey in letters to solicit the Czar's favour. You know, further, that the people of Merv voluntarily submitted to the Czar, whose power none can withstand, and under whose wings the faithful and the unbelievers alike find protection, justice, and clemency. God has even permitted that the holy town of Samarcand, with its mosques and sacred graves, should fall into Russian hands. Therefore, Afghans, keep good friendship with the Russians, assist them, and avoid their adversaries, for you too cannot escape the fate of the Turcomans, Yomuds, and others?"

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Foreign Office have not been informed that the Afghans have evacuated Bala Murghab and Khushk, or that General Komaroff has established a provisional Government up to the Paropamisus Mountains, or that the Russians have circulated the Proclamation mentioned through Afghanistan.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION (SUB-COMMISSIONERS)—MR. EDWARD GREER.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

the Ameer had made any representation to the Government of India on the subject of the Frontier, and with what result. No doubt the Ameer has made representations to the Viceroy, and the Viceroy has made it an important part of his duty to exchange ideas and views with the Ameer on that subject. I had in view those representations on a former day when I gave, on the part of the Government, an assurance that the communications between Lord Dufferin and the Ameer were of a most satisfactory character.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I should like to ask a Question of the right hon. Gentleman as to the telegram from Sir Peter Lumsden which he does not desire to communicate to the House. All Europe has been in possession for some days of the Russian version of the transactions at Penjdeh. I understand now that a full telegram has been received from Sir Peter Lumsden containing a version of the transaction. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, if that be so, how much longer he thinks it expedient to withhold from the country and the House the version of Sir Peter Lumsden?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Question of the noble Lord contains an argument, which might have been entirely spared, because it is founded on an erroneous supposition. We are not in possession of any complete version, or what we consider a complete version. [Ironical Opposition laughter.] Well, I suppose we are entitled to form an opinion. Hon. Gentlemen opposite who laugh appear to think that it is not the duty of the Executive Government to form an opinion. I repeat, we are not in possession of a complete version of the essential circumstances leading to or connected with that engagement, and it is that version for the arrival of which we are looking. When that version has arrived, if we should not be in a position to communicate it, then, I imagine, Questions like that of the noble Lord may be fairly put.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE: I do not know whether this would be an unfair Question to put; but, in view of the very grave tension out-of-doors, it would be of great benefit if the right hon. Gentleman will give some approximate date when any Question with regard to these negotiations is likely to lead to a definite reply?

MR. GLADSTONE: If the settlement of these matters depended upon ourselves, it would be my duty to give a distinct answer to that Question; but I am unable to say when we shall receive from Sir Peter Lumsden his version of the affair, after the various incidents that have interrupted the communications with that country. It so happened that the communication which arrived on Friday last came with comparative celerity. But I am not able to say when we shall be in possession of full information upon matters which are material and, indeed, essential to an understanding of this case. In regard to the negotiations between the two Governments, all I can say is that no time will be lost on our part in prosecuting these negotiations to a termination, because we feel how very disadvantageous it is to have so much delay and uncertainty.

MR. ONSLOW: I should like to ask the Prime Minister this Question. The right hon. Gentleman, in his answer the other day, said that the Russians had made an unprovoked assault; and the Viceroy of India, in a public speech, made use of exactly the same language. I wish to ask the Prime Minister a Question which I think it is due to both countries should be answered—namely, whether the Government believe in the version of Sir Peter Lumsden or in the version of General Komaroff?

MR. GLADSTONE: It appears, on reference to what I previously said, that this is no place for the Question put by the hon. Member. The hon. Member has not even taken the trouble to quote with accuracy the words used by me in describing the impressions of the Government in reference to the state of affairs on the Afghan Frontier. I must point out to him that, whatever he may think to the contrary, great accuracy is requisite in these matters; and the House may recollect that when, on the first day, I mentioned the purport of the allegations we had received from our own Agents, I stated that, of course, we gave credence to what proceeded from them. But the hon. Gentleman must remember that we are not dependent entirely upon British Agents; but the British Agents are dependent very considerably on Afghan officers. I have nothing to say against them; but, of course, the case is not the same; and, considering what results may depend upon precision of language, I will not be driven into any premature or incomplete statement on any points connected with this great question.

EGYPT—SEIZURE OF THE "BOSPHORE EGYPTIEN."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked, Whether the House was to understand that the action of the Egyptian Government, in suppressing The Bosphore Egyptien, was taken on its own responsibility, and entirely without the cognizance and the advice of Sir Evelyn Baring; whether Her Majesty's Government disclaimed all responsibility for that suppression, and was in a position to act as a totally disinterested party in the matter?

MR. GLADSTONE: Before I can undertake to give a definite reply I think I ought to see the Question in print; but at this moment, without taking time for reflection, I should say that the Egyptian Government did not act alone on the matter, and that we are not in a position to disclaim all responsibility. No doubt there are questions of procedure, and many others of a secondary and subsidiary character, which may come up in a matter of this kind; and I should not like to give a final answer; but, speaking generally, I may say that we are not in a position to disclaim, and we do not claim all responsibility.

MR. O'DONNELL inquired whether it was not the case that, a few days ago, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs stated in this House that the suppression of The Bosphore Egyptien had taken place with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I do not see any discrepancy between my statement and what has just fallen from the Prime Minister, though, of course, I should like to refer to the actual terms of my answer.

NAVY—STATE OF THE NAVY—SIR EDWARD REED'S NOTICE OF MOTION.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked the hon. Member for Cardiff, What steps he was about to take with regard to his Motion on this subject, and for the discussion of which the Government refused to give a day; whether the hon. Member would move that Motion before going into Committee to-night, or whether the question would be discussed in Committee?

SIR EDWARD J. REED, in reply, said, that as the Prime Minister, in pursuance of his engagement with the Leader of the Opposition, had insisted upon pressing the Redistribution Bill, and likewise the Registration Bills, before giving any facilities to private Mem-

Whether Mr. Edward Greer, Sub-Commissioner, was, until his appointment, partner with Mr. R. A. Mullan, Solicitor, Newry; whether on the door the words "Greer and Mullan, Solicitors," still appears, and cheques are still issued on the Newry Branch of the Bank of Ireland in the name of Greer and Mullan; and, whether there is an agreement between these gentlemen that on the cessation of Mr. Greer's employment as a Commissioner he is to resume his place in the firm?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Land Commissioners have received Mr. Greer's assurance that, neither directly or indirectly, has he any connection with the business of his late partner, Mr. Mullan; and they do not think it necessary to inquire as to the other matters referred to in this Question.

GENERAL GRAHAM'S PRO-CLAMATION.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the proclamation reported to have been issued by General Graham will be communicated to the House before the discussion upon the Vote of Credit; whether Lord Wolseley having reported that he has no fear for his communications on the Nile, the alleged necessity for operations at Suakin has passed away; and, whether, in the circumstances, Her Majesty's Government intend to pursue the policy of the proclamation entrusted by the Khedive to General Gordon, which called upon all persons in arms to lay them down, to endeavour by peaceable means to form independent governments, and to do their best for their own prosperity?

MR. GLADSTONE: In regard to the first portion of this Question, on inquiry of the Secretary of State for War, I find that what the hon. Gentleman describes as a Proclamation was not a Proclamation, but a letter from Osman Digna to the officer in command, and a reply from General Graham. That being so, there will be no objection to its being laid on the Table if moved for. In regard to the other portion of the Question, I would recommend my hon. Friend to wait till after the statement which will be made in submitting the Vote of Credit to-morrow.

LONDON GOVERNMENT—LEGISLA-TION.

MR. FIRTH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government propose during the present Session to introduce any Bills for the purpose of establishing a Representative Municipal Government in London; of carrying into effect the Report of the City Guilds Commission; and of taking steps either by supporting the amendments to the Water Bill now before Parliament, or otherwise to prevent the vested interests of the London Water Companies being increased by two millions sterling by reason of the new assessments shortly to come into force?

COLONEL MAKINS said, that before the right hon. Gentleman replied, he would ask whether he was aware that the Water Companies' charges were not based upon the poor rate assessment at all; and whether the hypothetical two millions alluded to were merely the product of the hon. Member for Chelsea's vigorous imagination?

MR. COOPE also asked the Home Secretary if he was aware that the figures in the Question were founded upon a misconception?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I can hardly answer the Questions which have been addressed to me, nor can I give any definite statement with reference to these Bills. As my hon. Friend is aware, a temporary measure dealing with corporate property is already before the House. With reference to the other and larger measures, I am not in a position at present to state what steps will be taken.

EGYPTIEN."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to ask, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any notice from the Egyptian Government with reference to the demands of the Government of France relating to the suppression of The Bosphore Egyptien, and what advice they have offered to the Egyptian Government; and whether they have had any direct communication with the French Government on the subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is quite true that the Egyptian Government have received certain demands from the Government of France in relation to

upon precision of language, I will not be driven into any premature or incomplete statement on any points connected with this great question.

EGYPT—SEIZURE OF THE “BOSPHORE EGYPTIEN.”

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked, Whether the House was to understand that the action of the Egyptian Government, in suppressing The Bosphore Egyptien, was taken on its own responsibility, and entirely without the cognizance and the advice of Sir Evelyn Baring; whether Her Majesty's Government disclaimed all responsibility for that suppression, and was in a position to act as a totally disinterested party in the matter?

MR. GLADSTONE: Before I can undertake to give a definite reply I think I ought to see the Question in print; but at this moment, without taking time for reflection, I should say that the Egyptian Government did not act alone on the matter, and that we are not in a position to disclaim all responsibility. No doubt there are questions of procedure, and many others of a secondary and subsidiary character, which may come up in a matter of this kind; and I should not like to give a final answer; but, speaking generally, I may say that we are not in a position to disclaim, and we do not claim all responsibility.

MR. O'DONNELL inquired whether it was not the case that, a few days ago, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs stated in this House that the suppression of The Bosphore Egyptien had taken place with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I do not see any discrepancy between my statement and what has just fallen from the Prime Minister, though, of course, I should like to refer to the actual terms of my answer.

NAVY—STATE OF THE NAVY—SIR EDWARD REED'S NOTICE OF MOTION.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked the hon. Member for Cardiff, What steps he was about to take with regard to his Motion on this subject, and for the discussion of which the Government refused to give a day; whether the hon. Member would move that Motion before going into Committee to-night, or whether the question would be discussed in Committee?

SIR EDWARD J. REED, in reply, said, that as the Prime Minister, in pursuance of his engagement with the Leader of the Opposition, had insisted upon pressing the Redistribution Bill, and likewise the Registration Bills, before giving any facilities to private Members for any purpose whatever, he had thought it desirable to take no further steps until that measure had been disposed of.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—THE RUSSIAN ADVANCE.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked, Whether it was not the fact that the Prime Minister informed the House, on Friday, the 13th of March, that the Russian Government had then entered into an agreement that their force should not advance, and that agreement dated back to the 2nd of March? He would further ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in the face of that statement, it was possible for him to communicate to the House the substance of Sir Peter Lumsden's telegram on Friday last? He put this Question because statements gravely affecting the character and judgment of British officers with Sir Peter Lumsden had been put forth by the Russian organ in this country, and were still put forth from day to day.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked, Whether it was a fact, as stated by the Special Correspondent of The Daily News at Krasnovodsk, that the Military Attaché of the British Embassy at St. Petersburg had been refused permission to visit the railway now being made from Krasnovodsk to Sarakhs; and whether any confirmation had been received by Her Majesty's Minister at Teheran of the following statement made by the same Correspondent with respect to the Russo-Persian Frontier:—

“The Russian advance into Turkestan necessitated a more exact delimitation of the Persian frontier from the Caspian to Sarakhs. This work was gone over a year or two ago, and was supposed to have been definitely settled. The boundary was laid down, but now the Russians are taking it upon themselves to determine what had been determined, and to settle where the boundary had been fixed. I understand that one subject of dispute is connected with the Atrak River, near its junction with the Caspian. About forty miles from its mouth this stream splits in two, and these branches flow separately into the Bay of Hasan Kuli. The Atrak was settled to be the boundary between Persian and Russian soil; but whether the Commissioners forgot to define which branch of that river was to be the frontier or not, I cannot say. Russia now claims the southern fork, and Persia claims the northern. The Russians, I am informed, have taken a very effective means of settling the question; they have constructed, or are constructing, a dam where the northern branch separates, and thus it will cease to exist. The southern branch will thus become the River Atrak, and that has been defined as the frontier."

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: It is quite true that this morning I did receive a letter inclosing a newspaper cutting identical with that which the hon. Gentleman has just read to the House; but owing, no doubt, to the great interest which the hon. Member has taken in foreign affairs, he had forgotten to sign his name to the letter. Under the circumstances, I must ask the hon. Gentleman to give Notice of the Question.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I will put it on the Paper.

MOTION.

—o—

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—REGISTRATION OF VOTERS BILLS.—RESOLUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the several stages of any Bills for the Registration of Voters, in England, Scotland, and Ireland, have precedence of all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motions, on every day on which they shall be set down, by the Government, as the first business of the day."—
(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. PARNELL said, that before the Motion was put he wished to ask the Government their intentions with regard to the question of registration in Ireland, which had been left in a most unsatisfactory condition owing to the non-fulfilment by the Government of statements as nearly as possible amounting to pledges made by them so long ago as the end of the Session of 1883. He did not propose in any way to discuss the merits of the three Bills to which it was proposed on the present occasion to give precedence over all other Business. What he desired to know was, what the position of Her Majesty's Government was regarding the pledges given by the Government to assimilate the Registration Law in Ireland to that of England? Regarding this question he thought it was in the first Session of this Parliament that a Bill was brought in by the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) for the assimilation of the registration system of the two countries, and that Bill passed through that House, but was thrown out by the House of Lords. The Bill was considered of such importance that the Chief Secretary for Ireland at that time (Mr. W. E. Forster) used some very strong expressions with regard to the action of the House of Lords, and pledged the Government with regard to it that he would introduce fresh legislation in the following Session. That promise was forgotten and broken in the midst of the exciting events which ensued in the following Session, and it was not until the Session of 1883 that the Bill was re-introduced, with the result that it again passed through all its stages in that House, practically without a division; but it was again thrown out by the House of Lords. Replying to a Question put by him on the 22nd of August, 1883, as to what course the Government proposed to take, the Prime Minister said that Her Majesty's Government viewed with great regret the fact that the Bill did not pass into law. He could not be expected, he said, to give the exact arrangements of the Business for the next Session; but he added that possibly the Bill for Registration in Ireland would form a part of a measure of a more important character, referring, of course, to the Franchise Bill. Well, it did not form part of the Franchise Bill, which had since passed into law. The Bill now before Parliament did not carry out the pledges given by the Prime Minister, as it did not assimilate the law. Therefore, he thought they were entitled to ask, before they gave up the public time to those Registration Bills for England, Ireland, and Scotland, that the Government should redeem its repeated pledges to assimilate the law between England and Ireland. The position in which the Irish Registration Law stood at the present moment was a very serious one. It was one rendering almost entirely nugatory the passage of the Franchise Act, which rendered the extension of that Act to Ireland a fraud and a delusion. That Act was supposed to confer the franchise on between 500,000 and 700,000 persons in Ireland; but in default of legislation assimilating the law these persons would be left at the mercy of a threepenny stamped notice of objection served through the post. He could not think that the Government had designedly shoved them into such a pitfall; and it was, therefore, that he availed himself of this opportunity to urge upon the Prime Minister that, before he dealt with these three Bills, he should first fulfil the pledges of himself and his Government, repeatedly and solemnly expressed, that they would introduce a Bill placing the people of Ireland in the same position regarding registration as the people of England and Scotland. It was rumoured that the understanding with Lord Salisbury would prevent a clause being added to the Registration Bill dealing with the subject; but if this were true a more scandalous breach of faith, whether intentional or not, was never perpetrated by any Government. Until he heard the answer of the Government he could not say what attitude he should adopt with regard to the English and Scotch Bills; but at present he was disposed to think he must oppose them.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he did not question the right of the last speaker to raise the question he had raised; but he wished to make an appeal to the Government. The Prime Minister was again asking private Members to sacrifice the whole of the time at their disposal; and while he did not deny that the occasion justified the present proposal he thought when such a demand was made private Members, in their turn, had a right to demand from the Government a detailed announcement of their legislative programme for the remainder of the Session. It was absolutely impossible, under this system, for a private Member to bring forward any Motion, however important. The case of the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed) was an illustration of this; he could not ask the Government for a day for his Motion on the Navy—a subject which was of national importance, and as to which there was the greatest anxiety out-of-doors, and to attempt to ballot for a day was a farce. He hoped the Prime Minister would grant the hon. Member for Cardiff the time he had demanded, and also lay the programme of the Session before the House.

Mr. Parnell

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he should support the protest. The House had been given to understand that when the Redistribution Bill was disposed of they would revert to the normal state of affairs as regards the time of the House. The Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister looked very much like a breach of faith with the House on the part of the Government; and he hoped someone on the Front Opposition Bench would enter a protest against it. Private Members had had their rights absorbed for the last two or three Sessions; whereas if the Government had managed their Business with a little more order and foresight those rights might have been better respected. Let hon. Members consider what was the position of the House. They were refused information upon every subject of importance. The Government were drifting along day after day, and hon. Members had no means of obtaining information. They could get no replies; and the only thing that there was any certainty at all about was that whilst our Government were drifting the Russian Forces were advancing. The House by departing from the old rule, had placed it in the power of Ministers to adopt a most offensive demeanour to hon. Members asking Questions—a tone they would never dared to have assumed under the old régime. It was the impunity which Ministers enjoyed in regard to private Members' rights which led them to adopt their offensive tone. There was no sufficient reason for the Motion of the Prime Minister, whose great anxiety seemed to be to hustle forward the General Election sooner than the proper time. The Government were hourly plunging the country into greater dangers abroad; their Expenditure was increasing enormously; whilst an immense Floating Debt was being incurred. Day by day they postponed a statement of the real state of affairs, and tried to stave off the financial crisis. The result would be that if the General Election went against them the Government would throw upon other shoulders the difficulty and responsibility of dealing with the enormous liabilities which they had incurred. All he could do was to enter a protest against the way in which the rights of private Members were being trampled upon by the Government.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he thought he should best consult the convenience of the House by not attempting any reply to the speech they had just heard. The speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) reminded him of a duty which he thought was incumbent upon him on the present occasion; and that was to say that in submitting to the free judgment of the House the Motion he now made he was not unmindful of the pledge previously given, which was that when the Government saw their way with regard to the Redistribution of Seats Bill, when they had disposed of the Committee and Report stage of that Bill, they should then have the map, so to speak, of the residue of the Session sufficiently unrolled to make it their duty to state what they proposed to do with regard to other legislation. With regard to the remarks of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), he was not sure that he clearly understood him. The hon. Member for the City of Cork was perfectly justified in the reference he had made to the promise which had been made in 1883; but he must see that the Government had not treated Ireland in this matter differently from England and Scotland. Registration reform was urgently needed in the three countries; but the hon. Member claimed that the Registration Law of Ireland should be proceeded with before Parliamentary Reform generally was carried out. [MR. PARNELL: No; simultaneously with it.] The Registration Law of England was in urgent need of important reform; and although the Government were most anxious to carry out these reforms, they had not as yet attempted to touch them, and his impression was that English Members, who warmly concurred with the Government in desiring that changes should be effected in that law, would be rather indulgent during this Session lest they should prejudice the whole of the legislative changes which they were now endeavouring to effect. That being so, it was certainly no recession from the views of the Irish Government, or the Government at large, if they had felt that the first object of their Registration Bills during the present year was to enable them to complete the great scheme with regard to the Parliamentary representation of the people, and to render an early Election possible. If this Motion were carried by the general support of the House, they should at least get to the subject of English registration, of Scottish registration, and of Irish registration; and whatever the views of the Government might be, whatever the circumstances might be, it would be in the power of any hon. Member to raise, for the free and unbiased consideration of the House, any matter which was relevant to the subject of registration. Consequently this Motion would give the hon. Member for the City of Cork an opportunity, which, without it, he would much less surely enjoy. As to pledges, it would be perfectly impossible for him on this occasion—it would be almost an irregularity for him—to enter into that question. He should only say that while he understood the pathetic laments of the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) and the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), he felt it difficult to understand any opposition to this Motion on the part of those who thought it an object of paramount importance that the Government should immediately reform the administration of Ireland.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he was afraid it was absolutely necessary, in view of inconvenient precedents in the future, that independent Members below the Gangway should be a little obstinate on this subject. It was perfectly shocking and heartbreaking to him to observe the political torpor into which the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had sunk on this occasion. That hon. Member used in former times to be the great champion of private Members' rights. The hon. Member had been a sort of Bergen-op-Zoom, a virgin fortress, which no Government could capture; but now he had shrunk into a condition of torpor, and took no interest in the rights of private Members—a melancholy spectacle, on which he would not enlarge further. The argument of the Prime Minister would doubtless have been admissible, and would have been unanswerable, had it come at a different period of the Session. But the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman was premature. There was no reason why the House should be wasting its time in discussing that Motion at that moment. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that the Government were under a pledge, when the Redistribution Bill was passed through Committee, to lay their programme of legislation before the House. The House naturally desired to know what the object of the Government was in bringing forward this Motion at the present time. The Redistribution Bill had not yet passed through Committee, and the Report stage of that measure would probably take up three or four nights—therefore, it was not an extravagant view to take to assume that the third reading of the Bill would not be finished much before Whitsuntide. There would, therefore, be ample time to make this Motion when the Redistribution Bill was finished. What, then, was the reason which the Government had in advancing this Motion so far before the time it was needed? He was bound to ask the question in the interests of private Members. They were obliged to be suspicious of the motives of Governments; and he was not more suspicious of the intentions of the present Government than he was of those of others, because there was sometimes a Freemasonry, sometimes amounting almost to a conspiracy, between the two Front Benches to give each other as much latitude as they could. The Prime Minister had said that there were going to be very important reforms effected by the Registration Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: I did not say that; but, at the same time, we desire them.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Of course, the desires of the Government will be carried out.

MR. GLADSTONE: Oh, no!

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: But it is quite obvious that the Registration Bill will effect important reforms.

MR. GLADSTONE: No, no!

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: What! not effect any reforms?

MR. GLADSTONE: Only the reforms which we desire to see carried out in relation to the arrangements for the redistribution of seats.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL remarked, that the Government appeared to occupy a very extraordinary position, for it appeared that they were attempting reforms which they did not purpose to carry out. This was an admirable reason for the Government not taking away the rights of private Members, and tying the hands of the House. He need scarcely point out to the Prime Minister that there were several Orders of pressing importance upon their Notice Paper. Some of these had already been several times postponed, and the Government should at once say what course they intended to pursue with regard to them. If the time had not arrived for the Government to make this statement, as well as a statement with regard to other matters about which the House was expecting information, he certainly thought that the period had not arrived for the House to sacrifice all the time of private Members, and all their opportunities, to the Government. Under these circumstances he should move, and he expected that the Government would assent to the Motion, the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the noble Lord had entirely ignored the fact that there must be an interval between the Committee stage and the Report stage of the Redistribution Bill; and the Government had thought it would be the general desire of the House that that interval should be utilized for the purpose of proceeding as rapidly as possible with measures which were essentially necessary to the early bringing into force of the extended franchise and the Redistribution Bill. A general desire was expressed, before the noble Lord returned from India, to hasten the General Election as much as possible, and there were certain measures which were essential for bringing about that General Election. These were three Registration Bills, which might also involve each another Bill. In face of these facts, the Government had thought the House would desire that Wednesday and Friday next should be given up to these measures rather than to give those days to measures which, under the peculiar circumstances of the present year, would be time wasted. The noble Lord had spoken of the Freemasonry between the two Front Benches; but he could assure the noble Lord that no arrangement had been entered into between the two Front Benches on the subject of these measures; the Bills were those which both Conservative and Liberal Members were anxious to see pass into law. Although it might be open to the House to consider whether it ought not to carry large measures of registration reform, the Bills were not of that character, but simply contained the provisions that were necessary to give effect to the Seats Bill. In answer to the hon. Member for Cork, he might state that neither the freedom of the Government nor that of the House was limited with respect to these Registration Bills. The Government were simply doing their duty in presenting them, as it were, in the naked form of what was necessary to give effect to the legislation of the House. The noble Lord who had moved the adjournment of the debate was under a misapprehension in supposing that the Report stage of the Redistribution Bill was likely to last as long as he had described. From his experience during the Committee stage, he was convinced that the Report stage would not last long, and at its conclusion the Government would be able to make a full statement as to the Business of the Session.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE said, he did not remember any Parliament in which the Government of the day had been treated with as great generosity by private Members as this Government had been by this Parliament. There was something that was practical, if not, indeed, unanswerable, in what had been said by the noble Lord. If the argument of the President of the Local Government Board went for anything, the Motion was a very large demand upon private Members for a very small result. They were all left completely in the dark with reference to the proposals of the Government as regarded the remainder of the Session. He supposed the approaching death of this Parliament accounted for the comatose state of private Members; but it was hard upon them all that they should place their political lives and fortunes at the mercy of the Government. Up to Easter great anxiety was displayed as to the position of the Navy, and that anxiety had found a considerable echo out-of-doors. He did not know whether some fairy wand had been passed over the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed), but up to Easter, in his view, there was not an iron-clad in the Navy which was not in danger. Many of them would like to know what pressure had been brought to bear upon the hon. Member to induce him to shut off steam in an abrupt manner. There were many other things with reference to which they would like to have information; and private Members felt that they were not getting any quid pro quo. While asking them for these sacrifices Ministers left them completely in the dark as to whether, when the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill and the Registration Bills were passed, a semi-animate House would be asked to indulge in further legislation. He wished to repudiate the suggestion that those who sat on the Front Opposition Bench had no sympathy with the aspirations of private Members.

MR. RYLANDS said, no doubt in ordinary circumstances private Members ought to look with suspicion upon a union between the two Front Benches to sacrifice the rights of private Members; but the simple question now was whether anyone wished to prolong the agony preceding the General Election by putting it off until the beginning of next year. He was certainly under the impression that the Registration Bills were necessary to expedite the work of legislation, and so facilitate an early Election.

MR. GORST said, that the Registration Bills had nothing whatever to do with the question of an earlier Election than the 1st of January next. The Bills which the Government were so anxious to obtain precedence for were purely technical Bills, and they merely applied the existing Law of Registration to the newly-enfranchised voters. It did not seem that there was any really practical necessity for this Motion at all. The Bills were not likely to create much controversy in the House, and having passed a Select Committee they might very well be taken at 1 o'clock in the morning. Perhaps some Irish Members might desire to introduce Amendments into the Irish Bill; but, however urgently required they might be in themselves, they had not been introduced into the English Bill. There were several urgent matters awaiting discussion, in particular the Motion of the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed) as to the Navy; and the Government would have saved time if they had devoted to some of these questions as well as to Supply the interval between the Committee and the Report stages of the Seats Bill.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the concluding suggestion of the hon. and learned Member was one that was well worthy of consideration. With regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Cardiff, it seemed to him that that was a fitting opportunity to endeavour to come to some arrangement as to the time when it should be taken, and to obtain from the Government some pledge as to the time that could be devoted to the debate. It was perfectly natural that private Members should look with jealousy on a Motion of this kind; but, at the same time, it ought to be remembered that the particular object which they had in view was to finish up all the Business connected with the Redistribution Bill and the altered representation of the people, and to get it fairly out of the way before they came to the discussion of the other Business of the Session, which, as they could perfectly well see, must take up a great deal of time. There were the financial measures which would have to be taken up, and there would probably be some important discussions on foreign policy and on other measures which were in the minds of all persons, and which they knew would have to be discussed before the end of the Session. It was always inconvenient to have measures which would have to be passed indefinitely standing over. It would probably be more convenient for the House to clear itself of the group of Bills connected with the Franchise Bill at a time when it could do so without a material sacrifice on the part of the House before discussing the Motion of the hon. Member for Cardiff.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he wished to point out the absolute necessity of proceeding with the English Redistribution Bill without delay. The Bill, as originally drafted, provided that the first step in the new registration should take place on the 15th April. To-day was the 20th, and the Bill had not yet come from the Select Committee. The Committee had altered the Bill so that the first step in registration should take place seven days after the Royal Assent had been given. An entirely new system of registration was to be applied to counties, and a class of officers had to perform important functions, many of whom were entirely inexperienced in their duties. The demand of one and all of these officers was that the Bill should be passed as soon as possible. Quite apart from any political or Party question or the rights of private Members, he could assure the House that if the new registry were to come into force on the 1st of January next year the Bill must be proceeded with without delay.

MR. GREGORY said, he thought that if delay and confusion were to be avoided the Registration Bill must be passed as rapidly as possible. He hoped that the labours of the Select Committee would enable the House to pass the Bill in much the same form as that in which it would come down to them.

MR. BUCHANAN said, that the hon. Member the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department had referred to the great danger of delay in regard to the English Bill. With regard to the Scottish Registration Bill, they had been told that the Scottish registration would be dealt with by clauses inserted in the English Bill. That was not now to be done, and it was only this evening that he saw a Notice on the Paper that the Lord Advocate was to introduce a Bill dealing with the Scottish registration. He would like to have a statement from the Government that they would not take the Scottish Bill during the present week, as it was desirable that the matter should be thoroughly considered.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, it was right that he should give a word of explanation about this. The Scottish Bill was very much simpler than any of the others, because in Scotland they had the valuation rolls, which formed the basis of their voters' list, and accordingly it had been necessary to have a good deal of consultation with those gentlemen who knew best about the working of that roll—he meant county assessors—and the delay in introducing the Bill had arisen from a succession of communications with them, and from their suggestions having been largely taken advantage of, and from having—

MR. SPEAKER reminded the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the scope of the debate had been limited by the Motion of the noble Lord. They were now on the Question that the debate be adjourned.

SIR JOHN HAY pointed out that no reply had been made by the Government Bench to the demand with regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Cardiff. Unless some definite assurance was given by the Government that an opportunity would be afforded for fully discussing that Motion, he trusted the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition would resist the Government's proposed interference with the rights of private Members.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that it was most unfortunate that after the appeal of the right hon. Member for North Devon one Member of the Government after another had left the House. He hoped the hon. Member for Cardiff would bring all possible pressure on the Government to fix a day for his Motion.

SIR EDWARD J. REED said, that he had lost none of the interest in, or zeal on behalf of, the Motion which stood in his name. He had had no communication with the Government on the subject of his Motion, except what had taken place in that House; but the Prime Minister had declared that he would treat the Motion in its original form as a Vote of Censure. He was inclined to consider that the Navy should not be a matter of Party contention—and he heard the statement of the Prime Minister with regret. He hoped he had now brought it out of the region of Party politics, and had modified the terms of his Motion accordingly. Upon the Government must now lie, if they chose to assume it, the responsibility of making it a Vote of Censure. The Government had given no encouragement to anybody to do anything at all but further the passing of the Redistribution Bill; and he thought it was wasting the time of the House to get up and put any further Questions until that Bill was passed. He could only say that the question was one of the most urgent public importance, and he hoped the House would express its opinion upon it as soon as possible without regard to Party politics. He must say that the feeling he was under was that the force, need, and truth of his Motion had been very much enhanced by what had recently occurred.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Member that he was exceeding the limitation of the Motion of the noble Lord.

SIR EDWARD J. REED said, his remarks were in the nature of a personal explanation. He appealed to the Prime Minister not to make the Motion a subject of Party discussion or Party division.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he supported the appeal which had been made by several hon. Members that this important Motion should be considered as soon as possible. It would not be in Order to give reasons for it; but he thought no one could read the papers day by day without feeling that such a Motion, if considered at all by the House, ought to be considered at once.

MR. RAMSAY said, the Government should take care that the Registration Bill for Scotland should be introduced at the very earliest date possible. The simplicity of the measure did not lessen the necessity for its early publication.

MR. PARNELL said, he thought the statement of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board was a re-assuring one. He would suggest that as the Irish Registration Bill was more likely to give rise to controversy than the Scotch and English Bills it should be brought on first; or, at any rate, the English and Irish Bills should be proceeded with pari passu.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he understood that the hon. Member for Cardiff had given way to the Government in favour of the different stages of the Redistribution Bill; but now, as that Bill was almost through the House, the circumstances had entirely changed. His right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) now asked the Prime Minister to make arrangements by which the hon. Member for Cardiff should not be prejudiced by the introduction of the Registration Bill. If the House consented to give precedence to those Bills he hoped the Prime Minister would take care on an early day to give an opportunity for the discussion of this most important Motion.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the right hon. Gentleman, in arguing for the immediate consideration of the Registration Bills, referred to the extremely important and numerous questions which it was absolutely necessary that the House of Commons should discuss within the next few weeks. But the absolute necessity of these Bills had been questioned in quarters from which he should have thought no question on the subject could come. It was true that these Bills did not contain any provision for an early Election; but they contained most important and necessary provisions in order that any Election, late or early, might be held. The fact that they did not contain any anticipation of the date of the Dissolution only strengthened the case of the Government, because, as his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board said, that made an additional piece of Business of the same nature which would have to be done either by the insertion of a clause in these Bills, or in the Redistribution Bill on the Report; or, as was most probable, by the introduction of a separate measure. He assured his hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward Reed) and right hon. Gentlemen opposite that the Government considered the discussion of the Motion with regard to the Navy as one of great importance and value, and regretted the postponement of it. The Government would give the earliest consideration they could to the granting of a day for the Motion. [An hon. MEMBER: When?] The moment was not yet. When the complementary Business connected with registration had been disposed of, and the financial Business—which he thought could be transacted more easily than some Members seemed to think—had been concluded, and if hon. Members in different parts of the House should not think it their duty to raise debates on foreign affairs, then the Government would give their very earliest consideration to finding a day for his hon. Friend. That was the very outside pledge that could be given at the present moment. As to the request of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) that the Irish should be placed before the Scotch Bill, he conceived that a Bill which stood for second reading on the Paper had, ipso facto, precedence over a Bill which was not yet in existence. The request of the hon. Member, however, was not so much that the Bill should come on in any particular order, as that it should be brought on in such a manner that it could pass, with Amendments, this Session, and before a General Election. To further that end, the hon. Gentleman and his Friends could do nothing better than allow the Motion of the right hon.

Mr. Trevelyan

Gentleman the Prime Minister to pass as rapidly as possible.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he thought the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down was very unsatisfactory, for he had not included the state of the Navy among things absolutely necessary to be discussed. One would suppose that the condition of the Navy and the defence of the country were not regarded as of importance. It was notorious that there would be no opposition to the despatch of the English and Scotch Registration Bills; why, then, could not a day be found for the discussion of a subject which by the country and by everybody except the Government was thought to be important? Was that discussion to be delayed until the three Registration Bills were passed? By the postponement of the discussion the time of the House would not be saved, nor the reputation of the Government enhanced. At the present time the Government should endeavour to obtain not only the votes of the House, but the confidence of the country; and he knew of no means by which that confidence could be more effectually estranged than by refusing an opportunity for the discussion of the Motion with regard to the naval defences of the country.

MR. HEALY complained that the reasonable request of the hon. Member for the City of Cork had not been complied with. The Government had sent up one Bill to the Committee practically before any attempt whatever was made to advance the Irish Bill. He thought they had reason to say that before any further stage was taken with any Bill, English or Scotch, that the Irish Bill should be placed in the same position as the English Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the hon. Member must be under some misapprehension, for if the Seats Bill was finished on Tuesday it was intended to take the second reading of the Irish Registration Bill on Wednesday. As to the Motion of the hon. Member for Cardiff on the subject of the Navy, the observations of the right hon. Gentleman opposite were scarcely called for, having regard to the fact that this was not a Motion that had been pressed on the attention of the Government for many weeks past. It was on the Paper among the Motions for which no day had been fixed; but he thought that in the speech of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster the Government had shown their disposition to consider what they could do within a reasonable time to give an answer on the subject.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he considered that this was the only way open to the House to protect itself against the demands of the Government on the time of the House. The answer they had received from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster with regard to the discussion in reference to the Navy was that the time was not yet. If they took that for an answer, the hon. Member for Cardiff might not get his Motion discussed until the Greek Kalends. He (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was quite sure the debates on the Navy Estimates would be materially shortened if that discussion were taken without much delay, and the time of the Government and of the House would in the result be materially saved. The subject was one of great national importance, and ought to be debated at an early day.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the Prime Minister whether he would consider this point as to the hon. Member for Cardiff's Motion, and give a definite answer to-morrow?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he considered it would be very unwise in the interests of the House to give any answer on the subject until the House had before them the Vote of Credit which the Government proposed to lay on the Table. It would then be seen how far the condition of the Navy might enter into that Vote, and what were all the reasons and considerations connected with it.

MR. HICKS said, the country would thoroughly understand the refusal of the Government to grant a day for the discussion of a question of national importance. If the day had been given the discussion that evening might have closed long before.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 63; Noes 157: Majority 94.—(Div. List, No. 115.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the several stages of any Bills for the Registration of Voters, in England, Scotland, and Ireland, have precedence of all Orders of the Day and Notices of Motions, on every day on which they shall be set down, by the Government, as the first business of the day.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £934,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Victuals and Clothing for Seamen and Marines, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886.”

MR. RYLANDS said, that on the last occasion when the Navy Estimates were under discussion the first Vote was taken at a late hour, after a speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith); and an understanding was then arrived at that after the personal Vote was taken the general discussion should be continued upon the second Vote. They would all regret that the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox), who was to have continued the discussion, was unfortunately prevented by ill-health from being present. He (Mr. Rylands) therefore rose to go on with the general discussion upon the Vote for Victuals and Clothing for the Seamen and Marines. The total gross amount which was asked for the Royal Navy and Marines amounted to £13,000,000; or, after making deductions for appropriations, to a sum of £12,700,000. Judging from the statement made by the Prime Minister that night—a statement which must certainly have been anticipated by every Member of the House—in connection with the Vote of Credit, there would be a considerable additional sum proposed for Naval Expenditure. In former years, and up to a very recent period indeed, the decision of the Board of Admiralty in regard to the amount of money required and the means of defence necessary had been accepted as being an authorized and a reliable Estimate. It was very curious that it should have been so, and it tended to prove the tenacity of popular delusions. Year after year the conduct of the Admiralty had been shown to be altogether inefficient and unsatisfactory; and yet the House and the public continued to suppose that whatever judgment was arrived at by the Admiralty was the judgment which ought to be accepted by the country without question and without doubt. He was disposed to think, however, that the House of Commons and the public at large were gradually opening their eyes to the fallacy of this position, and were awakening from the delusion which formerly existed with regard to the administration of the Admiralty. Attempts had been made from time to time to draw public attention to these matters; and the public had been urged, again and again, not to shut their eyes, or to continue to accept from the Board of Admiralty the conclusions drawn by that Department under the impression that the Board of Admiralty was an infallible institution. About seven years ago it would be recollected—it was in the days of the former Government—that there was a very large amount of public irritation excited, and most important articles appeared in The Times condemning very strongly the policy of the Admiralty, and criticizing very severely the Administrative Department of the Dockyards. His hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) at that time brought his great ability and knowledge to influence public opinion, in a manner which was calculated to induce the people to call in question the administration of the Admiralty, and to demand that there should be an improvement in the system of administration. That was at a time when the Government was in a state of excitement, and there were threatenings of war. The Earl of Beaconsfield, by a vigorous policy which a number of Members on that side of the House denounced, had brought the country into a position which seemed to threaten the probability of a great European convulsion. The country now seemed to be in a somewhat similar position under a professedly peaceful Government, but whose policy, so far as the interests of peace were concerned, was somewhat questionable. Whenever similar circumstances arose public attention was excited and directed to the Navy. First came criticisms and letters in the papers, and then the thunder of The Times, with a view, if possible, of stirring up that slumbering body the Board of Admiralty. And what happened? When a period of excitement did occur the Board of Admiralty opened its eyes and began to look around; but no sooner did the excitement and the rumours of war pass away than that Board began to slumber again, and the excited feeling of the country and of the House of Commons was in the same way put to sleep. They appeared to forget that in former times the Admiralty had proved wanting in making adequate provision for that which was required for the exigencies of the country; and the public again fell into the delusion that the Board of Admiralty, so needful for the defence of the country, was infallible. He hoped they were now arriving at a time when this public and popular delusion would be dispelled. What had happened now? The First Lord of the Admiralty got up in the House of Lords and said that there was so great a difference of opinion among naval officers as to the merits of different classes of ships that the difficulty the Admiralty would have to contend with, if Parliament placed at their disposal a sum of £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 to-morrow, for the purpose of adding to the Navy, would be to decide how to spend the money. Some persons thought that in the event of war torpedo boats would be their most powerful weapon of defence, and yet they were singularly destitute of such vessels. When it was remembered that the First Lord of the Admiralty only a very few months ago avowed, in his place in the House of Lords, that if £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 were given to the Board of Admiralty to spend they would not know what to do with it, and when, in the short period which had since elapsed, the Government were coming down to ask for largely increased Estimates, not only in this general Vote, but in the Vote of Credit which would have to follow, surely any reasonable man would see that, if the present First Lord was a fair sample of previous First Lords, he was a sort of person he should not like to trust with the expenditure of any considerable sum of money. Was there anything more preposterous than that the First Lord of the Admiralty should have been so utterly in a mist in regard to the administration of the Department, at the head of which he was supposed to be placed, that he could not possibly form any opinion as to how he was to spend the public money if it were voted by Parliament? Perhaps the Committee would allow him to say, in passing, that he had the highest regard for his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey), who had made his great qualities still better known since he had assumed the position he now occupied. But he thought it was altogether a most objectionable system which placed the First Lord of the Admiralty in the House of Lords. He maintained that the Heads of both the greatest spending Departments in the country—the Head of the Navy, as well as the Head of the War Department—ought to have a seat in the House of Commons, so that he could always be ready to reply to any question that might be put to him, and come, as it were, into touch with public opinion in a way that was not possible if he was a Member of the House of Lords. Notwithstanding the opinion expressed by the Earl of Northbrook a short time ago, that the Board of Admiralty would not know what to do with the money, the Government were now asking for a very large sum of money. He ventured to assert that the Committee had so much lost confidence in the Board of Admiralty—not only in the present Board, but in former Boards—that if this Vote rested simply on their recommendation the House of Commons would be scarcely justified in consenting to it and in voting the money required. Before proceeding further, he ought to say that he, for one, was altogether in favour of the sum of money being granted which was necessary to put the country in a proper state of defence. In that respect he was a follower of Mr. Cobden. With all his desire to keep down the Expenditure of the country, he agreed with Mr. Cobden that if it could be shown that the Navies of Foreign Powers, and more especially the Navy of France, was approaching very nearly to the standard of our own, it would be a reason why the House of Commons ought to be prepared to make great efforts in order to place the Navy of England in the position it ought to hold with regard to the Navies of Foreign Powers. He remembered perfectly well that Mr. Cobden declared that he would be ready to spend £100,000,000 in order to keep up the due proportion of relative strength between the British and the French Navies; and Mr. Cobden also said that he considered the British Navy ought to be about double the strength of the Navy of France. He was disposed to think that Mr. Cobden interpreted the feelings of the English people correctly when he made that statement; but he begged hon. Members to remember this—that the mere fact of voting the money did not necessarily get them their money's worth if the expenditure of that money was not properly administered. In one of Mr. Cobden's speeches—he believed in the very speech in which he gave this expression of opinion—Mr. Cobden quoted the opinion of Mr. Scott Russell, a man whom everybody knew was a great Naval Constructor, and who possessed a considerable amount of technical knowledge in connection with that Department. In 1862 Mr. Scott Russell said that they had, during the previous 30 years, spent £30,000,000 in the construction of a class of ships which were then totally useless. Well, he (Mr. Rylands) maintained that they had still, at any given time, been wasting very large sums of money solely through the mal-administration of the Board of Admiralty. The truth was, as had been admitted again and again, that the Board of Admiralty, as a foreign writer of considerable eminence declared, were always wanting in foresight, and did not even know what was going on at their very doors. It really seemed that, although that might not be absolutely correct, the statement was proved by experience to be founded upon very reasonable grounds. Hon. Members would remember that it was seven years after France had abandoned the construction of the old sailing vessels that the House of Commons, in 1851, forced a similar policy upon the Admiralty. Again, when the iron-clad system came up, the Board of Admiralty continued to build the old three-deckers long after the French Government had abandoned the building of vessels of that obsolete type. His object in adverting to those facts was to emphasize his demand, that when the House of Commons granted money to the Board of Admiralty, they had a right to expect the full worth of their money. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), who was an admirable specimen of an efficient Lord of the Admiralty when he held that Office, would say "Yes" to that view; but the Board of Admiralty, for a long period of years, so far from noting what was going on, had appeared never to be able to make up their mind what was the proper course to pursue. Hitherto they had been unable to arrive at any rapid decision, and incessant delay occurred in the construction of vessels after it was decided to build them. Now, he believed that when the Board of Admiralty, at any given time, had made up their mind as to the best construction of a ship, they ought at once to proceed to have that ship built in the best and quickest manner possible. It had been stated by the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed), or by some other person at the meeting held recently in the City, that at the present moment there was a capital of no less than £7,000,000 sterling absolutely locked up in incomplete vessels of war; and that £7,000,000, granted in previous years by Parliament, if a war were to break out to-morrow, would not be of the slightest use to the country for the purposes of defence. He ventured to think that in spending the money voted by Parliament, they ought not only to take care that the vessels they built were built quickly—not only that they were good vessels, but that they should not spend more upon them than they were worth. It was pretty certain, in his own mind, that they were spending a great deal more for the war vessels they were constructing than they ought to spend, and more by a great deal than they could purchase the same vessels for. He recollected last year a valuable speech that was made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith) in the discussion upon the Navy Estimates. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that vessels built in Her Majesty's Dockyards cost more than those built in private shipbuilding yards, and added that that was, perhaps, not necessarily so. Now, he did not know what the right hon. Gentleman meant by the words "not necessarily so." His (Mr. Rylands) experience was that, in the condition under which the Dockyards were worked, the cost of labour must necessarily be much dearer than in private yards. Hon. Members would not dispute the evidence obtained by the important Committee presided over by the Earl of Ravensworth. He held the Blue Book containing the evidence given before that

Mr. Rylands

Committee in his hand. His impression was that the Committee obtained evidence of the most valuable character, and that they had presented a Report in regard to the administration of the Admiralty, which was now on the Table of the House, which contained recommendations of a very important character. He only regretted, upon reading the Report of the Committee, and the valuable evidence they had taken, that the Committee was so narrow in its constitution, and that the Reference was so curtailed, that a great many very important matters, which ought to have come under the purview of the Committee, were withheld from their consideration. Certainly the Committee went to a great extent in the direction of obtaining information, and they heard evidence on the very point he had been alluding to in regard to the comparative cost of constructing ships in the Dockyards and in private yards. The impression he derived from the evidence given before the Committee was that they could have bought the whole of the vessels they now had in the Navy, if they had been purchased in the ordinary shipbuilding yards, at a saving of somewhere between 25 and 40 per cent in the cost of construction. Whenever the Admiralty made a comparison of the cost of shipbuilding in a Dockyard and in a private yard, they unfortunately threw out of view a large number of items which ought necessarily to come into the consideration of the cost of a manufacturing establishment; and consequently their Returns did not fairly give the cost of the work done in the Dockyards, as compared with private shipbuilding yards. But if he took the lowest possible estimate, according to the evidence before the Earl of Ravensworth's Committee, the saving in the private yards was at least 20 per cent; so that there was a loss of 20 per cent incurred by the country in the cost of Dockyard work. That was taking a most favourable view of the matter; and he would appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed), who knew so much more of those matters than he did, if it was not the fact that when they laid down a vessel in one of Her Majesty's Dockyards, and the Admiralty had proceeded with its construction up to a certain point, they did not find it necessary to alter the structure, and accordingly they had a new scheme prepared? Then somebody suggested this alteration, and somebody else suggested that; and the effect of all of this was very materially to increase the cost, and enormously to extend the time required for the building of a vessel. The vessels built in private shipbuilding yards could not only be built at a very much less cost, but they could be built and placed in the possession of the Admiralty, complete, with much greater expedition. He had spoken just now of a slumbering Admiralty; and he might mention, as a matter of fact, that there were vessels now unfinished in the Dockyards which were laid down six years ago. During those six years, the Admiralty seemed to have been reposing comfortably upon a soft pillow, and the Dockyards had been worked by no means under full pressure; so that those vessels were only now approaching completion. What had happened in the meantime? Foreign Powers had purchased from private shipbuilding yards in this country vessels, in some respects, superior to ours, which were turned out in three years. If it took six years to lay down and complete a vessel, he would remind the Committee that the Admiralty could only turn out five vessels in a generation. It seemed perfectly preposterous; and he could hardly imagine how the House of Commons could continue to support a system which produced results like that. He was aware that the Admiralty would say that they did not know at the beginning of the six years what improvements and inventions might arise, and that they wished to have the vessel as perfect as possible. That was a preposterous view; at any rate, they would have had the vessel, even if not quite so perfect, turned out three years ago, and the country would be enjoying the advantage of it now. Unfortunately, the Admiralty were very slow in arriving at a conviction; they were continually raising doubts and difficulties, and the Members of the Board took a great deal longer to arrive at a conclusion than would be taken by any ordinary man of business. And then they wasted a great deal of precious time in experiments. How was that? He would not enter into the controversies which would, no doubt, be fully gone into by his hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J.

Reed). He would not venture to express an opinion, although he was disposed very much to coincide with the judgment of his hon. Friend, in regard to the construction of vessels. The matter had already been brought before the House of Commons on various points connected with naval construction; and he must say that the ideas of the Admiralty as to the speed that was necessary was altogether condemnatory of their policy. That was a matter which he could understand quite as well as his hon. Friend, and he maintained that the ideas of the Admiralty as to the speed with which a vessel should be furnished were altogether wrong. They were content with a much lower rate of speed than that which prevailed in other countries. Now, when Parliament voted a sum of money for preparing ships for the Navy, what did they require from the Admiralty? First of all, they required from them that they should decide on the best construction of the vessels that existed at the time, to the best of their judgment; and, secondly, that they should carry out the details of the work in the most economical manner, or by purchase, if they could purchase vessels to advantage. It would appear, however, that the Board of Admiralty entirely overlooked those two great points of duty. What was the Board which had to decide on very nice questions respecting the construction of vessels of war? He maintained that the Board of Admiralty did not necessarily know anything about the best form of construction of vessels of war. After what the First Lord of the Admiralty had stated, only a few months ago, it was quite evident that he knew nothing whatever about the construction of vessels of war. Who, then, was responsible for settling this very serious question — what influence predominated the consideration of what was the best construction of vessels of war? It was the Controller of the Navy, who was at the head of that Department. And what did the Controller know of the matter? Had he had experience? Had he had training? Had he been brought up from the beginning, gradually rising in the scale, and possessing full knowledge of the best mode of construction of these very complicated armoured vessels of war? Not necessarily so at all. He was an Admiral. He had no wish to speak disrespectfully of an Admiral, especially in the presence of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay); but the Controller was an Admiral, perhaps, of long experience and naval training, who did not necessarily know anything whatever of the construction of vessels of war. Therefore, he ought not to be entrusted with the responsibility of deciding the designs upon which vessels of war were to be constructed. He ventured to say, in regard to the Controller of the Navy, on whom the important duty was devolved of superintending the designs for the construction of vessels of war, that he ought to be the very best naval engineer they could find in the Three Kingdoms; a man with the greatest training, with the most perfect knowledge, and whose judgment would be really valuable and reliable. Then the question arose whether, in their construction of ships, they adopted in their Dockyards, in carrying out the details of construction, a system that was at all businesslike or economical. Without pretending to have an opinion which would justify him in presuming to say what the best mode of construction or the best design for a ship of war was, he would say that, having had a great deal to do with large industrial occupations, the last thing he would dream of doing would be to place at the head of a manufacturing establishment an Admiral, who knew nothing of manufacturing operations, who knew nothing whatever about business, and who was to be placed there for three years, to be an ornament to the Dockyards, able to walk up and down in full naval uniform as the representative of British power. What he thought was that if they were bound to maintain those Dockyards they ought to be maintained on a system that would secure their being conducted economically and efficiently for the purposes for which they were required. They employed, at the present moment, in the Dockyards something like 18,000 men, and they paid, in addition, very large sums for incidental purposes connected with the Dockyards. The management of the 18,000 men distributed in the several Dockyards cost them in salaries and allowances £224,274 a-year. That seemed to him to be a rather large sum for the clerical management of the Department. Then, again, they could not have those 18,000 men without having a great number of police to look after them. They, therefore, paid £34,000 a-year for a police force to look after the Dockyards. He would not say that the Dockyards did not require some protection; but he considered that amount to be altogether excessive. Then, again, he found that last year a sum of £148,000 was paid to established Dockyard men in the shape of pensions and allowances. One of the gentlemen who gave valuable evidence before the Earl of Ravensworth's Committee was connected with the Dockyards; and he (Mr. Rylands) mentioned the fact to show the unbusinesslike mode in which the Admiralty proceeded; that this gentleman was asked a question about those pensions, and his reply was that the pensions were not taken into account in considering the wages of the men, although they came to nearly 25 per cent of the entire wages paid to the established workmen. The items which he had mentioned in connection with the wages and other charges for maintaining the Dockyards sufficiently showed that the cost of the Royal Dockyards was much greater than the cost of private shipbuilding yards. Therefore, among the recommendations of the Committee on the Navy which he looked upon as most important was that a much larger amount of work should in future be given out to contract. In connection with that matter, he was gratified to be able to say that the evidence as to the character of contract work, and also the indirect evidence as to the character of the ships supplied to Foreign Powers, left in his mind the fullest confidence that the private shipbuilding yards turned out work of an exceptionally good character. That he deemed to be a most satisfactory matter from every point of view. Then, again, the Committee urged that there should be a larger number of vessels given out to be built by contract, and that in connection with such contracts there should be an insistence on the shortness of time for delivery, and they further recommended that repairs should not be given out for contract, but that, as far as possible, they should be done in their own Dockyards. The general conclusion at which the Committee arrived was that the Dockyards should be used for all repairs, and for the construction of experimental ships; but that in regard to the new ships built upon a settled design, they should be contracted for and built in the private shipbuilding yards of the country. He wished to urge upon the Committee how very important it was, in view of the special circumstances of this country, that they should adopt the recommendations of that Committee of the Admiralty. The Committee pointed out that among the advantages of extending the contract work there would be this great advantage—that not only would the resources of the Dockyards be rendered available to a greater extent for repairing vessels and building ships of an experimental type, but that familiarity with the work of building ships of war would be increased throughout the country, and facilities would more readily be given for completing the naval defences of the Empire. As far as he was able to estimate from the Returns, the power of shipbuilding, including both iron and wooden ships in the shipbuilding yards of this country was something like 700,000 tons a-year, and out of that 700,000 tons a-year from 200,000 to 300,000 would be iron-clads. In 1874 the great shipbuilding yards of this country supplied Foreign Governments with no less than 12,877 tons of iron-clad war vessels, and in 1875 they supplied 13,844 tons, making in the two years 26,721 tons; while in those two years the entire tonnage of war vessels produced in the Government Dockyards was 25,300, as against 26,721 tons. Absolutely, in those two years, more tons of iron-clad war vessels were built for Foreign Powers in our large shipbuilding yards than were built by the Admiralty in the Royal Dockyards. What appeared to him to be of the utmost importance in connection with this matter was that they were, or that the country ought to be, in a far better position than any other country in Europe with regard to their available means of defence, and they ought also to be in a far better position for obtaining a more powerful Navy than any other European country. Nevertheless, they were told that they had not got the Navy they ought to have; and so far from keeping up the relative proportion and having twice as large a Navy as France, they were told that although the French Navy was below ours at present, still in the course of four or five years, if the present rate of shipbuilding continued, France would be ahead of us. If that were so, and he did not dispute it for a moment, it was a state of things that ought not to be tolerated, and could not be justified. It was a remarkable thing that while, according to the highest authorities, the French had been making greater progress, and had been gradually approaching us in naval strength—that was to say, if we made a comparison between the French and the English Navy 12 or 15 years ago, it would be found that the proportion in our favour was much larger than it was now, for during the last few years the French Navy had been more rapidly approaching ours than at any former period. The French Naval Authorities had not been content to remain quite as dormant as the Board of Admiralty in this country. How was it that France had done more than we had done during the last few years? It would really seem that the French Government got more than we did out of a given amount of money. France was not spending anything like what we spent, and was not employing the large staff of workmen we were employing. Last year the expenditure of the French Government did not amount to more than £8,000,000 for her Navy, while our Naval Vote amounted to upwards of £11,000,000; and, in point of fact, in the last few years the sums voted for the French Navy was not much more than half what we were spending. For some time past France had certainly been spending 25 per cent less than this country; and although the expenditure of that country amounted to £8,000,000 last year, we had been spending every year a very much larger sum. Well, in the face of that there had been a gradual approach in the relative strength of the Fleets of the two countries. He believed the reason was that they did not make their money go as far as they ought to make it go, and there ought to be such a reform in the administration as would secure greater results in future from the money they expended. His right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) alluded, when the Navy Estimates were before the Committee on the last occasion, to the promises of the Admiralty, and showed that their undertaking to spend a certain sum of money and produce a certain result was never absolutely carried out. The right hon. Gentleman gave most striking instances to show where the promises of the Admiralty had failed to be carried out, and the Committee knew that that had been so for years, and that when, year after year, Parliament voted a considerable sum of money for the purpose of constructing a certain weight of tonnage in the Navy, it was found at the end of a few years that a large amount of tonnage had never been built for which the country had paid, or apparently paid. Certainly it was paid for in this sense—that, according to the calculation of the Board of Admiralty, a certain sum of money ought to produce a certain weight of ships, and as that undertaking had not been fulfilled it was evident that the money had been wasted somewhere, or that the cost of the ships was much larger than the original Estimate. He thanked the Committee for having allowed him to make those remarks; and he wished in conclusion to take that opportunity of expressing a hope that Her Majesty's Government would not lose sight of the importance of these questions, but that every effort would be made to secure for the country a more powerful and efficient Navy, and also to provide that the large sums of money which the country were prepared to vote would be so expended as to secure for the country the best possible results.

MR. GORST said, the hon. Member who had just sat down had made a speech which they had often heard before in Committee of Supply. The burden of the speech of the hon. Member was to induce the Admiralty to spend all the money voted for the Navy in building ships by contract in the mercantile shipbuilding yards of the country; and in order to support his proposition he had thought fit to run down the Dockyards which were supported by the country. He was not going to answer the speech of the hon. Member at any great length, nor to make over again the speeches that had often been made in that House in defence of the Dockyards. He stood in a very much better position than the hon. Member, because in defending the Dockyards it was unnecessary for him in any way to run down the work done in the private shipbuilding yards. That was no part of his case. He was quite aware that ships could be built efficiently and well by contract, and he did not think that in recent years the Admiralty had shown any indisposition to avail themselves, to the full extent, of the advantages which the private established building yards of the country offered. The statement of the hon. Member was not true that in this matter they were very much behind the French, because whereas we had at least 18,000 men employed in their Dockyards, the French employed 26,000, so that, at all events, they employed a great many more men for their Dockyard service than we did. Then, as far as shipbuilding was concerned, last year France spent considerably more than we did in this country. With respect to the use of the Dockyards, it must be apparent, he should have thought even to the hon. Member himself, that a country like this must possess, in a time of war, fortified Dockyards. If they built every ship they required by private contract, it would be necessary and absolutely essential to maintain Her Majesty's Dockyards, in their present state of efficiency, for the purpose of repairing and refitting the Fleet in a time of war. If this country were unhappily at war with a Foreign Power, he presumed that that country would ultimately gain the victory who could most rapidly repair and refit its Fleet. A Fleet could only be repaired in a fortified Dockyard under the protection of batteries such as the Dockyards of Chatham, Portsmouth, and Plymouth possessed.

MR. RYLANDS said, he thought that the hon. and learned Gentleman had misunderstood him. He had expressly stated that the Dockyards must be retained principally for the repair of ships.

MR. GORST said, that it was absolutely necessary to keep up the Royal Dockyards in a state of efficiency, and the Committee of the Navy had themselves observed that they must be maintained for the repair of ships. In making that observation they did not recommend that no ships should be built in them while they were so retained. As they must be retained for the repair of ships in a time of war, it became economical to utilize them for the building of ships so far as shipbuilding could be carried on in them. He regretted that those establishments excited so much ire in the mind of the hon. Gentleman; but the hon. Gentleman's notions were very far from correct. The Admiral Superintendent was not always to be found strutting about the Dockyard in full uniform with his cocked hat on his head. At the same time, it was necessary to have someone to superintend the work. It was also necessary to employ police for the protection of the Dockyards, or anybody who liked would be able to find his way into them with a view of stealing and carrying away the property of the country. As it was necessary to keep the Dockyards in a state of repair, it was economical to use them for ship-building. He had no wish to go into the question the hon. Member had so often raised in that House on previous occasions as to the pensions given to the artificers. Those pensions seemed very much to excite the objection of the hon. Gentleman. When the Committee came to Vote No. 6, which dealt specially with the wages of the artificers and labourers in the Dockyards, he (Mr. Gorst) should have a good deal to say upon that subject; but he was far from believing that the Government lost anything by giving the artificers of the Dockyards a portion of their remuneration in the shape of pensions. On the contrary, he would be prepared to show that the Government were great gainers. As the Committee were justified, upon this Vote, in discussing the general question of the condition of the Navy, he desired to make a few practical observations on that subject. The hon. Member stated, and he presumed that many other Members would say the same, that the Admiralty, as at present constituted, had to a certain extent lost the confidence of the country. The aspect of the Committee at that time, and the empty Benches of the House, certainly did not look as if the country were extremely anxious to arraign the Board of Admiralty; for it appeared that the Members of the House would not take the trouble to attend in order to take part in the naval discussions which were raised upon these Votes. It would, therefore, seem that upon the whole they were satisfied with the administration of the Navy, and perfectly willing to leave the Admiralty in charge of it. He believed that the real reason of the growing dislike of the House of Commons to attend the discussions upon the Navy Estimates was because Members were beginning to realize the extremely small influence the House of Commons had over the administration of the Admiralty. That was the explanation of that growing indifference of the House of Commons to the discussion of the Navy Estimates which had been pointed out by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands). It seemed to him (Mr. Gorst) to be perfectly fatal to the administration of the Navy, according to the Constitution of this country, that the First Lord of the Admiralty should be a Member of the other House of Parliament. The Board of Admiralty was a high Scientific Department, and he supposed that a Member of Parliament, when he became a Member of the Board of Admiralty, found himself as soon as he joined the Board in the presence and in the society of men who had made naval construction and naval administration their study and their business from their boyhood. Of course, in the presence of such men, a Member of Parliament so situated could not have any very great influence upon the deliberations of the Board. The real power which Parliament possessed over such a Board as the Board of Admiralty was in the fact of the presence in that House of the First Lord of the Admiralty. He had influence with his Colleagues only because he was the person charged with the defence of the policy of the Admiralty in the House of Commons. If a great question of naval construction were raised, what influence could the First Lord of the Admiralty—a civilian who had made no particular study of naval construction—have upon the deliberations of the Board? The only reason why he had any power, or influence, or force in the administration of the Board of Admiralty was because he could say to his Colleagues—"I have got to defend your policy in the House of Commons. How am I to defend it? What arguments am I to use? How am I to answer the objections which may be raised?" The fact that the First Lord was the person charged by the Constitution of this country with that duty was the only thing which gave him influence in the Board of Admiralty. He had no wish to say a single word against the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey). He had the highest opinion of the present Secretary to the Admiralty, and also of the Civil Lord (Mr. Caine) who represented the Admiralty in that House, and he was quite sure that those hon. Gentlemen would not understand that the observations he was now making were directed against them. He only wished that the present Secretary was the First Lord of the Admiralty, and if the Government had due regard for the traditions of the Constitution of the country they would make the Secretary to the Admiralty the First Lord, and then they would have a responsible official in that House. But as long as the Admiralty was represented there by Gentlemen who were only subordinate officials of the Department, the House of Commons would have no real voice in the decisions come to by the Department, and could only represent in an exceedingly uninfluential way the views and opinions of the House to the Board of Admiralty. So long as that state of circumstances continued the Board of Admiralty would treat the House of Commons with contempt, and would have no regard for the discussions which took place in Committee of Supply. As had already been the case in the past, the Board would continue in the future to treat the views and decisions of the Committee of Supply with absolute neglect and supreme contempt. Last year, as if to prove to the whole world how perfectly useless the First Lord of the Admiralty, when a Member of the House of Lords, was to the country, the Government thought fit at a very critical moment to send the First Lord to Egypt. He was absent from this country for at least three months, and presumably he occupied his official position and distinctions all that time, and received his salary from the House of Commons, which salary the House of Commons were again asked that night to attach to the Office of First Lord. But the Admiralty went on perfectly well, as far as he knew, without the First Lord. The noble Earl who now filled that Office (the Earl of Northbrook) was never missed at all, and if he had remained up to the present moment in Egypt the Admiralty would have been conducted with quite as great efficiency, and it was perfectly certain that the House of Commons would have had just as much influence over the decisions of the Board of Admiralty as they had now, with the First Lord in "another place." The Admiralty, as at present constituted, was, he presumed, about the most independent Department in the Kingdom. There was absolutely nobody who had any control whatever over it. The only Body who had a certain amount of control over the Board, or who might have, was the Treasury. But the Treasury control consisted simply of checking the amount of money the Admiralty might spend. If they had a Board of Admiralty very much impressed with the dissatisfaction of the country at the present condition of the Navy, with extensive powers for increasing the efficiency of their Fleets, and spending money, the control of the Treasury would become a reality, because the ardour of the Board would be checked by the necessity of really superintending the expenditure of the Department. But as long as the control was not a maximum, but a minimum control, and the Admiralty remained content with the present inefficient condition of the Fleet, and did not ask leave to spend more money, but was content with spending the actual amount which the Treasury placed at its disposal, there was no control on the part of the Treasury whatever. Control was only felt when the Admiralty was anxious to spend, and it was not felt when the Admiralty was content to save. Therefore, notwithstanding the fact that control theoretically existed on the part of the Treasury, he maintained that the Admiralty, at that moment, if it made up its mind to keep within the expenditure which the Treasury allowed, was the most independent and the most uncontrolled Body in the United Kingdom. He did not want to say too much against the Board. He did not agree with all the strong censure which had been passed upon the Board by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands). The hon. Member said that the Admiralty knew nothing whatever about naval construction. He supposed that there were Members of the Admiralty Board who, perhaps, did not know much about naval construction; but there were also Members of the Board who were very eminent naval constructors; and the Board had the advantage of possessing employés and officials capable of giving them advice, which, at all events, was the advice of instructed and competent persons, upon any question of construction they might enter into. He did not, however, believe, whatever the Admiralty themselves and their advisers might be, that they rendered more efficient service to the public because they were altogether free from control and criticism. He thought the Admiralty would be much more efficient and effective if it was subjected to the control of the House of Commons, and if the criticisms which found their way into the minds of the public through that House produced a greater effect upon the administration of the Admiralty. If they had the First Lord in the House of Commons that would be so; because, if there were a particular criticism upon any point of construction or other matter which the Admiralty knew to be urgent, and the First Lord wanted advice from his naval constructors as to the progress it was necessary to make, it would be given to him, and the criticisms of the House of Commons would, consequently, have considerable influence over the administration of the Admiralty. To illustrate what he meant he would refer to an incident which occurred in the last Parliament, when his right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) was First Lord. A Motion was made in that House, either by the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) or by the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox), in reference to the construction of Her Majesty's Ship Inflexible. At any rate, the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) spoke in favour of that Motion, and passed some very useful and very favourable criticisms upon the construction of that vessel. He could not say that that debate changed the views of the Admiralty; but, at all events, it had a considerable effect upon them, because, at that time, the First Lord could be instructed upon the subject, the whole matter could be explained to him, and although it was a scientific question, and a question which a layman was not capable of dealing with, yet it was quite certain that that debate had a considerable effect upon the ultimate construction of the Inflexible. He was quite certain that if such a debate were raised now, it would have no effect at all. Indeed, he was not certain that it would ever reach the Admiralty. At any rate, it would only reach the Board as far as such Members of the Board might read it in the newspapers who might be anxious to know what any Member who had a technical knowledge of the subject chose to say. Indeed, it would have about the same effect as if the speeches were made in the Society of Arts or in the Kensington Laboratory. Looking at the general necessities of the Empire, the present condition of the Admiralty was deplorable. Notwithstanding all the agitation of the newspapers, all the speeches made in that House, and all the Questions asked of Her Majesty's Government, they all knew the deplorable condition in which the defence of their own seas, and ports, and harbours was left at the present moment. If, unhappily, they were at war with a great Naval Power, even their own harbours in the United Kingdom were not safe against attack. And if that was the state of things here on the spot, where they had their eyes upon the conduct of the Admiralty, what must be the condition of the defences of their Empire in those remote seas to which the view of the House of Commons was seldom, if ever extended? If anybody would inquire into the state of their ports—for instance, those in the Pacific, which were very near an enemy with whom it was not impossible at an early period they might find themselves at war—he believed it would be found that the ports they possessed in the Pacific, and especially the Harbour of Esquimaux, were absolutely defenceless; and no attempt whatever had been made by the Admiralty to defend the latter port, although it was the only station they possessed in the Pacific in which their Fleet could anchor, or obtain the coal or provisions which the result of extended operations might render necessary. If inquiries were made as to the condition of many other of their remote Possessions, he believed it would be found that they were in a most lamentable condition and literally defenceless. Now, under those circumstances, he should have thought that the Admiralty, and the Government generally, would have given every possible encouragement to those Colonies which were disposed to undertake the defence at least of their own ports and harbours, because it was not only the defence of the Colonial ports that would be more efficiently discharged by the Colonies themselves, but any Fleet which might be sent into those neighbourhoods would be set free for other enterprizes. Take the Australian Colonies, for instance. If their Fleet was not required for the local defence of the Australian Colonies, the Fleet employed there, in the event of a war, might be used for offensive, instead of defensive, measures.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the hon. and learned Gentleman was going beyond the Question before the Committee, which was the Navy Estimates, and not their Colonial defences.

MR. GORST would apologize if he had committed any irregularity. He was only pointing out how necessary it was for the efficiency of the British Fleet that the duty of defending the Colonies should be intrusted to the Colonies themselves. His point was, that if they were to spend money in clothing and victualling their seamen and Marines, the Fleets they employed must be capable of taking the seas in order to look for the enemy, instead of being obliged to lurk in the harbours along the coast, where they could not act offensively. He would not, however, pursue the matter further if the Chairman thought he was going beyond what was strictly within the order of that Vote. All he desired to point out to the Committee was that the Admiralty was in a most unhappy position at present, because it was relieved, by the conduct of the Government in appointing a First Lord who was not a Member of the House of Commons, from that salutary check which the debates and opinions of the House would exercise over the Admiralty. He was quite sure that, able as the Board of Admiralty might be, and scientific as some of the Members of it were, and earnestly anxious, as he believed all of them were, to discharge their duty to their country and to maintain the Fleets of the country in a condition of efficiency, the Admiralty would never be able to discharge its responsibilities to the country until they were subjected to the criticism of the House of Commons.

SIR EDWARD J. REED said, he would not attempt, after what had passed in the House that night, to offer any large view of the subject. The Committee had no power to increase any Vote whatever. They only enjoyed the power of diminishing the sums which appeared in the Estimates, and the Admiralty had taken good care that there should be very little to diminish or to come under the notice of the Committee in that direction. There was another reason why he should not enter upon any large question that night, and it was to be found in the words which had fallen from the Prime Minister, touching the Vote of Credit to be moved to-morrow. He thought that as they had a naval debate in view, and as a large proposal of the Government was about to come before them, they would be in a better position to-morrow than they were in at present to discuss the naval armaments of the country. It seemed to him that the Admiralty itself had lately been endeavouring to show to the world that all and more than all which had been stated about the deplorable condition of the British Navy was true. It was said that they were in the possible presence of a war with a powerful European nation, but only a third-rate Naval Power; and no sooner did they come within the presence of that possibility than they found the Admiralty bringing forward in the Dockyards everything they could possibly lay their hands upon, and casting about, among the Mercantile Marine, for colossal ships, altogether unfit for warlike purposes, and without a particle of defence, although they might be fit to perform auxiliary services in connection with the Royal Navy. Recently the Admiralty refused to build, from designs supplied to them by a very eminent builder on the Clyde, a ship of great speed, because it was a ship with a very small amount of armour protection—the Admiralty refused to undertake to build her on the ground that they ought not to construct a ship of so large a size with so little armour. He quite sympathized with them in that feeling; but they told the country now that they were purchasing still larger ships without any armour at all. They were told that the Admiralty were, in point of fact, purchasing passenger steamers of 12,000 tons of the most costly character ever built, but which were not eligible for war steamers, and were not expected to be used for warlike purposes when constructed. He mentioned that to show that the Admiralty were demonstrating one of two propositions—either that they were prepared to spend money recklessly for purposes for which they had refused to spend money wisely and economically, or that the Government was in such a condition that they were driven to this last resource. He maintained that there was no escape from one or other of those conclusions. He desired now to make a few remarks upon the Return which had lately been presented to the House by his hon. Friend below him (Sir Thomas Brassey). It would be in the recollection of the Committee that a few weeks ago he had called attention to a Return laid before the House of armoured and unarmoured vessels, laid down to be built in Her Majesty's Dockyards and by contract, in 1880 or since the present Government came into Office, showing the cost and the progress made with them. He had observed in that Return a large number of unarmoured vessels put down as armoured vessels. On calling the attention of his hon. Friend to the fact, his hon. Friend was good enough at once to acknowledge the error. He spoke of it as a clerical error, and proposed to amend it and substitute an accurate Return. The right hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay) drew attention to another point, and his hon. Friend, with an amount of confidence in the people upon whom he had to depend for information which he thought his hon. Friend would lose in the course of time, said he would undertake that the new Return should be correct in every particular. No one in the House would doubt for a moment that his hon. Friend desired and intended that every document he produced in the House should be strictly accurate. It would, however, be his (Sir Edward J. Reed's) business to take exception to this Return even in its amended form, and to call the attention of his hon. Friend to it. In the first place, he would refer to the diagram to which the right hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir John Hay) on the other side of the House had made allusion. This diagram had been amended, and it now showed, in an almost picturesque form, the rate at which the present Government claimed to have added armoured and unarmoured ships to Her Majesty's Navy. He had gone carefully over the figures, and he was bound to say that every year the additions which were claimed to have been made to the Navy by the present Board of Admiralty were exaggerated and untrue. There was only one year in which they were approximately correct; but in the other years they were very much exaggerated, and there was not a single year in which, as far as he could find out—and he had taken a great deal of pains in going through the matter—the figures were truthfully and correctly given. In saying that, he would wish to guard the Committee against an observation which might possibly be made by his hon. Friend below him, that he was referring to the fact that, generally speaking, the tons of ships built, or professed to be built, by the Admiralty could only be indicated, while a vessel was in course of construction, by speaking of the estimated tons completed. But when that mode of expression was used for the purpose of indicating the additions made to the Navy, the Returns were misleading to Parliament and the public. This appeared to be the principle adopted—supposing 5,000 tons weight of hull were to cost £500,000, and the Admiralty spent £600,000. Thereupon they stated not that they had overspent to the extent of £100,000, but that they had added 1,000 tons to the Navy, whereas they had only built the same ship. On that ground he naturally took exception to any Return prepared upon that principle. It might be said, and had been said, that that was a conventional mode of expressing the work done by the Admiralty, and that there was no more convenient form of expressing the progress made with regard to a ship. That was a point he would not discuss that night; but what he did wish to discuss was this. When they passed out of the region of the ships in progress, and laid before the House a Return of the tonnage of ships completed, and gave a diagram declaring that in 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, and 1884 so many thousand tons were added to the Navy, that Return ought to be an accurate account of the tonnage of ships built. But the Return presented by his hon. Friend was nothing of the kind. It gave the fictitious and not the real tonnage. A Return in this form passed all the bounds of reason, and entirely misled the country. That was not all. What he found to be the fact was this—but he did not wish to speak with the same positiveness upon this matter, because, having a great many figures to go over, he might have lost sight of something—all he would say was that he had taken a great deal of pains in going through the Return, and he found that the tons built, according to the diagram, were 12,864 in the year 1883-4; but he could not find, upon the most careful examination, that the Admiralty had in reality built more than 11,000 tons. He was quite sure that the Return was largely inaccurate in all the years mentioned, except in regard to the year 1881-2, when his figures and those of the Admiralty very closely approximated. This was the first complaint he had to make of the Return, and he appealed to the Government to supply the House with a Return which would express how many tons had been added to the Navy in each year—how many real tons—tons weight of hull, taken in a literal and proper sense, and not in a way in which not one in fifty of the Members of that House could be expected to understand. He would now ask the Committee to allow him to draw their attention to some other figures. The Return professed to show the cost of hull, inclusive of fittings. He would have thought that any Member of the House, taking this Return into his hands and finding a ship in it recorded as complete, with the cost of fittings in connection with the hull and of fittings in connection with the engines expressly included, would infer that the total cost of the ship was given. There was, however, not a single case in which the Returns were, in that sense, accurate and complete—not one, although a great many were given. Again, the Return showed that the present Board of Admiralty had not completed a single ship of over 1,500 tons which they had themselves begun. This paralysis was the more remarkable, because when the Board of Admiralty undertook to conduct the affairs of the Navy, they declared, as their programme, that they would build quickly and turn out ships rapidly. That was the undertaking of the Government, and, unfortunately, the country believed them. Not only in that House, but also before his constituents, he had said he believed they were going to do what they had promised; but the Return showed that this confidence had been misplaced. If any hon. Member would take this Return in hand, he would see that directly he laid his finger on a ship of more than 1,420 tons, he found her incomplete. He was bound, however, to admit that there were one or two unarmoured vessels expected to be completed at the end of last month which were possibly complete. But he believed he was correct in stating that these were still in the hands of the Dockyards. The statement which he made, that the cost of every ship was incorrectly given, and given below the actual cost, was a very serious one. He thought if he were in the position of his hon. Friend, and were made the vehicle for conveying to Parliament a document so deficient in this essential and important particular, he should feel a very great amount of dissatisfaction, to say the least of it. He had taken out a list of five vessels. The Satellite was put down as having cost £62,720. He did not hesitate to say, and he challenged the contradiction of his hon. Friend below him, that the cost of that ship was as near to £70,000 as it was to £60,000. The next ship, the Hyacinthe, was put down at £70,000, and he was sure she had cost £73,000. The Heroine, the cost of which was stated to be £66,889, he was satisfied had cost over £73,000. The Rapid was put down at £68,000; he declared that she had cost over £72,000. The Royalist was stated at £67,000, whereas he declared that she cost over £70,000. These increases were not arrived at by taking into account whatever incidental charges went to make up the cost of the ships, although they ought in strictness to have been included. The Admiralty had received tenders during the last few days for the construction of ships by private builders. Did the Admiralty suppose that those builders had left out of their calculations the cost of fuel, furnace labour, and many other incidental charges in connection with the construction of ships? Of course, any builder who did that would come to grief very quickly; and when Returns were made showing the cost of ships, there should be excluded from them altogether the expenditure incurred in this way on the ships themselves was more than he could understand. Of course, in such calculations a fair amount of incidental charges ought to be added. The result of his investigations with reference to those five ships was that when the allowances which the Accountant

General was in the habit of bringing against ships in the Dockyards were taken into account, the ships which were put down in the Return of his hon. Friend as having cost £332,000 had actually cost £112,000 more than that sum—that was to say, instead of costing £332,000, they had cost £444,000. That was the actual cost, as he made it out, taking the Accountant General's Returns, inclusive of incidental charges. The estimate might be open to correction; but whether it was or not, a very large portion of the additional charge ought to be taken into account, and some intimation ought to be given in the Returns made to that House of the exact cost of the ships to the country. Now, he had made a few days ago a statement in another place, which excited a great deal of attention, and he thought it right to repeat that statement on the present occasion for the information of the Committee. The expenditure of the present Board of Admiralty he made out to have been as follows:—In the first year of Office, 1880-1, they expended a total of £1,426,360 upon new ships. Out of that they spent £1,165,800 upon ships which had been finished, a large application of which they, of course, made to ships which they found unfinished on taking Office. Only £261,500 had been spent on unfinished ships, and that he regarded as an excellent sign. In the next year the amount on finished ships fell to £489,500, and the amount on unfinished ships rose from £260,000 to £705,000. Then, in 1883-4, the amounts were £351,000 only on finished ships, and £1,500,000 on unfinished ships. He made out that up to the 31st March last the Government had expended £8,855,000 in the Dockyards on new ships, out of which £3,259,000 had been expended on finished ships, including, of course, several ships begun by their Predecessors, leaving £5,596,000 as expended on ships lying unfinished at the present moment. Now, if they added to that the incidental charges, which ought to be added, they arrived at the fact that out of the aggregate sum spent about £6,500,000 was invested money, which, at the present moment, was quite unavailable for national purposes. There was another small but curious point in this Return to which he desired to draw the attention of the Committee. His

hon. Friend, as he had already stated, had said that the insertion of some unarmoured ships as iron-clads was the result of a clerical error; but everyone familiar with the Admiralty knew that there had been a strong tendency of late to slip in ships as armoured which were unarmoured, in order to make an extraordinary show in that respect; and that many devices had been resorted to in order to produce the impression that ships were protected, the essential characteristics of which ships being that they had no protection whatever; they had some protection over their machinery, but, as a matter of fact, they themselves were utterly devoid of any protection whatever in the proper sense of the term. Not a single 6d. had been expended on their protection, and nothing could be more extraordinary than that they should have been returned as protected vessels. Again, in the Return, there was a column with the heading "Thickness of armour-plate," and he found in that column astonishing entries for the new Scout torpedo boats. Those vessels had not the slightest pretension to any armour-plating whatever. It was said that the "thickness of armour-plate" in the case of the new Scout meant a thin water-tight deck. He confessed that he could not understand that. He hoped his hon. Friend would use his influence to get the Returns rendered in a clear form to the House, and free from those falsifications—that was to say, as far as it was possible for a man, with heroic determination working against the Department, to get them presented in a truthful shape. It must not be understood by the Committee, from what he was saying, that the Admiralty intentionally made low estimates of the cost of building in their own Dockyards. His own impression was that they tried to make fair estimates, and he believed that they proceeded very much in the same way as private shipbuilders in that respect. But the difference was that the estimates of a private firm were obliged to be adhered to, whereas the estimates of the Admiralty were merely taken as a point of departure from which they could go in all directions. There was a small ship at Chatham called the Conqueror. From the fact of her being comparatively small and an iron-clad of moderate armament, all other conditions corresponding, there was no reason that her estimated cost should not have been adhered to if the calculations had been correctly made. Now, the estimate for that ship was as follows:—for hull, £246,450; machinery, £52,500; the total estimated cost being £298,950. But what was the actual cost of the vessel? It was £380,000; or an excess of £81,050 upon a comparatively small ship. But then he found brought against this ship by the Accountant General an establishment charge of £67,000, because she had been a long time in course of completion; and that brought up the total cost to £447,000. If the Committee were inclined to think, notwithstanding what he said, that there was some novelty or complications or some unexpected element of cost involved in this case which human intelligence could not have foreseen—in other words, if that were an experimental ship—then he would give an instance of what happened a few years ago in a real case of experimental shipbuilding. The late gallant officer Admiral Sartorius, who really put the spirit into this country to resort to the ram, came to him some time before the Polyphemus was begun, and asked him to design a good sort of ship of the ram class. He said—“I am anxious to have my idea carried out; will you design a ship under my advice?” He (Sir Edward J. Reed) undertook to do so, and, having got that promise from him, the Admiral went to the Admiralty, and they undertook to design the ship themselves. They designed the Polyphemus. She was proposed to Parliament, and the cost of the vessel was to be £84,000—that was to say, £42,000 for materials, and £42,000 for labour. He said nothing about the machinery of the ship, because the greater part of that turned out to be an entire failure; and he was not disposed to complain in this case, because the Admiralty had made an experiment which he thought ought to have been made with reference to boilers. He, therefore, confined his observations to the hull alone, and that cost £159,000—that was to say, there was an excess of no less than £75,000 on a ship which was estimated to cost £84,000. And, then, if they added to that the incidental charges—well, he thought he had better not say what the vessel would have cost. He would like to refer to another

vessel—namely, the Edinburgh. That ship was commenced two years before the present Government acceded to Office, but, on various pretexts, she had been under construction until the present time, and was likely to remain so for some time longer. The story of the vessel was this. She was to have cost £450,000, and her machinery £82,000. On the 31st of March last year there had already been spent on her, exclusive of incidental charges, £4,000 more than the estimate—that was to say, she had then cost £536,000 instead of £532,000. Well, the Admiralty said if the House would grant £14,460 for labour only they would make progress with her; they had obtained that money, and now they came down to ask for a further sum of £59,000 to complete the ship. She had been six or eight years building, and the delay that had taken place was so detrimental to the interests of the country that he could not understand any man of sense allowing the construction of a ship to be prolonged over the period he had mentioned; and he would say, in passing, that he regretted to observe in that House the tendency to accept excuses on such grounds as that the difficulty of getting guns had occasioned the delay. He said that the time had come when the House should tell the First Lord of the Admiralty that they could not listen to such excuses at all, but that he must have the guns ready for the ships, and that if he were unequal to the work he should give up his Office and make way for someone more capable of doing what was necessary for the interests of the country in respect to the Navy. He was convinced that if the country became involved in war with any Power or Powers of naval consequence this language would be used towards those men who had failed in these great particulars, unless they retired of their own accord and saved themselves from the censure they deserved. He knew that the Admiralty groaned under the delay in getting guns; but they should insist on having them, and he was convinced that that House would back up any Minister who resisted a system which would not enable them to have the guns of the Navy constructed in their own way. Let the Admiralty free themselves from a system under which the Navy of the country was made to depend on the rapidity with which guns could be manufactured in Woolwich Arsenal. Would the Admiralty tell the Committee that if they granted the additional £59,000 they would actually finish the Edinburgh? Without any charge for material during the last 12 months, they had advanced from £532,000 to £610,000 in the cost of this ship. Before concluding, he would like to observe that he should not be satisfied if his hon. Friend, in reply to this statement, harped on the old string of the experimental character of the ships, and the delay involved by changes in machinery and appliances for loading large guns. He should not be satisfied with that, because the same thing went on with regard to ships which were admittedly not experimental. The same excessive cost and the same unreasonable delay occurred in the case of unarmoured vessels which had none of those appliances, and therefore he should not consider himself in any way answered by being told that the ships were experimental, and that unforeseen difficulties had been discovered. He would not trouble the Committee further than to say that the only course open to hon. Members, when imperfect Returns were placed before them, was to ask Questions and probably to receive snubs at the hands of Ministers; and therefore he trusted that the Returns in the case of the Navy would henceforward be placed before them in a correct form. He hoped that his hon. Friend would not fall back on the gun argument; that he would receive this statement as seriously as he (Sir Edward J. Reed) made it; and that he would be able to explain how it was that ships which had cost so much money had been put down in the Returns as costing so much less, and how it was that the Admiralty claimed to have constructed an amount of tonnage largely in excess of what they had actually turned out. They had lately had a new Accountant General appointed to the Admiralty by the Earl of Northbrook; he understood that that gentleman had no connection with the Department, and that he was stated to be a very able and competent man. He would express, but hesitatingly, the hope that this gentleman would not fall into one error of which the late Accountant General was guilty. Amongst the accounts laid before that House there was the annual Return from the Accountant General. Now, the Accountant General was purely a financial Minister, and it was no part of his duty to take up the position of apologist for, and expounder of, all the irregularities in the Admiralty accounts. It was not for the Accountant General to explain why this large waste of public money went on; he was not a competent authority in the matter, inasmuch as he proceeded upon second or third-hand information, and could only repeat what he was told. The House had already had enough of that sort of information. It was, indeed, a paralyzing fact that answers given to Questions in the House on Admiralty matters were inspired answers, and that hon. Members had to direct their attacks against Gentlemen in that House whose only responsibility was that they had consented to be made the channel through which those inspired answers were conveyed.

MR. A. F. EGERTON: Sir, the Committee has listened to a very able speech from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed). I do not propose to go into all the particulars to which he referred; but I should like to make one or two remarks upon the main portion of his speech, which was an attack upon the amended Return of the Navy Estimates that has been recently issued from the Admiralty. I came to the conclusion that he had shown that that Return, unintentionally, amounts almost to a falsification of accounts, because it takes the additional tonnage that has been added to the Navy solely from the Note which is to be found on page 196 of the Navy Estimates, which gives a peculiar calculation of tonnage. It certainly does not show, and would not show under any circumstances, how the tonnage was added to the Navy, but simply how much money was expended upon ships, and the amount of each man's labour upon the ships. Well, I do not know what answer the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Thomas Brassey) has to give to the hon. Gentleman's (Sir Edward J. Reed's) remarks upon that statement; but I must say that it appeared to me, at the time that I heard it, to be perfectly conclusive, and to be hardly susceptible of any answer at all. Then the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cardiff referred to one matter of very great importance, and that is the manner in which the Estimates are constantly exceeded in the Dockyards in the matter of expenditure on ships. Well, I suppose every Board of Admiralty has suffered from that; and it appears to me to arise in the main from the constant cross references backwards and forwards between the Admiralty and the Dockyards. What happens is this. The Dockyards propose some improvements—and, as far as practice goes, I believe that these proposals come from the Executive officers at the Dockyards, and not from the Civil officers—these proposals are referred to the Admiralty, the Admiralty refers them back again to the Dockyards, after they have been seen by the Constructors' Department, and thus there is a constant communication between the Admiralty and the Dockyards, and the consequence is that, whether rightly or wrongly, there is always a great excess upon the Estimates for ships before they are finished, or anything like finished. I hope that, after the recommendations of the Committee on Shipbuilding have been carefully considered at the Admiralty and the Dockyards, some remedy may be found for this state of things, and that for the future we may have something resembling the state of things that prevails when a private firm gives an order for a ship to a firm of shipbuilders. When a private firm gives such an order the ship is built and delivered out of hand without alteration or delay with these cross references. That is a state of things which, to my mind, ought, as far as possible, to exist at our Dockyards; and I hope that in the future, at any rate, we may see this state of things prevail. But I did not rise to remark so much upon what the hon. Member for Cardiff has said in his very able speech; but I desire to say a few words upon the general principle which I think underlies everything connected with the administration of the Navy. The real question for us to consider, to my mind, is what our requirements are with regard to the Navy, and whether we have anything approaching to a fulfilment of those requirements. Now, it appears to me that the subject of the Navy, both as to defence and as to attack, divides itself under two heads. In the first place, we have the defence of our shores, which implies the power of attack; and, in the second place, we have the defence of our trade, implying the defence of our foreign coaling stations. The real fact for us to consider in the House of Commons is whether the present Administration, not to speak of past Administrations, are doing all in their power to supply these requirements. Now, I would like to make a remark upon something that fell from the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands). In his speech he said, with some truth, that the Admiralty for years—that all Admiralties for years past have been asleep. I think there is a certain amount of truth in that; but I will supplement the observation by saying that if the Admiralty has been asleep, the House of Commons has been asleep also, and the nation behind the House of Commons has likewise been asleep. But he proceeded to say that all Admiralties have neglected the requirements of the country. That is, to a certain extent, true; but, for a moment, compare the state of things that exists now with the state of things which existed under the previous, or under the two previous, Boards of Admiralty. I do not say that the Administration with which I was connected supplied all the requirements of the country; very far from it. I have no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. W. H. Smith) and his Predecessor, the late Mr. Ward Hunt, would have been very glad if they could have persuaded the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give them a much larger sum for the Navy than it was possible for him to allow. Looking at present circumstances, I have no hesitation in saying that the Admiralty to-day is under far more favourable conditions, as far as our naval requirements are concerned, than any past Administration has been. When we left Office our Navy, relatively to the Navies of Foreign Powers, was in a far stronger position than it has been since. I say that without fear of contradiction. From the year 1877 to the year 1880 there was nothing afloat anywhere completed that was at all equal to four of the ships that we had at that time completed and afloat—I mean the Devastation, the Inflexible, the Thunderer, and the Dreadnought. Therefore, we may say, and I think with perfect truth, that from 1878 to 1880 we were in a far stronger position than any Foreign Navy; and let me also remind the Committee that at that time torpedo warfare was hardly developed at all; no one knew at that time what that might be in the future. The late Government did take certain steps to procure torpedoes; but it has been since 1880—between that and the present year—that that weapon and the modes of using it have been so greatly developed. I only say that in passing, and I do not wish further to refer to what took place under any previous Administration. What I wish to inquire into very briefly, if the Committee will allow me, is, what is the present state of affairs? Now, I do not wish to go into details; there are other Gentlemen, including the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Edward J. Reed), who are far more capable of going into details on the state of the Navy than I am; but I wish to give a broad view of the subject. What is the state of the case with regard to the Iron-clad Fleets of foreign countries? If the Returns I have are correct, England at this time has 48 efficient iron-clads of every sort and description, including three Colonial ships. If we compare that with the Fleets of foreign nations, we shall find that France at this time has 46 efficient iron-clads; Italy has nine; Russia has 13—there is some doubt about the exact number that there are in Russia in these Returns—and that Germany has 23. Well, nobody could say fairly, with these figures before them, that England was in a sufficiently pre-eminent position with regard to iron-clad ships. But, besides that, it must be remembered that there are iron-clads in the Pacific, that Chili has a certain number, that Brazil has some, also Japan; and without going into particulars I may say broadly that the iron-clad Fleet of England is immensely overweighted by the number, and, I may say also, the power of the iron-clads of foreign countries. Now, take the condition of the Iron-clad Fleet of Italy at this time. Italy has four ships, every one of which the Italians think—and I have no doubt correctly—is perfectly equal to our strongest ship; and at present they have in them four guns of greater weight than any that we have in our ships. It is true that in the near future we are promised some 100-ton guns for our iron-clads; but so far as I know at present there is not one of our ships armed with that weapon; and judging from the procrastination that seems to prevail, I am afraid, in the Department of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Brand), as well as at the Admiralty, upon my word I do not know when these guns will be placed in the ships. I hope the hon. Gentleman will be able to tell us. I think I have shown that we are in a minority, as far as the first class of vessels is concerned, compared with Foreign Powers. But now I should like to go a little further, and assuming that a war with two first-class Powers was declared at this moment, I should like to ask what we should have to provide in the first instance? That is the serious test of the power of the Navy—the power of opening a war with effect. Now, what should we have to provide in the first instance in case we were at war with two first-class Powers? We should want a Channel Fleet to begin with, probably with head-quarters in the Downs, and we should unquestionably want a North Sea Fleet. We should want a Fleet to guard the shores of Ireland and St. George's Channel; we should want ships in the Mediterranean; and we should want—I am speaking merely of iron-clads—also a certain number of ships in the Pacific, on the China Stations, and on the Australian Stations. Now, without going into the particulars of the strength of each squadron, I may say that from the best information I can procure we should want at least 33 first-class ships under the Admiralty classification—with which the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Thomas Brassey) is so familiar—and at least six second-class ships. Besides that, if we were to provide properly for the commencement of a war, we should have also to provide for the possibility of relieving these ships. I have said that for the squadrons in action we should want from 39 to 40 ships, and for these 39 or 40 ships the reliefs we should require—in this matter I speak subject to correction by naval officers present—would be at least 15 first-class and three second-class iron-clads fit for sea in harbour. But taking it at a lower figure than that, I do not believe that any Naval First Lord, in the case of a war of the description I have mentioned, would be satisfied with less than 10 or 12 ships for purposes of relief. Taking the larger figure, I say the total requirements under the circumstances I have mentioned would be 48 first-class and nine second-class iron-clads. Of course, I am not going into the question, which will be discussed hereafter, as to whether these ships should be barbette or broadside ships. That is a question which experts may better decide than I can pretend to do. But what I would impress upon the Committee is, that out of these 58 ships, at least 48 of them ought to be classified under the Admiralty classification as first-class ships heavily armed. Well, to meet these requirements what have we got in this present year 1885 ready for sea? We have got of first-class iron-clads under the Admiralty classification 12 ready for sea and at sea, and we have nine building, adding to the original programme those which are to be built under the sum which has been recently added to the Navy Estimates. Of ships of the second class we have got 13, some of them good ships, some of them bad; but, whatever they may be, there they are afloat and ready to take action at any moment; and we have got five building. Of course, the five building will be better than many of the 13 existing old ships. Well, of these second-class iron-clads five ships, like the Orion and Belle Isle, mount guns of 25 tons; and, therefore, if necessary, to my mind, they might take their place in line of battle with first-class ships, of which I have mentioned how many we should want. We may have then, within a few months, I may say, 25 heavily-armed ships to meet the demand above indicated of 33 first-class ships; and of that class of ship we shall then have no reserve whatever. I do not say that these requirements are to be met by any Admiralty at once—that would be impossible; but I think that every First Lord of the Admiralty who considers the subject with care and attention, as all First Lords should do, must work up to a programme of that sort. He must see that in course of time the Fleet of this country must necessarily be far stronger than it is at present. I have no doubt that First Lords bear all these things in their heads, and that they do work out problems of that kind; and I venture to think that it is of some importance that not only should the First Lord carry in his head the programme that he is working up to, but that the House of Commons and the nation generally should have some idea of the requirements of a first-class Power as to their Naval Service. Well, Sir, these are the remarks which I principally desired to make to the Committee. There are many other subjects of very great importance—of the greatest possible importance—which I am afraid have been, up to the present time, rather neglected—I will not say only by the present Admiralty, but by all Admiralties—and amongst these subjects the most important is the fortification of our coaling stations, which has been referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) in the earlier part of this debate. So far as I know at the present time there are half-a-dozen coaling stations that are almost entirely without defence. Take Hong Kong for instance. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) told us the other day, in answer to a Question, that something was to be done there; but, so far as our information goes from Hong Kong itself, it seems that the inhabitants are very far from satisfied with the operations that are being carried on. They do not think that they are in a proper state of defence.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. Gentleman that the remark I made to the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) applies to the observations he is now making. The question of fortifications is irrelevant on this Vote, and that with regard to the Colonies he can only refer to such subjects as come under this Vote.

MR. A. F. EGERTON: Then I will not refer to this matter any further; I will only say that with fixed fortifications the Admiralty has nothing to do, and that it is connected more with the War Office than with any other Department. But there are other subjects which are of the greatest importance and with which the Admiralty is very greatly concerned; and one of these questions is that of torpedo defence for our ports. I have some reason, I think, to fear that the Admiralty are not sufficiently alive to the necessity of speedily building torpedo boats. There is one point which probably it will be better to discuss under Vote 10, Section 2; but still it has reference to money for providing torpedo boats, and, so far as I can make out, I do not think the Admiralty have proposed a sufficient sum to provide for this class of boat. But, as I have said, this subject will come up again in detail under Vote 10, Section 2, and I will then take the liberty of making a few remarks upon it. But I would point out that it is of the greatest importance that the whole system of torpedo defence and attack should be most seriously taken in hand by the Admiralty, and that the leeway we have made should be compensated for as speedily as possible. At present, there is no doubt we are far behind, not only Russia, but also Germany and France, in our supply of torpedo boats, and in the kind of torpedo boats we possess. I venture to hope that whatever the Admiralty do with a new sum, which it is reported will be charged for this service within the next few days, that at any rate this question of torpedo defence and attack will have their most serious attention.

MR. CAINE: The hon. Member who has just spoken stated that from 1878 to 1880 we enjoyed a far stronger position than any Navy in the world, and he went on to state that our Navy to-day is in a position of inferiority compared with the position it was in during that period. Well, much as I deprecate these continual comparisons with other nations, if they are forced upon us, we must meet them, and in meeting this I do not hesitate to say that to-day we are relatively in as strong a position as regards any other Navy as we were in the years to which the hon. Member has referred. I have with me a list of the battle ships of European nations in 1884—ships built and building. I have put these ships into the first and second class. The first class consists of ships of over 8,500 tons displacement, and the second class of ships of 8,500 tons displacement and under, the minimum thickness of armour being in every case not less than seven inches. I omit the purely coast defence vessels. Without going into detail as to the ships of the first and second class, built and building, I may say that, exclusive of the recent shipbuilding programme laid down in September last, we had last year 37 battle ships with a total displacement of 296,430 tons, while France had, built or building at the same time, 35 vessels with a displacement of only 247,848 tons. When we have completed our shipbuilding programme we shall have 46 first and second-class vessels with a total displacement of 361,430 tons, against a condition of things in France almost exactly as that which exists to-day. Italy has nine first and second-class ships, built and building, with a total displacement of 91,603 tons. Germany has 10 first and second-class ships, built and building, with a displacement of 72,557 tons. Russia has nine first and second-class ships, built and building, with a displacement of 70,812 tons, and Austria has seven first and second-class ships, built and building, with a displacement of 37,600 tons. Turkey has five first and second class ships, built and building, with a displacement of 25,810 tons. That is our information with regard to the Navies of the world. Now, it has often been urged that our Navy ought to be equal to the Navies of any two or three other Powers. I am not prepared to agree with that statement; but, as a matter of fact, when we have completed our shipbuilding programme which is now laid down, we shall be stronger than any other two Navies in the world, for we shall then have 46 ships, with a total displacement of 361,430 tons. France and Italy, combined, will have 44 ships, with a total displacement of 339,451 tons; France and Germany will have 45 ships, with a total displacement of 320,405 tons; and France and Russia will have 44 ships, with a total displacement of 318,160 tons. Taking three Fleets combined, France, Italy, and Germany would have 54 ships, with a displacement of 412,008 tons; France, Italy, and Russia would have 53 ships, with a displacement of 409,763 tons; France, Italy, and Turkey would have 49 ships, with a displacement of 365,261 tons; and France, Germany, and Russia would have 54 ships, with a displacement of 390,717 tons. I think that these figures conclusively prove that our Navy to-day is, at any rate, in as good a position as compared with the Navies of Foreign Powers, as it was in 1880, and that it has completely kept up its efficiency. Now, I do not suppose that the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) will expect us to reply categorically to all the mass of affairs he brought before us to-day? I can only promise him that when the day comes—and I, equally with himself, hope it will come soon—when he brings his Motion before us, that we shall be prepared to deal with his figures on the Shipbuilding Vote. The hon. Gentleman has criticized, with that severity which generally characterizes his criticism, the Return of ships, built and building, which has been laid on the Table of the House. He told us that the figures every year were exaggerated and untrue—that they were wilfully misleading. [Sir EDWARD J. REED: No, no.] I took the hon. Member's words down at the time, and I am glad that my hon. Friend withdraws them. He used the word misleading at any rate. He said that not one of the costs of ships was accurately stated; and he certainly made the remark that devices had been resorted to in making up the Return in question.

SIR EDWARD J. REED: I beg pardon; I do not wish to be misrepresented. What I said was that the Return had been framed so as to make as good a show of ships as possible.

MR. CAINE: Well, I will not press the matter. The hon. Member has made his remarks solely on his own authority. This Return has been very carefully drawn by the Admiralty; and until the hon. Gentleman sustains the charge which he has made against it, I must ask the Committee to accept it as correct, and to believe that the Department is as well able to make as correct a Return of facts and figures concerning its Office as the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman has made some observations with regard to the watertight decks of vessels of the Scout class. It is true that these vessels have watertight decks. The deck is what it is represented to be, and we do not claim that it is anything else. My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) spoke at some length about the time taken in shipbuilding, and my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) commented rather severely upon the same subject. The latter Gentleman spoke of six or eight years being occupied in building iron-clads in our own yards. It is quite true it takes five or six years to build a first-class iron-clad; but that is considerably less time than that taken by other nations. The average time taken to build a first-class iron-clad in France is seven years and five months; but in England the average time is only five years and three months. My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley also made some severe strictures on the composition of the Board of Admiralty. He asked whether the Board of Admiralty knew anything about the construction of vessels of war; and he asked further who were the advisers of the Board. The hon. Gentleman expressed the opinion that the Board ought to include one of the greatest engineers who could be found in the Kingdom. My own impression is that the hon. Member does not know what the composition of the Board is, or he would know that we enjoy the privilege of having, as one of our Colleagues, one of the greatest engineers in matters connected with shipbuilding—namely, Mr. Rendel. I think that is a conclusive answer to the hostile criticism which was made by my hon. Friend as to the composition of the Board of Admiralty. When these Estimates were last before the Committee the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) raised several points of interest and importance. The right hon. Gentleman was anxious on the torpedo question, and he recommended an increase in the number of officers and gunners, and also an increase of the training facilities. Last Friday the Treasury sanctioned an increase in the aggregate authorized number of gunners and boatswains on the active list of from 680 to 728. This, I may inform my right hon. Friend, is entirely to meet the increasing demands of the torpedo service. Then, we have recently increased the facility for training and instruction. We have, within the last few months, had fitted as additional torpedo schools, the Defiance at Plymouth and the Donegal at Portsmouth. A new torpedo range has been fitted at Malta, and we have decided to proceed with the fitting of a thoroughly complete torpedo range at Portsmouth. In this respect, therefore, I think our arrangements are satisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman expressed anxiety about the number of ships ready and the time in which they could be manned. He feared we were short of stokers and artificers, and he asked if we could readily avail ourselves of our Reserves for the purpose of manning. We have not as many blue-jackets as we could wish considering the large number who are always under instruction in gunnery and in the use of the torpedo. If we are short on an emergency it will be due to the great reduction of the boys which was made by the Administration of my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. H. Smith). We have always looked to the Merchant Service and to private trade for our reserve of stokers and artificers, and recent experience has fully justified our confidence. Nothing can be more satisfactory than the manner in which the ships have been got ready in the last few weeks. At no time has the Admiralty been better off for stokers. The arrangements for engine-room artificers are quite satisfactory. Some other classes of artificers, not so important as engine-room artificers, are rather short; but we should have no difficulty at all in filling up all requirements from private trade, in case of emergency. Our London recruiting station is besieged by men of this class seeking employment. It is an interesting fact that large numbers of these men are in employment, but seem anxious to offer their services to Her Majesty. My right hon. Friend stated, in the course of his speech a few nights ago, that we could not man the first reserve of ships at Portsmouth in three weeks. We could have 7,000 or 8,000 men ready for sea in a week without calling out the Naval Reserve. With the Naval Reserve we could depend upon 20,000. A Return, recently published, shows the number of men in the Reserve. It is estimated that in the coasting trade and at home there are in the first class 7,829, and in the second class 7,593, or a total in the two classes of 15,422. Of these, 2,496 are on long and short voyages; but nearly 1,200 are expected home within the next two months. The right hon. Gentleman asks how many completed ships are ready, and in how many days these ships could be manned. We have ready to-day 10 iron-clads—the Devastation, Ajax, Thunderer, Hotspur, Rupert, Orion, Iron Duke, Colossus, Black Prince, and Conqueror—eight ships for coast defence, 20 corvettes and cruisers, and 27 gunboats; and I am informed officially that they could be manned, in an emergency, under 10 days. My right hon. Friend also complained of the insufficient provision for repairs. We have no efficient iron-clad ship needing repair. It has always been the policy of the present Board to keep the Iron-clad Fleet in a complete state of repair. My right hon. Friend also asked for information on the subject of the increased cost per ton. He said the average cost per ton of ships was estimated in 1883-4 at £33 6s. 9d., in 1884-5 at £34 8s. 9d., and in 1885-6 at £35 5s. 9d. In 1884 we were just beginning some new ships. Some of the Admirals were begun in the previous year, and we were working on the old Estimates for the Edinburgh and Colossus; but since that time we have been obliged to increase the Estimates for all the others. The tendency of modern ships of war is to increased cost per ton, and not towards decrease. The programme of new shipbuilding was stated by my right hon. Friend to be less than was promised for the year. I can only assure the Committee that we intend to spend all the money promised. It was always intended to build not less than 28,000 tons in Dockyards and by contract, and that amount will be built. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster also asked for an explanation of the changes made in propelling machinery of the Benbow, Howe, Rodney, and Camperdown, which in 1884-5 were shown as of 7,500 indicated horse power, but which are now shown as 9,500 horse power, and of the Hero, which was formerly shown as of 4,500 horse power, and now shown as of 6,000 horse power. The changes were made in consequence of a decision to apply forced draught with the very desirable result of an additional knot in speed. The engines, in fact, are better than promised. There has been a Question asked to-night on the subject of the recommendations of the Committee on Shipbuilding, and I think my right hon. Friend asked the same question in his speech some time ago. A Paper will presently be laid before the House showing what is proposed to be done, and therefore I will not say more on that point at present. I now come to the observations made by the right hon. Gentleman as to the alleged non-fulfilment of the shipbuilding programme of 1884-5, and it seems to me that they call for a very careful reply. He has spoken of the figures of the Estimates of last year as absolutely fallacious. That is a very serious charge. The subject has also been referred to by the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed), and the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands). Well, Sir, in the Estimates for the year 1884-5, the tonnage (weight of hull) proposed to be built in the Dockyards was—armoured, 10,500; protected, 2,667; unarmoured, 2,888; or a total of 16,055. The tonnage actually built, as shown in the Estimates for 1885-6, was—armoured, 10,745, a gain on the Estimate of 245; protected, 2,160, showing a loss of 507; unarmoured, 3,261, showing a gain of 373; making a total of 16,166, and showing a net gain in the Dockyards of 111 tons. The tonnage estimated to be built by contract in 1884-5 was—armoured, 2,114; unarmoured, 2,510; or a total of 4,624. The tonnage actually built was—armoured, 2,080, showing a loss of 34; unarmoured, 2,164, a loss of 346; making a total of 4,244. There was thus a net loss by contract of 380 tons. From these figures it appears that, taking Dockyard and contract work together, we built—armoured tonnage, 12,825 tons, as against 12,614 promised, or a gain of 211 tons; protected tonnage, 2,160 tons, as against 2,667 promised, or a loss of 507 tons; unarmoured tonnage, 5,425 tons, as against 5,398 promised, or a gain of 27 tons. On the whole ship-building programme of the year there was thus a net loss of 269 tons. I think that is as near an approximate result of the promise as anyone could reasonably expect. To take first the armoured ships. Having built 211 tons more than was promised in the past year, how comes it that, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the armoured ships were not advanced towards completion to the extent anticipated in the Estimates—in fact, that they fell short of such advancement by no less than 1,739 tons? The explanation lies in the use of the word ton in connection with shipbuilding. It seems to fall to the lot of the Representatives of the Admiralty to explain year after year what is meant by the use of the word ton. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster has criticized this use of the word ton, and has repeated year after year that this ton is not a ton at all—we are, in fact, deceiving ourselves. We have only continued the use of a term and method of calculation which was in use at the Admiralty during the whole time the right hon. Gentleman was First Lord. The fact is that, as applied to a ship during its construction, the word ton loses its original meaning as a measure of weight, and becomes a measure of progress. At starting the actual weight of the hull is calculated in tons. Thus, if the hull weighs 6,000 tons, and the cost of construction as shown in the Estimates is £400,000, as soon as half this money has been spent, it would be said, and so stated in the Estimates, that half the tons weight of the hull—that is, 3,000 tons—had been constructed. But it is immaterial for this purpose whether or not the half of the hull that has been constructed actually weighs 3,000 tons. Half the money that the ship is to cost has been expended, and it is said, therefore, that half the work is done. This is absolutely true if the ship will be completed by the expenditure of the remaining half of the money; but if at this stage it is found that, for one reason or another—such as changes introduced into the original design of the ship, increased cost of materials, or even through a miscalculation of the cost at the beginning—the remaining £200,000 will not suffice to complete the ship, perhaps a further sum of, say, £100,000 will be required; then, inasmuch as half the total cost of the ship has not been expended, we can no longer say that half the tonnage, or 3,000 tons, has been built. We must put the ship back, so to speak; our calculation will have to be revised; and as only £200,000 out of £500,000 has been spent, we must now admit that only two-fifths of the tonnage, or 2,400 tons out of the 6,000, has been constructed. Here, the right hon. Gentleman will say, is a loss of 600 tons. But this is not so. There has really not been any loss at all. The money provided in the Estimates has been spent, and the corresponding amount of work has been done. But the work necessary to complete the work has turned out to be greater than was anticipated, and hence the ship is not so far advanced towards completion, for the money spent upon her, as she would have been had nothing occurred to interfere with the original design and Estimate. Objection has been taken to the use of the word ton. But what term would serve us any better to indicate the rate of a ship's progress? The French speak of hundredths in lieu of tons, and find themselves in the same difficulty as we do. The fact is, it does not matter what term you make use of, as long as you take care to keep in view the purpose for which it is employed, and the sense in which you use it. Comparing the figures given in the Estimates in 1884-5 with those for 1885-6, there appears, as has been stated, to be a loss of armoured tonnage amounting to 1,739 tons. The ships in which this so-called loss has occurred are chiefly the Impérieuse, with a loss of 975 tons, and the Warspite, with a loss of 572 tons. The total cost of the Impérieuse has been increased by £52,900, and the total cost of the Warspite has been increased by £25,000. The circumstances which have caused this apparent loss are—firstly and chiefly, the changes involved in the adoption of a modified type of boilers. It was intended, in the first instance, to fit them with a locomotive type of boiler, and then it was decided after the trial of the Polyphemus to change the type. The Impérieuse, at the time of making the alteration, was much farther advanced than the Warspite. Secondly, alterations consequent upon the adoption of Vavasseur mountings for barbette guns, and those due to changes in Vavasseur broadside carriage. Thirdly, changes in the hold, to provide the stowage of quick-firing gun ammunition. Fourthly, an alteration in the thickness of the wood sheathing; in the breastwork on the spar deck adjacent to the barbettes, and in the position and number of torpedo ports. In the protected ships there has been a real loss of tonnage in the past year. The tonnage promised has fallen short of the amount executed by 507 tons. This loss is accounted for chiefly by the decision to abandon the construction of a ship of the Mersey type at Devonport. The apparent loss has been rather in excess of the real loss. It amounts to 590 tons—namely, in the Mersey, 41 tons; in the Severn, 192 tons; in the Thames, 113 tons; in the New Mersey, 314 tons; total, 660 tons, less a gain on the Forth of 70 tons. The excess is attributable, as in the case of the armoured vessels, to changes in the designs and consequent increase of cost. In the case of the Mersey, Severn, Forth, and Thames, alterations were made from the original design, giving 8-inch guns in place of 6-inch on the poop and forecastle, involving special strengthenings of the decks, &c., also substituting teak in place of fir of deck under the broadside guns. In the unarmoured tonnage there has been a real gain in the Dockyards of 373 tons, but an apparent loss of 558 tons. The loss has occurred chiefly on the Calliope and Amphion, and is due to changes introduced into the designs. In the case of the Calliope there was a change of armament involving the building of sponsons for the guns, and in the case of the Amphion the original Estimate for armament and sponsons was altered from what was intended. In the unarmoured tonnage to be built by contract there is a real loss of 346 tons. This was caused by the decision not to proceed with the construction of the new torpedo dépôt ship New Hecla, combined with minor changes. It thus appears that, while on the whole shipbuilding programme of the past year there has been a real loss of only 269 tons, the apparent loss amounts to 3,488 tons. The right hon. Member for Westminster pronounces the figures in the Estimates to be “absolutely fallacious,” and accuses the Admiralty of stating that “a certain amount of work will be done which is not done.” This condemnation is not justified by the facts, for, as has been shown, the total amount of tonnage executed in the year, taking all the ships together, corresponds closely with the amount promised in the Estimates. It is only the estimate of the state of advancement towards completion of certain ships that is at fault. It is at fault for the simple reason that a loss which has really been accumulating from the commencement of building is now taken account of, and the loss of former years is added to the loss proper to the year. In fact, our accounts all show the loss proper to the year, but do not include the loss in former years. This forecast is made a year in advance, and is liable to disturbance, as has been shown from changes introduced into the design of the ship, increased cost of materials, or other unforeseen circumstances. Alterations in designs are unavoidable incidents whatever Board of Admiralty may be in Office. Armoured ships necessarily take years to build, and it is almost certain that valuable suggestions will be made in that interval to which it is impracticable for the Admiralty to close their eyes. The most that can be done is to insist that no changes shall be made in the original design, unless it can be shown conclusively that they are of such value as to justify the increased cost, and the delay consequent on their adoption, and such as will give us a better ship in the end. We contend that no such changes have been made except with that object in view. No change of any kind has been made by the Admiralty during the progress of these ships which has not distinctly added to the value of the ships to the full amount of the money expended. Well, Sir, I have endeavoured, as far as possible, to meet the contention of my right hon. Friend, and of other speakers to-night, with regard to the fulfilment of the pledges of the Admiralty as to their shipbuilding programme of last year. My explanation is satisfactory to my own mind, and I hope it will be equally satisfactory to my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster.

MR. W. H. SMITH: It is very gratifying to know that the statement which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Caine) has made, and which I am sure he has made in perfect good faith, is entirely satisfactory to himself. I speak in the presence of a great many Gentlemen who are acquainted with shipbuilding, and I think that if they were informed that so many tons of shipping had been built because a certain sum of money had been spent upon a ship they would express great surprise, and their entire unwillingness to deal with any shipbuilding firm who treated them in that way. The truth is this—that these figures to which I refer are fallacious. I repeat the statement with the full consciousness of the responsibility which I assume in doing so—I say that the figures on page 191 of the Estimates of 1884-5, and on page 197 of the Estimates of 1885-6, are entirely fallacious. They give an impression which is not justified by the facts. They say that so many tons of shipping have been added to the Navy; but the truth is that a certain sum of money has been spent in shipbuilding which has not produced the result that was anticipated when the Estimate was framed. If you turn to page 204 of the Estimates of 1884-5, and page 210 of the Estimates of 1885-6, you see there a statement of the work done, which is more or less trustworthy;

but, comparing that statement with the statement in the previous pages of the same Estimates, you will find the differences of which I speak. There are two sets of figures. First of all there is the Estimate of the work to be done in the coming year, and then there is a record of the work done. These figures do not correspond with the statement in the abstract of shipbuilding completed for sea in the later pages of the Estimates. The figures in the later pages are more or less correct; but the figures in the earlier part on which the Admiralty rest are fallacious. They are intended to create an impression in the minds of the public which is not justified by facts. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Caine) says it very often happens that the work upon ships turns out to be greater than was expected. "It does not matter," the hon. Gentleman added, "what term is used, provided the money is spent; changes of boilers, alterations in the armaments, and other considerations, have affected the original Estimate of the cost of the ships." The changes have been made, but they do not produce a larger ship; they do not produce, in many cases, a better ship. The result is that we are paying a great deal more for our ships than we expected, and, at the same time, less shipping is built than we were led to believe would be built. Those were figures based, not on any assumptions of my own, but upon the Returns brought forward by the Admiralty itself, and inserted in page 204 of last year's Estimates, and page 210 of the Estimates of the present year. I assume that those Estimates are correct, as they have always compared much more nearly with the expense accounts of the Admiralty; and I think there is reason to believe they are accurate, or, at any rate, that they may taken as more or less trustworthy. I do not wish to go into this matter at great length; all I desire to do is to point out to the Committee that the subject is one which requires very careful attention and consideration. Let us consider how this House has been dealt with in regard to this matter. On the 2nd of December last the Admiralty announced, in both Houses of Parliament, that they had made provision in the Estimates for building 29,810 tons of shipping in the course of the coming year. In the Estimates that were presented to this House only two months later, they provided, according to the fallacious principle which I contend they have been acting upon, for the building of only 28,000 tons, so that their proposal put forward in February was less by $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent than the solemn engagement they announced to this House in December. This, I think the Committee will see, was not only a very rapid change, but a very extraordinary and important change; but it was still more serious, because we were exposed to this danger—that even these 28,000 tons of actual shipping would not be built, but that we should have only a proportion of those 28,000 tons built, having reference to what had been the case during the past year, when there was a deficiency of 3,700 tons of shipping out of 20,000 tons. Bearing this in mind, we have, I say, to look forward to a deficiency of at least 5,000 tons on the 28,000 tons that have been promised; and instead of our having 29,800 tons built, in accordance with the engagement made in this House in December last, I will undertake to say that, unless there is a complete change in the system pursued, we shall only have some 23,000 tons completed by this time next year. This being the case, it would be far better for the Government to say definitely one thing or the other. Let them say at once—"We only intend to build 23,000 tons;" so that the House and the country may really know what they are about. In that case, if the country is content or satisfied with such an engagement, I, at least, shall have nothing more to say. But I do object to expectations being held out to us in the Estimates which are not to be realized, but which, having regard to all past experience, fall short of the Estimates put before this House, just as the performance of last year and the year before has fallen short of the Estimates of those years. Turning to another point, I may say that I have made no complaint that improvements are made in the mechanical arrangements of the ships; I have made no complaint that improvements are made in the armaments of those ships; but I do complain of the system under which these improvements are made, and which I believe to be an extravagant and an injurious system; and I say plainly and unhesitatingly that instead of £35 a-ton the cost of our ships is £40 or £45 a-ton under a system which I assert is absolutely fallacious and unsatisfactory. Now, Sir, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Caine) has spoken of ships which can be put in commission in the space of 10 days. I am not acquainted with all the ships he mentioned, but I am acquainted with the condition of the Colossus and the Conqueror; and I have no hesitation in saying that those two ships cannot be completed under a period of six weeks or two months from the present time, because the loading gear for their guns has only been recently supplied, and it will take about two months to get it on board the ships. Last year we were informed that the Conqueror had been completed; but I object to being told that any ship has been completed until she is ready to hoist her pennant to proceed to sea. What I desire is that the Admiralty should let us know what is our real position with regard to the strength of the Navy. If it is a strong position, well and good, and let them say so; but if our position be weak, let us know that it is so. All we require is that they should make us acquainted with our strength or weakness, whichever it may be. Then again, Sir, my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey) told us on the 17th of March something about our steam pinnaces. He stated that there were 170 steam pinnaces available for torpedo work. But I should like to be informed how many Whitehead torpedoes have been served out to those steam pinnaces? I should also like to be told how many of those steam pinnaces have been fitted for the Whitehead torpedo service; how many have been assigned to the Dockyards for Dockyard service; and how many have been assigned to the harbours for harbour service; and, also, whether there is a single steam pinnace or a single torpedo boat, which has not yet been assigned to the Fleet, which would be available for coast and harbour defence, and whether there is any expectation that even within the next three months, or, I will say, the next six months, there will be a single torpedo boat fitted with Whitehead torpedoes available for the service of our coast and for the protection of our harbours? My own impression is that the deficiency in this respect is so great that there is nothing in the shape of torpedo boats available for the defence of our harbours and coasts, as they are all required for the service of the Fleet; and, as far as steam pinnaces are concerned, anything that may be fit for torpedo service would, I think, be absorbed entirely by the Fleet. We have been told that there is to be a Return laid upon the Table very shortly by the Admiralty in reference to the recommendations of the Committee on Shipbuilding. Now, one of the most important recommendations of that Committee, and one also which was supported by the Director of Naval Construction in a Paper to which I referred on a recent occasion, was in favour of the more rapid completion of the ships taken in hand, no matter whether those ships were armour-clad or unarmoured ships. The Constructor to the Navy gave three years as the time with which an armoured ship could be completed from the moment she was laid down. I believe that if the Admiralty were to insist on the completion of each ship within a period of three years from the time at which she was first laid down, a very large proportion of the incidental expenses, which the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) and the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) have complained of, would be saved, and all those discrepancies between money and tonnage, to which the Civil Lord of the Admiralty has referred, would disappear entirely. It ought to be sufficient for the Admiralty to procure the design for a ship, and to require that that ship should be completed, whether in one of Her Majesty's Dockyards or by a contractor, as she was designed. It must be possible for the Admiralty to decide beforehand what the armament of a ship should be, and to insist that that ship, with her armour and armament, and all the mechanical appliances she would require, should be put in hand when she was designed and completed within the time specified. The reason for all the delay that takes place, and the cause of all the consequent extra expense, is this. The Admiralty lay down a ship without having, in the first instance, fully determined what her armament is to be; they then wait for six, or even for 12, months, to make up their minds on these points, in order to get over another year's Estimates, and then they wait for a further year before ordering the mountings of the guns, and for the same reason—namely, to get them into a later year's Estimates. In the meantime, some suggestions are made for improvements, certain inventions and alterations are recommended to the Admiralty, which cause still further delay, and have the effect of enormously increasing the cost of the ship. Now, if they would have the ship completed off-hand, they would be able to start afresh with another and as they went on with their shipbuilding they would have in what was done some suggestions that would enable them to effect improvements in the next ship they laid down. But they will not adopt this course. The hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) has referred to the Edinburgh, which has been put on one side and taken in hand two or three times in the course of its construction; and it should be remembered that during all the time our ships are being thus dealt with the capital employed upon them remains unproductive, as nothing can be done with the vessels. I should like to know whether the new ships which are being built by contract—and we have not yet been told what contracts have been accepted—are to be built out of hand? The suggestion has been made that if they are to be built by contract, it would be to the interest of the contractors to go on and finish the ships as rapidly as possible. I am led to believe that the time given to the contractors for the completion of the ships intrusted to them is much longer than the contractors themselves desire to have, and that it would be more to their interest and advantage that the ships they have to build should be completed in less time than that which is specified in the contracts. I know that there are contractors who would be glad to build iron-clads and complete them in three years, or less than three years, once for all.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman assumes that the long terms given to the contractors have been introduced since he was at the Admiralty.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I know that the system was very much complained of at the time I was at the Admiralty; but I had not the responsibility of building any iron-clads by contract while I was there, or I should have proposed that they should have been completed in shorter periods, as I am well aware of the loss sustained by the country owing to the present system, which has frequently been insisted on as an evil by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House; and I have learnt to follow their good example by calling the attention of this House and of the country to it. I wish, therefore, to know from the hon. Gentleman who will reply on behalf of the Government what the time allotted to the contractors for the construction of the new ships really is; whether it is more than the Director of Naval Construction has considered to be necessary for the building of such ships; and whether it is more than the Committee on Repairs and Building Contracts would themselves sanction? The hon. Gentleman has referred to the fact that all the iron-clads, or at any rate all the efficient iron-clads, are in good repair. I am sure that that statement was regarded by the Committee as an exceedingly gratifying one, especially after the very unpleasant series of statements made to us last week, when we were told that the Nep- tunc could not steam 10 knots an hour; that the Channel Squadron was suffering from the prevalence of the boiler disease, as it has been termed; and that the Monarch had broken down altogether in the Mediterranean, and was burning blue lights and sending up rockets for help within a short distance from Malta, after having been cast off by a tug which had burnt out her coal. I do not believe that our iron-clads are in such perfect order as has been made out, as far as their boilers are concerned. If they were, I do not think there would be any hesitation in giving a Return showing the condition of the boilers, such as has been given in past years, but which is refused now. If the boilers were in good order, the Admiralty would no doubt be prepared to say they are in good order in regard to each particular ship. Such a Return has been given in times past, and there is a good deal that I should like to know at the present moment about the condition of the boilers. Here is a statement which is a commentary on the very satisfactory state of mind in which the Admiralty would appear to exist with regard to the condition of the boilers. I would also ask is it a fact that there is at least one other iron-clad now in the Mediterranean that can hardly crawl along in consequence of the state of her boilers; is it the fact, furthermore, that the Euryalus, which is not an iron-clad, but which is the flagship on the East India Station, had to be tugged up the Red Sea and through the Mediterranean to Malta, for the purpose of being docked, because her boilers had broken down; and, if so, what is about to be done? I should also like to know what is proposed to be done, or what has been done, in regard to cruisers, now that we have occasion for employing them? Are the Inconstant, the Shah, and the Boadicea to be repaired and made efficient; and, if not, why not? What is to be done with regard to those and other vessels that are required as cruisers under present circumstances? If, as we find has been the case, Her Majesty's Government have deemed it necessary to hire large passenger steam ships from private trading Companies vessels that are to be converted into cruisers, how is it that these fast and powerful war ships have not been made available? Turning, now, to another matter, I desire to refer to what I consider the very satisfactory assurance that has been given to the Committee with regard to the increased arrangements for torpedo instruction. I am very glad to find that the Admiralty has taken this matter into serious and practical consideration. But in regard to the number of blue-jackets, I have on a previous occasion expressed doubts as to whether there was a sufficient supply; but I was told that the reduction in the number of boys which I had effected in 1878-9 had had an influence on the number of blue-jackets at the present time. This, no doubt, may be true; but I would remind the Committee that the present Board of Admiralty reduced the number of boys by 800 more than the reduction I effected; so that the conclusion at which they must have arrived in 1880 was, doubtless, that there was a surplus of blue-jackets which it was desirable to decrease. As far as my own action is concerned, I am not at all ashamed to say that I effected every economy I possibly could in the Service, having, of course, due regard to the maintenance of its efficiency; but the present Board of Admiralty has gone far beyond what I did, for they have reduced the number both of the boys and of the Marines, and I am very much afraid that we shall want both the boys and the Marines who have been so reduced. I am glad to see that the number of boys is to be increased; but the result will hardly compensate for the reduction already effected, because those 800 boys to whom I have just referred would now have been valuable constituents of our naval strength had they been retained for the service of the country. There is one question I should like to ask my hon. Friend opposite; and that is whether he will undertake that the 28,000 tons the Admiralty has promised shall really be built in the course of the present year? If the Admiralty will do this they will accomplish a good deal towards the necessary increase of the strength of the Navy, and will have done a good deal also towards satisfying the expectations of the country. Nevertheless, I am still at a loss to understand why Her Majesty's Government should have reduced their original proposal; and I leave it for this House to say whether it is satisfied with a diminution of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in February of that which was promised by the Admiralty in the preceding December.

MR. NORWOOD said, it had not been his intention to have intervened in this discussion; but in consequence of the course it had taken he felt it his duty to offer a few observations. He thought that in discussing a question of this kind the Committee ought to divest their minds of anything like Party bias. He had served on the Admiralty Committee on Shipbuilding, to which so much reference had been made in the course of the debate; and having had the advantage, or the disadvantage, of being present at very many discussions on Navy Estimates, he confessed that it seemed to him to be difficult for any one Administration to point the finger of scorn at the other, and to claim that a particular Board of Admiralty had been more effective in its naval administration than another. He thought that whatever might be the individual views of hon. Members with regard to the present state of naval affairs, it was not fair or right to attempt to shift the responsibility from one side to the other. It had been said on the present occasion, as had been stated on many previous occasions, that the condition of naval affairs was ripe for discussion in that House; and he had often heard hon. and gallant Gentlemen on both sides of the House, as he had that evening heard his hon. Friend the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, institute comparisons between the Navy of this country and the Navies of other countries, especially as to the amount of money expended by this country and by France. To his mind they ought to look upon the naval expenditure of this country as the amount of insurance paid for the vast amount of shipping property it possessed, and the enormous trade it carried on every sea. He regarded the amount of their expenditure in this respect as too small, and considered all Boards of Admiralty equally blameable for the result. If he had regard to the Returns made of the value of our imports and exports, what did he find? He found that for the year 1883 the combined amount of those imports and exports was stated at £732,000,000. Taking the value of their shipping at £10 per ton, on a total tonnage of 7,026,062, he found that it reached the sum of £70,260,620, the two items together making a gross total of £802,260,620. The sum of £11,500,000, put down in the Navy Estimates, amounted only to an insurance of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on that amount; and in arriving at that result he entirely put out of calculation the all-important considerations connected with the defence of their property on land, and the frightful state of things that would result in this country should it at any time find its first line of defence seriously imperilled. He, therefore, thought it false economy on the part of Her Majesty's Government to limit their naval expenditure to a sum varying from £11,000,000 to £12,000,000 per annum, when there were such vast interests to be protected. He believed that there was much room for improvement in their naval administration, and that they would never get a satisfactory return for their naval expenditure until they had a reform in the constitution of the Board of Admiralty. He was satisfied that the administration of that Board was not based on sound commercial principles; and although he did not deem it his duty on the present occasion to point out where he thought a reform ought to take place, he had no hesitation in saying that it would be impossible for any private shipowner, however wealthy he might be, to conduct his business on the basis adopted by the Board of Admiralty and to keep himself out of the Court of Bankruptcy. Two points arising out of the recommendations of the Admiralty Committee had been dwelt upon by several hon. Members who had taken part in the debate, and especial reference had been made to the constant delay which took place in the construction of the ships laid down for the service of the country. Under the present system they commenced the construction of a large vessel, and after a certain amount of work had been done upon it there was a stoppage. After a long interval the work of construction was recommenced, only to be again broken off, and in that way a vessel that ought to have been constructed in three years was not completed until after a lapse of seven or eight years; whereas, had the work been regularly and systematically proceeded with, the ship might easily have been put afloat in three. That he regarded as a most unsatisfactory state of things, because not only did it involve a loss of interest on the outlay, but it also prevented the addition to their Fleet of a powerful vessel, which it was very desirable to have. As had been pointed out by his hon. Friend below him, there were at the present time from £6,000,000 to £6,500,000 locked up in vessels that remained in an unfinished condition in their Dockyards. A merchant shipowner did not proceed in that way. When he had determined on the construction of a new ship, he gave his attention not only to the form and dimensions of the vessel, but to every detail of its construction. When he had made his contract, he very rarely, if he were a wise and able man, deviated from the course agreed upon; and the result was that he obtained the vessel he wanted at the minimum expenditure of time and money. But in the Royal Navy the system was the very reverse of that. The sanction of Parliament was asked and obtained for a new ship, and after the construction of that vessel had been carried to a certain point alterations were suggested, and she was in some respects, almost entirely reconstructed. A new armament was probably recommended, and that required that the vessel should be specially adapted to the reception of that armament. The result was that, as a matter of course, the cost of construction very considerably exceeded the amount of the original Estimate for which the Vote of the House had been taken. There was also another serious matter, to which he would here refer, in connection with the mode in which the naval affairs of the country were managed. He referred to the great mismanagement that was evidenced with regard to the construction of the ordnance with which the ships were mounted. The evidence taken by the Committee showed that a great portion of the delay in the completion of their ships arose from the frequent fact that, when a vessel was constructed, the ordnance with which she was intended to be armed was not prepared. The Admiralty had been in the hands of the War Department for a long time. The Committee which had been referred to recommended that the Admiralty should be free to purchase their guns wherever they could be best and most easily obtained. It was, however, the practice that Woolwich, and to a small extent Elswick, should furnish the guns for the Navy; but he said, if they could be bought more readily and of a satisfactory kind from private firms, he was at a loss to see why they should not be so obtained. He was rejoiced to find that public attention was being directed to this most important question of the Navy. The Committee would be aware that by far the larger portion of the grain consumed in this country was imported from beyond the seas, and that, therefore, the very means of subsistence of their people depended on the Navy being strong and thoroughly able to protect their Mercantile Marine. He trusted that the foreign political difficulties they were now passing through, and which he hoped would soon disappear, would indelibly fix the mind of the House and the country upon the folly and absurdity of allowing the Navy to sink so much below the requirements of the country as it had done. He could not think it was creditable or proper that the country should resort so soon to the Mercantile Marine for assistance as was now the case. He could have understood that, after a severe struggle with a great Naval Power the Admiralty would have to apply to the Mercantile Marine for assistance; but at the outset of a contest the country ought to have a sufficiency of properly equipped men-of-war at its disposal. The ships of the Mercantile Marine were useful for national purposes, such as despatch vessels and transports; but they were egg-shells, so to speak, as compared with ships of the Navy, and it was a sign of weakness to have recourse to them now as fighting ships. It was impossible to imagine a more complete confession that the Admiralty were unable of their own resources to place a proper Fleet on the seas, in view of a possible war with a single Power, than the recourse they had already had to the Mercantile Marine for the purpose of strengthening the Navy.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that when the Navy Estimates were introduced, the sum asked for was criticized as not fulfilling the promises made by the Admiralty in December; but since then an entire change of policy had taken place, and they had seen, as the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) had just pointed out, the Admiralty going into the market to obtain by hire or purchase a number of merchant vessels to perform the duty of frigates which the country did not at present possess. He did not object to that; it was absolutely necessary that they should have them, and he had pointed out, more than 18 years ago in that House, that it would be necessary, under certain conditions, to arm a requisite number of ships of the Merchant Service. Further, a proposal was made at that time to the War Office that 500 guns and fittings should be prepared for the purpose of arming those vessels when it became necessary to acquire them; but those guns had not been prepared. The change of policy on the part of the Admiralty was even greater than this, inasmuch as he gathered from the ordinary sources of public information that the Admiralty had been endeavouring to purchase the iron-clads of other nations. The Esmeralda was now in the possession of Chili; when she left this country he believed that she might have been acquired at cost price; but now that she was wanted he had no doubt that the Chilean Government would not see its way to selling her. Therefore, it was with great difficulty that they could now acquire ships in different parts of the world, especially as their price was greatly enhanced. They would, no doubt, hear more about those vessels; but, in the meantime, they had the fact that the country was short of ships, and, in spite of statements to the contrary, he confessed that he doubted if there were as many ships available for the Public Service as it was supposed there were. He would now call attention to the number of ships which they at present possessed, and to their position in respect of seaworthiness and trustworthiness for the Public Service. He thought it was fortunate for the country that there should be a scare of the kind which had directed the attention of Parliament to the defenceless condition of the country. The hon. Gentleman the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Caine) had thought it right to state to the Committee the number of armour-clads which he conceived to be available for the Public Service, and he had compared them with the ships of the French Navy. He should take the opportunity of showing that the optimist views of the hon. Gentleman were not those he would hold if the figures he was about to give to the Committee could be proved to be correct. It was absurd to talk of ships as being efficient that could not carry a sufficient supply of coal, and could not steam 14 knots an hour. He would, therefore, give the speed of the ships of Great Britain. Great Britain had ready of first-class iron-clads, with a speed of 14 knots, the Inflexible, the Dreadnought, the Thunderer, the Devastation, and the Neptune, or five in number. The French had three—namely, the Amiral Duperré, Dévastation, and Redoubtable. England had ready nine second-class iron-clads—namely, the Téméraire, Nelson, Alexandra, Sultan, Iron Duke, Triumph, Invincible, Hercules, and Monarch. The French had also nine of the same class of ships—the Bayard, Turenne, Colbert, Trident, Richelieu, Friedland, Suffren, Maréngo, and Océan. England had 14 other ships that were not capable of going 14 knots, and France 12; but they were not worth considering in the event of war. But we were fitting at this moment seven—namely, the Conqueror, the Colossus, the Edinburgh, the Collingwood, the Impérieuse, the Warpite, and the Rodney; while France had eight—namely, the Tonnant, Terrible, Amiral Baudin, Foudroyant, Caiman, Indomptable, Duguesclin, and Vauban. Then we were building six—namely, the Howe, the Bombay, the Camperdown, the Anson, the Hero, and the New Hero; while the French were building 10—namely, the Formidable, Neptune, Hoche, Requin, Magenta, Marcseau, Charles Martel, Brennus, Guerrière, and Regnier. Those ships which were being built by France were capable of steaming 14 knots an hour, or were assumed to do so; so that, when those ships were completed, Great Britain would have 27 iron-clads capable of going 14 knots an hour, and France would have 30. Then, as to obsolete ships, England had 10 and France had 12, to which he had alluded; but if, as it was stated, Great Britain must have twice as many iron-clads as France the Admiralty would have to build 33. It might be said that it was absurd to ask for so many ships; but he did not think so. If they referred to The Three Panics published by Mr. Cobden, it would be found that between the years 1848-50 the French Navy had half as many war vessels as the English. In 1850 the French had 56 line-of-battle ships, and the English had 112. Everyone knew that iron-clads now represented the line-of-battle ships of those days; and if it was intended that they should have supremacy at sea it was necessary that 33 iron-clads should be added to the Navy. But that was still more necessary in these days than it was formerly, because then France and Spain were the only two other Powers which had Navies, and the Fleet of France and Spain together was not quite equal to the Navy of Great Britain. In former days also England took possession of the Navies of smaller countries to prevent them having ships in war time, as in the case of Denmark in 1801 and 1807, and the Russian Fleet held in our ports in 1808. At that time they were supreme at sea, but they were not so now, France having 30 iron-clads as against the 27 which Great Britain possessed. At that moment, from the East of the Cape of Good Hope to Cape Horn France had seven iron-clads; five in Chinese waters, one in Oceania, and one at Otaheite. Russia had four, one of which, the Vladimir Monomach, was a very formidable vessel; while Chili had four very powerful iron-clads. To protect Australia, India, and the West of Canada, they had only four iron-clads. If a combination took place between any of those countries, what would become of our enormous carrying trade in the Pacific, lying, as it would be, exposed to the ravages of a superior force? The hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott), on a former occasion, had alluded to the defenceless position of the harbours of the Colonies. He was told that if demands were made by this country the great Colonies would build 11 iron-clads, and that India would contribute two more without any strain at all upon the resources of this country, and that arrangements could easily be made by which the ships would be under a British Admiral. In that case, they would have a sufficient force to protect their Dependencies. The Navy of India had been put an end to entirely by this country, and they had promised in doing so to provide a sufficient Marine for India. He did not doubt that if the Indian Government were to arrange with the English Government they would soon place three or four iron-clads on the seas under the orders of a British Admiral for the protection of their coasts. But nothing had been done since the time he was referring to. He knew that New South Wales, New Zealand, and Canada were willing to assist in providing ships, and that the smaller Colonies were also willing to join with them. If that were so, was it not worth while to enter into an arrangement with them?—because that arrangement alone would reduce the number of additional iron-clads to be built by the Home Government from 33 to 20. If 20 of those vessels were added to the Navy, and 13 of them employed on the Indian and Colonial Stations, he had no doubt that they might then rest at ease, for there then would be a sufficient Navy for the protection of their shores. In the event of a war with Russia that would be of the greatest possible advantage in maintaining their great lines of communication. At that moment he believed that the four great Russian iron-clads in Vladivostock would be able to inflict an enormous amount of damage on our commerce and trade on the West Coast of America, Hong Kong, Singapore, Australia, and India, which it would take many years to repair. He would like to give the Committee an example of the way in which efficient preparation obviated war. In 1789, when a question arose with regard to the possession of Vancouver's Island, they had 26 sail of the line commissioned in the Channel, and in a few

both of the boys and of the Marines, and I am very much afraid that we shall want both the boys and the Marines who have been so reduced. I am glad to see that the number of boys is to be increased; but the result will hardly compensate for the reduction already effected, because those 800 boys to whom I have just referred would now have been valuable constituents of our naval strength had they been retained for the service of the country. There is one question I should like to ask my hon. Members who had taken part in the debate, and especial reference had been made to the constant delay which took place in the construction of the ships laid down for the service of the country. Under the present system they commenced the construction of a large vessel, and after a certain amount of work had been done upon it there was a stoppage. After a long interval the work of construction was recommenced, only to be again broken off, and in that way a vessel that ought to have been constructed in three years was not completed until after a lapse of seven or eight years; whereas, had the work been regularly and systematically proceeded with, the ship might easily have been put afloat in three. That he regarded as a most unsatisfactory state of things, because not only did it involve a loss of interest on the outlay, but it also prevented the addition to their Fleet of a powerful vessel, which it was very desirable to have. As had been pointed out by his hon. Friend below him, there were at the present time from £6,000,000 to £6,500,000 locked up in vessels that remained in an unfinished condition in their Dockyards. A merchant shipowner did not proceed in that way. When he had determined on the construction of a new ship, he gave his attention not only to the form and dimensions of the vessel, but to every detail of its construction. When he had made his contract, he very rarely, if he were a wise and able man, deviated from the course agreed upon; and the result was that he obtained the vessel he wanted at the minimum expenditure of time and money. But in the Royal Navy the system was the very reverse of that. The sanction of Parliament was asked and obtained for a new ship, and after the construction of that vessel had been carried to a certain point alterations were suggested, and she was in some respects, almost entirely reconstructed. A new armament was probably recommended, and that required that the vessel should be specially adapted to the reception of that armament. The result was that, as a matter of course, the cost of construction very considerably exceeded the amount of the original Estimate for which the Vote of the House had been taken. There was also another serious matter, to which he would here refer, in connection with the mode in which the naval affairs of the country were managed. He referred to the great mismanagement that was evidenced with regard to the construction of the ordnance with which the ships were mounted. The evidence taken by the Committee showed that a great portion of the delay in the completion of their ships arose from the frequent fact that, when a vessel was constructed, the ordnance with which she was intended to be armed was not prepared. The Admiralty had been in the hands of the War Department for a long time. The Committee which had been referred to recommended that the Admiralty should be free to purchase their guns wherever they could be best and most easily obtained. It was, however, the practice that Woolwich, and to a small extent Elswick, should furnish the guns for the Navy; but he said, if they could be bought more readily and of a satisfactory kind from private firms, he was at a loss to see why they should not be so obtained. He was rejoiced to find that public attention was being directed to this most important question of the Navy. The Committee would be aware that by far the larger portion of the grain consumed in this country was imported from beyond the seas, and that, therefore, the very means of subsistence of their people depended on the Navy being strong and thoroughly able to protect their Mercantile Marine. He trusted that the foreign political difficulties they were now passing through, and which he hoped would soon disappear, would indelibly fix the mind of the House and the country upon the folly and absurdity of allowing the Navy to sink so much below the requirements of the country as it had done. He could not think it was creditable or proper that the country should resort so soon to the Mercantile Marine for assistance as was now the case. He could have understood that, after a severe struggle with a great Naval Power the Admiralty would have to apply to the Mercantile Marine for assistance; but at the outset of a contest the country to that Return, he found from 1706 to 1806—that was to say, speaking roughly, from the time of the battle of Cape La Hogue to the time of the battle of Trafalgar, the practice had been to put a naval officer at the head of the Admiralty. He found that for 59 years there was a naval officer at the head of that Department, and for 19 years more the Admiral who had been First Lord had, when war broke out, to take command of the Fleet, and show if his own arrangements were satisfactory. For a portion of that time he was taken from the head of the Admiralty, and charged with the command of the Channel Fleet, and many of those officers had held the post of First Lord of the Admiralty for a long time. There had been Lord Orford, Lord Torrington, Sir John Leake, Lord Dursley, Sir Charles Wager, Lord Anson, Sir Charles Saunders, Lord Hawke, Lord Keppel, Lord Howe, and then had come Lord St. Vincent, to whom the right hon. Gentleman had alluded, and Lord St. Vincent was not the last—Lord Barham was the last. In 1803, when Pitt became Prime Minister, and war broke out with France, it was discovered that Lord St. Vincent, who had been First Lord of the Admiralty, had got bitten with economy, and that the Navy had dwindled into decay; and when Lord Barham became the head of the Department he ordered 40 ships to be built at once, and they were subsequently known as the 40 thieves. He (Sir John Hay) had sailed in them; they were not very good vessels; but they served their purpose. If the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Thomas Brassey) would turn to Lord Nelson's despatches, he would find that the greatest of Admirals said it was fortunate that a naval officer was at the head of affairs, for he had given him all he wanted to fight with. Lord Nelson had received the means to fight, and he had fought the battle of Trafalgar. Lord Barham retired in 1806, and they had not, since his time, had a Naval Lord at the head of the Admiralty, except William IV., when he was Duke of Clarence, for a few years, and the Duke of Northumberland for one year. But he did not recommend the system of making a naval officer First Lord of the Admiralty, and then, when war broke out, invariably sending him to sea; but he was certainly of opinion that it was advisable to have a Naval First Lord at the head of the Department, and that the process was one by which an efficient Navy could be secured. If they had such an arrangement, the First Lord could either come to the House himself, or, through the Secretary, inform Parliament of what he wanted, and if he did not get what he asked for, he would, of course, resign; an inquiry would then take place, and it would be found whether what he asked for should be granted or not. Since 1806 they had had four ex-Governors General of India and several Secretaries to the Treasury at the head of the Admiralty; but they had never had a naval officer, and the result had been that the Navy had dwindled down and fallen into decay, until at that moment he had been able to point out, without fear of contradiction, that they had neither ships, guns, nor men in sufficient numbers to defend their shores, or to keep the country in the state of defence some believed it to be in.

SIR DONALD CURRIE said, his right hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) had referred to him, and, therefore, he might perhaps be permitted to say a word or two on this subject; but it would only be a word or two. If he were to say all he could say, it would be to the effect that his experience of the last few weeks, during his absence from this country, had only served to emphasize and justify every word of warning he had formerly addressed to the House and to the country on the state of Her Majesty's Navy. They had, during the recent difference with the French at Madagascar, only one ship at Tamatave, and that one vessel had carried nine guns, eight of which she dared not fire shot. An attempt had been made to deny that statement, but it had been found that it could not be denied; and he had learned that there were other ships which carried similar guns. But in the present circumstances of the country he would rather not go into particulars, either upon the subject of guns, or with regard to coaling stations, and the necessity of fortifying them. The country had been living in a fool's paradise as to the Navy under the late and the present Governments. We could not have gone to war with France with much hope of a successful issue, as we had not the ships in Eastern waters fit to compete with her on the sudden outbreak of war. Nor would he ask, with regard to Russia, were they in a position to properly maintain their interests?—for when he was in the Red Sea he was told that there had passed through a Russian armoured vessel of great speed, carrying very powerful guns, and with a large supply of torpedoes, whose captain had been bold enough to say that he was not afraid of any vessel he could meet with on his way for thousands of miles. The French had improvised as naval cruisers one or two merchant vessels to cruise in China waters to help the carrying out of the policy of that country in regard to contraband of war. Had we the guns; the men; the ships; had we the torpedoes necessary for a great war? It was a disgrace to the country that we should be in such a position. An official of the Government had said to him the other day that if they were at war with a strong Naval Power, shipowners might have to put their shipping under a neutral flag. Was such a state of things creditable? The Government were taking up merchant ships to arm them as cruisers in the first line of defence, which clearly proved the Navy was short of cruisers; but they had not the guns to put into them. They had only 64 - pounders in those cruisers; and what would they be against a powerfully armed cruiser? A merchant ship so equipped could do nothing against an armoured vessel but run away. He urged what he had said at first—that they had to look most anxiously into the present position of matters. It was not to be dealt with by mere declamation, or statements in regard to actual or apparent tonnage, or anything of that sort; it was both the apparent and the real danger which they had to consider.

SIR MASSEY LOPES congratulated the Committee upon the fact that public attention and public interest were at last awakened as to the state of their national defences. A great deal of alarm and apprehension had been prevalent in the public mind for a considerable time; and he thought he could say, without fear of contradiction, that there was now a unanimous opinion that the naval defences of the country were not in the position in which they ought to be. He did not think the comforting assurances which from time to time had been given by the Board of Admiralty had in any degree tended to allay that apprehension. He had had the honour for some years to be connected with the Board of Admiralty, and in conjunction with his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. H. Smith) it had been his duty to consider the Navy Estimates; and he did not hesitate to say this—that the money that had been voted for the Naval Services had never been sufficient, and had never been adequate to maintain the naval supremacy of this country, or to enable the Navy to perform the manifold duties that devolved upon it. It had been his duty to revise the Estimates, and he could assure the Committee that the task which had devolved upon himself and his Colleagues had been most hard, and difficult, and unsatisfactory. As the Committee very well knew, the Board of Admiralty was controlled by the Treasury; but if anything unfortunate happened to their Navy it would not be the Treasury that would be responsible, but it would be the Board of Admiralty. Now, he thought the subject of the Navy ought at all times to be beyond Party considerations; and it was not his intention to make any charge against the present Board of Admiralty. He admitted, for the sake of argument, that the Board of Admiralty had expended the money voted to the best purpose; but he contended that sufficient money had never been voted to maintain the supremacy of the country—that was to say, in the construction of ships, and, at the same time, for the repairing of ships, and the consequence was that one Board had attended to the construction of ships and neglected repairs, whilst another Board of Admiralty had attended to repairs and neglected the construction of ships, and so alternately. That seemed to him to be a most unsatisfactory state of things. Notwithstanding the costly improvements which had taken place in their guns and ships during the last few years, the money voted during that period had been very much less than the sum voted 25 years ago; and, that being so, the Effective Votes had decreased, whilst the Non-Effective Votes had considerably increased, and the difference between the Effective and Non-Effective Votes in 1860 and the present time was more than the cost of two first-class iron-clads—something like £1,200,000. He would fidence in the administrative capacity of the Board of Admiralty, constituted as it was at present. When he said that, he trusted that his hon. Friends who were responsible to the House for the work of the Admiralty, and hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite who had formerly represented the Admiralty, would believe that he did not mean, in the slightest degree, to underrate their merit, or the work which they individually performed. Unfortunately, the position of his hon. Friends in the House of Commons, of the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey), and the Civil Lord (Mr. Caine), was this—that they were simply the Parliamentary exponents of the ideas of the permanent officials of the Admiralty, and their position at the Admiralty was that of exponents of the ideas of Parliament to the permanent officials. That alone was the function they were able to perform; indeed, it was the only function which their previous experience and knowledge would admit of their performing. Now, he ventured to think that if the impressions the public were forming on this question were just—if they were founded in verity and in truth—the public would not long be content with the present system. What the public would want to know was, where and who were the brains of the Admiralty; and that was a point, he thought, on which the public would have to search for some considerable time before they made any very striking discovery. He need scarcely say that he did not allude to those gallant officers on the Board of Admiralty, who served a certain number of years, first afloat and then ashore. He heard his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) make some disparaging reference to the appointment of gallant and distinguished naval officers to the Dockyards and to the Board of Admiralty; but, for his own part, knowing what he did about questions connected with naval affairs, he considered that the fact that the Admiralty obtained, from time to time, the benefit of the experience of eminent officers must be of vast advantage to the Public Service, always, however, assuming that the gentlemen were chosen not only because they had served a certain number of years with the flag, but because they also possessed high administrative qualities. He believed, and his right hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Sir John Hay) would bear him out in his belief, that a gallant officer like Lord Nelson might very likely have made the very worst First Lord of the Admiralty there could be conceived. He maintained, therefore, that on the Board of Admiralty there must be high administrative capacity. There were two great and important Offices in the Board of Admiralty which required to be filled by men of the greatest ability and experience. The first Office was that which had control of the construction of their ships, and, of the two, perhaps that was of the highest importance. The other Office was that which had to do with financial control, an Office which, if it had to be made successful, must be filled by a thorough man of business. A proof of the success of a concern owning commercial vessels was the fact that its vessels were able to pay; in the case of an Admiralty owning not commercial, but war vessels, a proof of success was the maintenance of a thoroughly efficient Fleet at the smallest and fairest possible cost. They had heard that night, and on many previous occasions, sufficient to show that, in matters connected with the cost of the Fleet, the system which was pursued at the present moment by the Admiralty was a most deplorable one. Decidedly and emphatically he maintained that at the Admiralty there was no financial control whatever. Reference had been made to the Report made by the Accountant General of the Navy. He (Mr. Sutherland) had read that Report with care, and had come to the conclusion that the Accountant General merely fulfilled a clerical duty, and nothing beyond that; he did not inspire the business control, but simply recorded facts. Now, in a business like that of the Admiralty they required more than that. Having regard to his own experience, and to the experience of more than one hon. Gentleman beside him connected with merchant shipping, he did not hesitate to say that the Admiralty required to have men, not as clerks, not as Accountant Generals, not as Secretaries, but as officers holding rank as Lords of the Admiralty, though not with seats in Parliament—men who should have between them the control and the burden of the construction and financial management of this great public concern. Nothing else but that would effect the improvement which he thought the Committee, or, at least, those Members who had spoken during this debate, generally demanded. He remembered very well some slight experience that he had had of Admiralty management in connection with the business with which he was more or less intimately concerned. It was at one time the custom for vessels engaged in the conveyance of Her Majesty's Mails to be placed, as far as their construction and outfit went, under the control of the Admiralty; and the specifications and the elaboration of details had all to be submitted and approved, and not only approved, but from time to time changed and transformed, in order to satisfy the change of mood of the officials in the Admiralty Department. He spoke of a time now 20 years ago; but from what he heard that day he feared that the spirit which governed the inner working of the present system to which he alluded was not very much more business-like, or more advanced, than it was formerly. Well, what was to be the result of this discussion? He should have liked very much the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith), or some of his hon. Friends above or below the Gangway on the Ministerial side of the House, to have made some practical suggestion as to what steps the Committee should take with regard to this matter. Probably his hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) intended, upon the occasion when he would be permitted to propose the Motion of which he had given Notice, to show the whole case in its proper light. He (Mr. Sutherland) asserted that when the time came that they were able to grapple with this matter properly, some mode of improvement should be pointed out. He trusted the discussion they had had that night would not be forgotten, and that, as a result of it, Her Majesty's Government would agree—he hoped they would agree willingly; but, if they did not, that they would be forced to agree—to the appointment either of a Royal Commission or Committee of the House to inquire into the working of the Admiralty in order to effect such improvements as might be necessary. He was sure that both political Parties would unite in doing whatever was necessary, in this or in any other way, in order to sustain the glory of the British Navy.

MR. PULESTON ventured to say that the oldest Member of the House had never heard so remarkable a debate as they had had that night; without a single exception, everyone connected with the administration of the Admiralty had adopted the same tone and the same spirit. Not the least remarkable of all the circumstances connected with the debate had been the conversion of his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands). They knew that last year the hon. Gentleman had nothing to say in the way of criticism of the remarks a noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) made in "another place" upon naval affairs, remarks which were very severely commented upon at the time. He (Mr. Puleston) was happy to find that the hon. Member for Burnley, and other hon. Members, who last Session were not prepared to say they ought to spend any more money on the Navy, were now disposed to agree to further expenditure for the purpose of increasing their naval strength. Last year the hon. Member (Mr. Rylands), like others of the school of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth), thought that they ought to spend less than they did on the Navy. It was quite true, however, that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Rylands) had veiled his remarks that night by saying that he would not grudge the expenditure of millions, provided that the money was spent in the right way; and he went so far as to fully agree with the late Mr. Cobden, who said that they should spend, if necessary, £100,000,000 on the Navy. He (Mr. Puleston) did not think that hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House, even those, like himself, who had been accused, because they represented Dockyard constituencies, of holding rather extravagant views on the question of the Navy—he did not think that any of them, even in their wildest dreams, had ever gone so far as to predict the necessity for so lavish an expenditure as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had said might be necessary. He regretted, however, that the hon. Gentleman still held the opinion that Her Majesty's Dockyards should be practically abolished. The hon. Gentleman told the Committee that there were £7,000,000 of capital now standing in useless ships; but how many millions would there be useless in the ship and Dockyard property and plant supposing the Dockyards were to be abolished? Then the hon. Gentleman illustrated, from his standpoint, the expensive character of the Dockyards by saying that there was a loss upon Dockyard work of some 20 per cent owing to changes of plant; but that was not the fault of the Dockyards. He (Mr. Puleston) must insist here that night, as he had insisted on previous occasions, that anyone giving a ship of war, or any other ship, to be built by contract, would give out the specifications, and stipulate that the work must be completed within a certain time. So would the authorities of the Dockyards, if they were allowed to do so. The hon. Member for Burnley had answered his own argument to a very great extent. The fault did not lay in the administration of the Dockyards proper, but in the administration in Whitehall. Every string was pulled from Whitehall; and, therefore, if a large ship was commenced, which ought to be built in two or three years, and the plans were changed several times, and the ship occupied twice the number of years to build, and cost twice the amount of money, the fault was clearly not that of the Dockyard authorities, but of those who controlled the construction. He could not but strongly impress upon the Committee once more the utter fallacy of arguing from the standpoint of the abolition of all the Royal Dockyards. His hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands) had referred to Mr. Scott Russell as a great shipbuilder. During the war with Russia in the Crimea two important ships, the Gibraltar and the Rover, were given to Mr. Scott Russell to build; but before they were finished advantage was taken of the emergency by the men to strike, and the builder had to appeal to the Admiralty for assistance, and assistance was sent to him from Deptford and elsewhere. Mr. Scott Russell completed his contract, and the ships were taken to Woolwich and Chatham to be fitted out. A similar contingency might occur again; what had once happened might happen again. Such a state of things as occurred in the yard of Mr. Scott Russell would not occur in Her Majesty's Dockyards. All the men who were employed in the Royal Dockyards felt their position was perfectly secure; and if they worked to-day for lower wages, it was because they felt they received compensation in the shape of the pensions which would come to them after a certain length of service. That argument in itself ought to be conclusive in favour of maintaining the Dockyards, not merely for the repair of ships, but at their utmost capacity. He was sure that if his hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands), and those who thought with him, had a large capital invested, such as the Government had, in the Royal Dockyards, it would not be long before they would have to look in the face the contingency of the Bankruptcy Court if they allowed their capital to stand idle. He thought it a fortunate thing for the country that this change of feeling had come over the House of Commons; and he trusted they would hear more in favour of increasing the utility of the Dockyards rather than the disestablishment of them. As the Committee was aware, his hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands) referred to another matter which had often been referred to during the last few years; and he (Mr. Puleston) was glad it was now coming, for the first time, from the Ministerial side of the House. This was not a Party question; and he was glad that, at all events, that night there had been no question of Party involved in discussion, because, as he had said before, there had been only one universal chorus in the one direction. A very remarkable speech had been delivered by the hon. Member for Perthshire (Sir Donald Currie), who had given them the benefit of his experience during three or four months of recent travelling. The hon. Gentleman had said that what he knew and could tell the Committee was actually too painful for him to repeat. He had, however, told them how eight or nine guns of one ship dared not be fired, and he was afraid the same thing might be said of the guns of other vessels. Hon. Gentlemen like the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) knew what they were talking about when they spoke of converting merchant vessels into cruisers, and the impracticability of converting such vessels into a portion of their first line of defence. So far as the defences of the country were concerned, so far as the efficiency of the Navy was concerned, he (Mr. Puleston) thought something would be done by the force of public opinion which had been so thoroughly represented on both sides of the Committee that night. In his opinion, it would be an utterly hopeless task for a Committee of Inquiry or a Royal Commission to reconsider the constitution of the Admiralty. He believed it was out of the question—he said it with great regret—to expect any reform whatever in the Board of Admiralty. His hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands's) contention was that the First Lord of the Admiralty should have a seat in the House of Commons. Now, that matter had been a bone of contention for some time. He thought they would all agree that it was a most unfortunate thing that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey) was not himself the First Lord, because it was impossible he could exercise in the House that influence in his present position which he would exercise if he occupied the higher rank. He (Mr. Puleston) was bound to speak of the First Lord with very great respect. Some hon. Gentlemen had said that when the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) was in Egypt his absence was not noticed. He (Mr. Puleston) echoed that sentiment, because he had occasion sometimes to go to the Admiralty, and he found that the absence of the noble Earl made no difference whatever. That was a very serious thing to say, and he was sorry there was no Cabinet Minister on the Treasury Bench at the present moment. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) entered the House at this point.] He thought that if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been present during the whole of the discussion he must have come to the conclusion that he had never listened to a debate that was so unanimously depreciatory of the administration of the Admiralty. He (Mr. Puleston) confessed he never heard such a debate before, and he was confident his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had not. Just as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer entered the House he was saying a word or two about the First Lord. They knew what the First Lord said in "another place" last Session—namely, that even if he had at his disposal millions which he did not want, he would not know what to do with them. Now, he (Mr. Puleston) asked the Committee if they could contemplate a more deplorable admission from a person holding such a responsible position as First Lord of the Admiralty? His hon. Friend had spoken of 26,000 tons being the tonnage for two years for all other nations, against 25,000 of their own, those figures referring to war ships. He did not remember which two years his hon. Friend mentioned; but at that time the Estimates for the French Navy were only half as much as their own, and the French Navy was only half as large as theirs. But the French Navy had progressed at a much greater ratio of late, while ours had been practically standing still. The Civil Lord of the Admiralty had taken pains to tell the Committee that the Admiralty always intended to construct 28,000 tons. He (Mr. Puleston) did not know how far that word "always" extended; but they certainly did not do it until very recently—not till after the Autumn Session, which entirely and absolutely reversed the statements made by the noble Earl at the head of the Admiralty only a few months previously. The Representatives of the noble Earl in this House were obliged to actually reverse his statements on the Navy. They did not hear then of 26,000 tons; and what he (Mr. Puleston) wanted to know was, if that was the tonnage that was to be built before the discussion of last Autumn, what addition was it proposed to make now under the new order of things? He wanted to know whether the "always" referred to the time preceding the discussion here last Autumn, when it was supposed that the House succeeded in impressing on the Admiralty the necessity for a very large enlargement of the Navy, for which very little had been done before? It seemed that they were now going to buy wildly everything they could, whether it was efficient or otherwise, so long as it had the appearance of being a ship. However, he was glad to say they were to have other opportunities of discussing this matter, and he hoped the first of those opportunities would come soon; for although there had been a very remarkable debate that night, which would be read throughout the length and breadth of the country, and which would be read in other countries besides their own, there were still many points which required discussion. He hoped that what had already been said would have no ill-effect upon the country at large. But at all hazard the truth should be told, and the sooner the weakness of the Navy was understood the sooner would the ill-effect of disclosures such as they had had to-day be overcome.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he would not detain the Committee very long; but he wished, in the first place, to support his hon. Friend (Mr. Puleston) in the complaint he had made as to the manner in which the Navy Estimates were treated by the Government. He had more than once protested against the Head of this Department being in the other House of Parliament. It was against the principles laid down by the Prime Minister during his last Administration; but it was of apiece, in every respect, with the singular manner in which the Navy Estimates were treated by the entire Cabinet. In the discussion that night, for instance, they had had angels' visits from one or two Members of the Cabinet occasionally; but for by far the greater part of the time the Secretary to the Admiralty had been left there without the assistance of a single responsible Minister of the Crown. Was it true that an order had been issued for the purchase of a large number of steam tugs; and was it the fact that they were to be bought because the Government were convinced that it would be impossible, owing to defective machinery, for iron-clads to go in and out of action without their assistance? If that were the case, it showed the existence of the most serious defects in the Administrative Departments of the country. Without detaining the Committee any longer, he should like to have a categorical answer to that question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he thought it was worth while to make one observation, though he would not go into the large questions which had been raised. They were now discussing the Vote for Victuals and Clothing; and on that Vote they had discussed the comparative size of the English and French Navies, the condition of their guns, the defence of their coaling stations, the defence of their commerce, the capacity of the First Lord of the Admiralty, the rights and wrongs of having him in the House of Lords; and all this had been debated in reference to the question of victuals and clothing. It was worth while to know how that arose; it evidently arose from the absurdity of the new Rules. Had it been possible to put a Resolution on the Motion for the Speaker leaving the Chair, they might have had all those questions discussed, and then they could have been followed by a Vote in Committee of Supply. As it was, there would have to be another debate of equal length, to be followed by another Vote, when all those questions could be raised again on the Motion of the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed). He did not himself regret those repeated and prolonged debates. Everything which brought the question before the country, and forced the attention of the country to the defective state of the Navy, was good; but the fact that they had debated in that desultory fashion all those important questions for a whole night, and that they would have to debate them again in a few weeks' time, did show a great want of management on the part of Her Majesty's Government. It had been a fact worth observing that all the speaking that night had gone one way—that the Government had found no defenders but those who sat on their own Bench. His hon. Friend (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had been very much struck with the novelty of this; but it seemed to be the rule now in almost all important controversies. On almost all the important debates they had had on questions of public affairs, every speaker on both sides of the House attacked the Government, and the Government were only defended by Members of their own body, and seldom, or never, found anybody else to say a good word for them. They had even lost the single defender they had in the General Gordon debate—the hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. Sutherland)—who had just uttered a tremendous philippic on the state of the Navy. That hon. Gentleman was the only Member who rose in the four nights' debate on General Gordon to defend the Government. His hon. Friend, therefore, might have spared his wonder at the course the debate had taken that night.

MR. D. DAVIES said, he thought this was a very serious matter indeed. The country did not know very much about it. In the old time their Navy was built of old English or Welsh oak; and if a bullet went through it, the hole could be easily caulked up again ; while the timber of foreign nations tore up and went into splinters. But now all nations were similarly provided. There was a sort of sameness in the iron-clad everywhere. Everyone could build an iron-clad equally well. The foreign iron-clads were just as good as their iron-clads. There was this difference, also. In the old time, if they were turned out of the sea altogether, they could live at home ; but now they were dependent on foreigners for their very bread. If that supply were stopped they would be done for—they would starve. He hoped the Government would take that fact to heart. They were then free and happy, and their Fleet was able to meet with all others. But now the case seemed to be very different. He would not mind a bit of a brush with one of those foreign nations, just to gain a little experience ; they did not really know what they could do. [Laughter.] That was no laughing matter at all. They might, at any moment, have a brush between their iron-clads and those of a foreign nation. It would be a very serious matter if four or five of their iron-clads were sunk. Where would be the rest of their Navy then ? At present they were almost without a ship. They were buying some rotten ships, and things that would be of no use at all ; and he hoped the Government would take all that to heart. He did not know whether they had proper ships, or whether their ships were what they ought to be—he left that to the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) and other Gentlemen who understood the question. But he wished to draw the attention of the Government to a matter about which the country was very anxious. He did not often intrude himself into debate ; but he thought they ought to have some explanation.

MR. HARRIS said, he approached the question from the view of their food supplies. This country, he said, was in a position which no other country in the world had ever been placed in in regard to her supplies. They were not producing much more than one-third part of their consumption of wheat. The statistics being a consumption of 26,000,000 quarters ; whereas, of the home growth, there was only available for food the small quantity of 9,000,000 quarters.

THE CHAIRMAN here interposed, and said, that the statistics of their food supply were beyond the scope of the debate.

MR. DEASY pointed out that new gunboats could be built in Cork ; and he wanted to know whether the Cork shipbuilders would have any opportunity of tendering ? Was it the intention of the Government to supply plans and specifications for the new boats required ?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, he thought, at that late hour of the night, hon. Members would scarcely desire that he should attempt a full answer to the numerous charges which had been brought against the Admiralty. He would, however, endeavour to take up some of the more important points, and to offer such explanations as he could in reference to the matters which had been brought under discussion. And, first, he would like to refer to the observations made by his hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed) with reference to the employment of mercantile auxiliaries for the defence of commerce. His hon. Friend had raised a question as to the fighting power of ships of that character. The Admiralty did not rely upon mercantile auxiliaries to cope with battle-ships, or regularly built ships of war ; but they contended—and they confidently contended—that for the defence of commerce those mercantile auxiliaries were well able to contend with similar vessels which might be employed by a hostile Power for the purpose of attacking and interrupting their commerce. They contended that a wise policy had been pursued, not only by the present Board of Admiralty, but by those who had preceded them, in encouraging the construction of vessels in the Mercantile Marine of a character suitable for conversion into cruisers. They considered that the existence of such vessels in such numbers in their Mercantile Marine formed one of the great resources of this country ; and he could assure hon. Members that those ships were regarded with feelings of envy by the Administrators of Foreign Powers. Those who had studied the Annual Reports of the Secretary of the United States Navy would have observed the repeated allusions and expressions of admiration with reference to the splendid fleet of mercantile cruisers which had been called into existence in connection with the British Navy. He would also remind hon. Members that large sums were paid by Foreign Governments in the form of subsidies to encourage the construction and navigation of ships of a class such as it was our happy fortune to be able to procure in such numbers, and of such efficient types, without any expenditure in the form of subsidies. His hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed), and his right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), had criticized the mode of measuring the tonnage which was annually built in the Dockyards. His hon. Friend admitted that the system which he criticized was the one which was in force when he (Sir Edward J. Reed) so ably took part in the administration of the Navy. He (Sir Thomas Brassey) concurred with his hon. and right hon. Friends as to the unsatisfactory character of that method of measurement; and he would endeavour to ascertain whether it might not be possible that the tonnage built in the Dockyards should be determined rather by an actual measurement of the work done than by a statement of the money which was annually spent. His hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff called the attention of the Committee to inaccuracies which he alleged to be found in the statement of cost for certain ships. All that he had to say on that point was this—that since he had heard the criticisms of his hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff he had compared the figures which that hon. Gentleman criticized with those which were inserted in the Returns which were in use at the Admiralty, and he found that they corresponded exactly. Those figures, of course, had been adopted upon the authority of the Accountant General of the Navy; and he could confidently say that there was no intention whatever to make a mis-statement in the House of Commons. His hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff spoke critically as to the cost of ships, and he instanced the case of the Conqueror. Well, he (Sir Thomas Brassey) believed that the cost of the Conqueror—even the enhanced cost as determined upon a more recent computation by the Accountant General—compared almost exactly with that of the last iron-clad which was put out to contract—he referred to the Bombow—and he might say that in former years, when from an independent standpoint he gave a good deal of attention to Admiralty matters he arrived at the conclusion—he was bound to confess that it was not authoritative—but he arrived at the conclusion that, in a general sense, the cost of Dockyard building might be taken as about 10 per cent more than the cost of building by contract. He had never heard any hon. Member question that conclusion. There could be no doubt as to the excellence of the workmanship which was carried out in the Dockyards. It might be asked why should there be this difference of cost—this great difference of cost—in the case of the Dockyard work? Well, he could give one reason among many others, and that was that it was not possible in Dockyard work to introduce the system of piece-work to the same extent to which it was applied in the private shipbuilding establishments. The reason was obvious. They must maintain their great Dockyards on the system best adapted for the purpose of meeting all the demands which might occur in connection with a great Navy. There were not only the emergencies which would arise in time of war, but the emergencies which constantly arose in time of peace; and in order to deal with those sudden demands it was necessary at times to take off every man from the building, and put them on to the repairing of ships. That being so, how was it possible in the case of any particular ship to carry out the system of construction by piece-work to the same extent as in establishments where they were less liable to those kinds of interruption? Then there were other reasons, which must, he thought, be accepted upon any fair view of the case, why the general charges for the administration of the Dockyards should be larger than in the case of private establishments. It was not possible fairly to compare a Dockyard with an ordinary shipbuilding yard. First of all, a Dockyard required, and essentially required, a somewhat expensive superintendence for naval purposes. They must have naval officers present in those Dockyards, both to superintend on behalf of the Admiralty, and to act as arbitrators between the Service afloat and the professional officers of the yard. They wanted advice at every stage, and that was an expensive feature which would not be present in a mercantile establishment. Then those Dockyards must be laid out in such a manner as to give them a great power of expansion in time of war. The necessary result was that they had widely extended establishments, large works, and great distances between the workshops, and this involved the cost of transport, and the value of the time spent by the men in going to and fro. Then they ought to have, and must have, an abundance of stores to meet an emergency, and large store-houses, and a large store-house staff, such as was not necessary in dealing with ordinary mercantile demands. He ought not to omit to mention that in dealing with a public business they must have considerable minuteness of calculation and record, for the purpose of giving the information to Parliament which was so frequently called for. Hence arose the necessity for a more extensive accountant's staff than would be maintained in a private shipbuilding establishment. Those were sufficient reasons why the general charges in the Dockyards should be in excess of those which were borne under private administration. Everybody knew that the item for general charges must be larger in a Dockyard than in a private establishment. He would endeavour now to deal with the question of delay in the completion of ships. The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) had referred to that subject, and had mentioned, what he (Sir Thomas Brassey) was glad to acknowledge, the indebtedness of the Admiralty to the Committee, of which he was a Member, for their most useful inquiry and very valuable suggestions. The hon. Member for Hull had urged that more care should be used in the preparation of designs before beginning the building of ships. The Admiralty had endeavoured, as he (Sir Thomas Brassey) had lately explained, to follow that advice; and that was the cause of the delay, which at the time was much criticized, in putting out some of the new work to contract. But, as he had said before, he believed the delay was a wise delay, and it was desirable that the utmost care should be used in preparing the designs before they commenced construction. With reference to those delays, it was known to all those who had had experience in the administration of Admiralty affairs that in the initial stages the ships in the Dockyards were built quickly. It was in the later stages that they suffered from those delays, and the cause of those delays was not far to seek. It was connected with constant changes in armament, including the torpedo armament. No doubt, it would always be desired to improve and perfect the armament of the Navy, and where there was no pressing need for a ship there was a tendency to give way in point of time, in order to secure even greater efficiency. He would repeat, what he had already stated on a former occasion, that they entertained sanguine hopes that the gun and torpedo questions were gradually settling themselves. They did not look forward in the near future to the same radical changes with which they had had to deal recently. They were now completing their ships more rapidly than formerly, and were certainly doing better than any of their rivals abroad. In order to show to the Committee that he did not make that statement without some foundation, he would read a list of the ships which it was proposed to complete within the present financial year. They would complete the Collingwood, the Leander, the Arethusa, and the Phaeton—ships which were laid down in 1880-1. They hoped also to complete the Impérieuse, the Warspite, the Amphion, the Calypso, and the Calliope, which were laid down in 1881-2. They would complete the Mersey, a very highly protected and fast cruiser of 3,520 tons, laid down in 1883; and if that was fulfilled, as they confidently hoped would be the case, it would be a performance which he thought his right hon. Friend would agree the Dockyards would be fairly entitled to take credit for. They would complete the torpedo and cruiser vessels Scout, Surprise, and Alacrity; and of vessels laid down so late as 1884 and 1885, they would complete the Swallow and the Curlaw. Those were torpedo vessels of a very valuable type. The total number of vessels to be completed in the present financial year was no less than 14, including four iron-clads, five protected or partially protected vessels, two despatch vessels, one torpedo cruiser, and three gun-vessels. They had been criticized with reference to their delays, because the ships built for the Navy were preserved meats, and what steps had been taken to ascertain the quality of the meats?

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to remind the Secretary to the Admiralty that his Colleague in the representation of Cork had asked whether any inquiry had been addressed to the Irish Ship-building Companies who were capable of constructing such vessels as gun-boats. The hon. Gentleman would recollect that they had had several conversations on the subject. He did not intend to go into the question on the present occasion, but would merely remark that his hon. Friend's question had probably been missed, and that the hon. Gentleman would doubtless be able to give a satisfactory assurance on the subject.

MR. PULESTON said, he would take that opportunity of asking the hon. Gentleman whether anything had been done with reference to the engineers counting their extra time for pensions? The Report of the Committee had been under consideration since November last. He would also ask whether in the Report any consideration was given to the application of the engine-room artificers, who sought to have the rank of Warrant Officers given to them?

MR. HARRIS said, that he regretted that in his previous remarks he had, in the opinion of the Chairman, overstepped the bounds of the debate; but his only object was to show how very necessary it was for Her Majesty's Government to protect their food supplies by keeping the Navy in a thorough state of efficiency, and how lamentable the results would be if, through any inadequacy in their line of marine defence, any interruption should take place in their supplies. He therefore deprecated all parsimony in this branch of the Service.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) was quite correct in the view he had taken with regard to the placing of foreseen expenditure on the regular Estimates; but the expenditure in the case of the 1,000 Seamen and Marines in Egypt could not be estimated for when the Estimates was prepared.

Sir John Hay

MR. W. H. SMITH remarked that it violated the principle on which the Estimates had always been framed—that a certain number of men which it was foreseen would be required should not be provided for in the regular Estimates.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, with reference to the question of his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay), he could assure him that, in the case of the Navy, the most scrupulous care was used to see that the supplies were of the best quality.

SIR JOHN HAY asked, if the agents of the Government were to be present to inspect the meat before it was packed in cases, or if the inspection consisted in taking a sample from the cases, and assuming that the rest was good? He trusted the latter was not the case, because that test had been found to fail on former occasions.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, he must confess that he could not answer the question of his right hon. and gallant Friend; but he would take care to procure information on the subject, and either answer him in that House or personally. In reply to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), he might say that they were about to invite tenders for smaller vessels, and there would then be an opportunity for the shipbuilders in Ireland to tender for the construction of those ships. With reference to the inquiry of the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston), the subject he had referred to had been considered; and the change proposed was that every two years of junior time in the case of engineers would count as one year of senior time. These proposed concessions were even more liberal than those demanded by the engineers themselves.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £194,300, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the Admiralty Office, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886."

and instances of that kind must necessarily occur from time to time in a great Service. The incident of the Monarch had been mentioned in connection with the deterioration of boilers; but he could assure his right hon. and gallant Friend that the accident did not occur from any defect in her boilers. With reference to the endurance of boilers generally, he confidently believed that under the improved system of boiler management introduced into the Navy they might look in future for a much longer endurance of the boilers of Her Majesty's ships. He did not see why they should not attain to the same success in that respect as in the Mercantile Marine. He was in conversation lately with the managing owner of the White Star Line, which was celebrated for the speed and regularity of its ships; and he was surprised to find that after 11 years the older vessels maintained the same speed as the new vessels of that Line, and none of them had been re-boilered. He hoped they might soon obtain the same result. The hon. Member for Perthshire (Sir Donald Currie) referred to some circumstances which might seem somewhat difficult of explanation, with reference to the suspended use of a gun on one of Her Majesty's ships. After a gun had burst on board the Daring it was ordered that the similar guns supplied to the Dryad should not be again used for exercise. The hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. Sutherland) had been rather severe in his criticisms of the Admiralty. The hon. Member had referred disparagingly to the merchant auxiliaries; but he was greatly mistaken in supposing that they took up those vessels because they had no vessels in the British Navy capable of rendering valuable protection to the commerce of the country. He would remind the hon. Member that there had been ordered in the last five years four ships of the Leander type capable of steaming 17 knots, four ships of the Mersey type of the same high speed—the Calliope, the Calypso corvette, two Scouts, and two despatch vessels of 17 knots. Some of those were ready, and several others would very shortly be ready for the protection of the commerce of the country. He would further remind the Committee that of late years the speed of all their iron-clads had been raised to 16 knots, and in many cases even to a higher speed. He thought he had now gone through the main points that had been put forward; and if he had not alluded to the large expenditure of a special character that had taken place it was because the presentation of the Vote of Credit would perhaps offer a more suitable opportunity to the Committee for discussing what had been done. All that remained for him to do was to ask the Committee to accept the assurance on the part of Her Majesty's Government that they had taken all the steps which they considered necessary in the interest of the Navy; and perhaps he should not be thought indiscreet in saying that the more they tested the resources of the country in cases of emergency the more confident they felt in their ability to meet all the demands that might be made upon the Navy. Having now endeavoured to offer such explanations as had been called for, he trusted there might now be no further opposition to the Vote.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he believed the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would confirm him in saying that provision ought to be made in the Estimates of the year for pay and expenses of the Service which was foreseen. There was a note in this Estimate to the effect that 1,000 men, Marines and Seamen, would be borne on the Votes for service in Egypt, and for which a separate Estimate would be presented to Parliament. That he believed was an entirely new practice; and without detaining the Committee on an important question of procedure at that time, he wished to record his protest against it, and to remark that when they came to discuss the Vote of Credit it would be necessary to raise the question as to the way in which the Estimate was made up.

SIR JOHN HAY said, the Committee would be glad to receive information as to the contracts that were being entered into for provisions at Chicago and other places. Remembering what had taken place during the Crimean War, as regarded the Goldner preserved meat contract, he would ask his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty to inform the Committee what was the nature of the contracts entered into for preserved meats, and what steps had been taken to ascertain the quality of the meats?

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to remind the Secretary to the Admiralty that his Colleague in the representation of Cork had asked whether any inquiry had been addressed to the Irish Ship-building Companies who were capable of constructing such vessels as gun-boats. The hon. Gentleman would recollect that they had had several conversations on the subject. He did not intend to go into the question on the present occasion, but would merely remark that his hon. MOTIONS.

SCHOOL BOARD ELECTIONS (VOTING).

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he wished to move the Motion standing in his name for the nomination of the Select Committee on Voting at School Board Elections. The name of Mr. O'Connor Power was a misprint for the name of Mr. J. O'Connor.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Select Committee on School Board Elections (Voting) be nominated."—(Sir John Lubbock.)

MR. DILLWYN said, he thought this subject ought to be carefully considered before the Resolution was agreed to, and he did not think that full consideration could be given to it on the present occasion, as there was not a full House.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Committee do consist of Twenty-one Members,"—(Sir John Lubbock,)—put, and agreed to.

MR. DILLWYN: I beg to move, "That the Committee do consist of 22 Members."

MR. SPEAKER: I put the Question to the House, and no negative voice was raised against the number 21.

Committee nominated of,—MR. COURTNEY, MR. CUBITT, MR. ILLINGWORTH, Viscount FOLKESTONE, MR. MUNDELLA, Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, MR. NOEL, MR. HOULDSWORTH, MR. LYULPH STANLEY, MR. RITCHIE, MR. PICTON, MR. COCHRAN-PATRICK, MR. SAMUEL SMITH, MR. BIGGAR, MR. BLENNERHASSETT, MR. ARTHUR BALFOUR, MR. JOHN O'CONNOR, MR. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Viscount CRICHTON, and Sir JOHN LUBBOCK.

MR. DILLWYN: I wish to move to make an addition.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member wish to move the addition of another name?

MR. DILLWYN: Yes; the name of Mr. John Morley.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must give Notice.

MR. DILLWYN: Then I give Notice that I will move to add the name of Mr. John Morley.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum," put, and agreed to.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (QUARTER SESSION BOROUGH) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. DODDS, Bill to repeal certain provisions relating to Quarter Session Boroughs of "The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882," ordered to be brought in by Mr. DODDS, Mr. JOHN BRIGHT, Mr. BARRAN, and Mr. JACKSON.

EGYPTIAN LOAN BILL.

GHANISTAN—ATTACK OF THE RUS-SIANS ON THE AFGHANS AT AK
TEPE—DESPATCHES OF SIR PETER LUMSDEN.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, seeing the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in his place, I will ask him two Questions of which I have given him private Notice. The first relates to the Egyptian Loan Bill, which stands for second reading to-night. The noble Earl and the House must be aware that this Bill has not yet been printed, and, of course, has not been read. Under these circumstances, I cannot but doubt that the noble Earl will consent to put it off to a future day. I think the noble Earl has suggested Thursday next for taking the second reading; but I would point out that Thursday next is not altogether a very convenient day, because on that day the Colonial Secretary proposes to move the second reading of a Bill dealing with the Australasian Confederation, which may possibly raise some discussion. I hope the noble Earl will consent to fix the second reading of the Bill a little later. Having said that, I wish to ask another Question, and it is this—Whether the noble Earl will consent to lay on the Table either the despatch of Sir Peter Lumsden or the substance of it? I ask the Question for two or three reasons—first of all, because the Russian account of this matter has now been before the world a great many days. It has been published and freely commented upon, not only in the English Press, but in that of Europe, and has, no doubt, having received no contradiction or qualification, exercised a certain influence. Secondly, there is this further reason—that Her Majesty's Government have as good as admitted that Sir Peter Lumsden does contradict, in fact, the statement made by the Russian General; and, thirdly, there appears in one of the morning papers to-day a very clear and detailed statement telegraphed from Tirpul, which not only contradicts the Russian account, but which purports substantially to confirm the account Sir Peter Lumsden is supposed to have sent. Under these circumstances, I feel quite sure that no one can be a gainer by the withholding of this despatch—neither Her Majesty's Government nor the country at large, nor even the Russian Government itself, when we are in this state of doubt. I would, therefore, very strongly urge on the noble Earl that he should comply with that which is undoubtedly the wish of the very large majority of this House.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in answer to the first Question put to me by the noble Earl, I have to state that I think it would be more desirable that the Egyptian Loan Bill should be taken without delay. I should very much regret that there should be any delay on our part. The noble Earl stated that the Bill has not been printed. It is in my hands now; but I have a very strong notion, derived from the interest recently shown by the noble Earl in politics, that the noble Earl would have been able to proceed with the Bill at five minutes' notice. Still, I feel it more respectful to him and to your Lordships, the request having been made, to postpone the second reading till Thursday. In the meantime I will communicate with my noble Friend the Colonial Secretary, and ascertain from him whether there is any reason why the two Bills should not be proceeded with on the same night. At any rate, I will fix the Loan Bill for Thursday. The noble Earl also made another very reasonable request with respect to the unfortunate events that have taken place at Ak Tépe. I stated the other day that we had not received a despatch from Sir Peter Lumsden, though we expected one in answer to the categorical questions we put to him. I have now to say that a telegraphic message has been received this day, and I sent it to the Russian Ambassador soon after it arrived. I propose to lay it on the Table of your Lordships' House, and I hope it will be in your Lordships' hands immediately.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY: Can the noble Earl state how long that message from Sir Peter Lumsden took in transmission? The matter of time is of great interest to us.

EARL GRANVILLE: I regret that I am not able to state without Notice what time is required for the transmission of messages from Afghan territory to St. Petersburg or to England.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH: Does the noble Earl know whether there is any truth in the announcement published in the newspapers, or will he inquire whether it is a fact, that the Russians are making a military road by means of forced labour from Sarakhs to Herat?

[No reply.]

NAVAL AND MILITARY OPERATIONS, 1885-6 (VOTE OF CREDIT).

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I stated the other day that I proposed shortly to make a statement as to the basis of a Vote—a considerable Vote—of money which is either being asked for at this moment "elsewhere," or will be asked for in the course of the evening. In accordance with the understanding that Her Majesty's Government have carefully considered our military position, not with reference alone to the Soudan, but to the general condition of public affairs, and to all the probable demands upon the military resources of the Empire, we have come to the conclusion that it is necessary to hold all these resources, including the Forces in the Soudan, as far as possible available for service wherever they may be required. Under these circumstances, the Vote does not include any provision of money for further offensive operations in the Soudan, or for military preparations with a view to an early advance on Khartoum. It does, however, include items having reference to such contracts or undertakings as, being already considerably advanced, could not be stopped with any appreciable advantage, and, at the same time, do not involve any necessity for hostile action. It provides for river steamboats which have already been contracted for, and for the completion of the Wady Halfa Railway, towards which extensive preparations have already been made, and which will have advantages altogether apart from military necessities. As to ulterior steps we reserve our entire liberty of action, subject to the approval of Parliament. I may here add that this does not imply any change of view or intention as to the defence of Egypt and of its Frontier. My purpose is simply to explain the basis of the Vote. With regard to the Suakin Railway, it was projected and commenced as a military work in support of the Nile Army. With the cessation of active operations on the Nile any considerable extension of this railway will be suspended; but until some other permanent arrangement can be made it will be necessary to hold the Port of Suakin with British or Indian troops. The experience of last summer, however, proves that in order to hold Suakin for any useful purpose, and, indeed, to hold it without undue exposure and risk to the garrison, it may be necessary also to occupy one or more positions in its neighbourhood. The Military Authorities will be consulted as to the positions which it may be considered necessary to occupy, and as to the points up to which, on the ground above stated, the railway should be advanced. It is proposed to complete the Suakin Railway up to the point which may be determined to be best for the security of the garrison, and while this is being done to consider our future course as to any prosecution of this railway beyond that point. We consider that if the Nile Railway is an advantageous work for general purposes, the prosecution of it need not be discontinued, as it does not involve any question of hostilities. The addition to our resources which will be effected by holding the Soudan Forces available for service elsewhere is an addition quite independent of the demands which have recently been made upon us by the Government of India for large reinforcements. Those demands will be entirely met by provision at home, leaving the Force released in Egypt and the Soudan as an additional reserve for employment in India or elsewhere. In fact, we are providing for (1) what the Indian Government has already asked for; (2) for the mobilization at home of a Force which, with that released in Egypt and the Soudan, will constitute a complete Army Corps; (3) for guns and submarine mining defences, in addition to and in aid of the naval preparations. The Vote asked for amounts to £11,000,000. The amount wanted for the Soudan is £4,500,000, and for special preparations other than such as are connected with the Soudan we ask for £6,500,000. Our strong desire is to remain on friendly relations with all Foreign Powers, and this increase of our military and naval means will not affect our wish to settle any differences between us and other countries in a peaceful manner honourable to all parties concerned.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, the grave announcement just made by the noble Earl is one which has carried the knowledge of the House a great deal further than it has been carried heretofore; but we are still kept in ignorance of the state of affairs in India, and also with respect to the question which has been so lately paramount in this country—namely, what is being done in the Soudan. At present, as far as I understand the noble Earl, that question is left in abeyance. The noble Earl has made a very careful statement, and I presume that every word of it has been carefully weighed; and I understand from his statement that we may still look forward to an Expedition to Khartoum at a period not yet decided upon. The noble Earl has left us, at all events, with the impression that the war operations in the Soudan may have to be resumed. That is a very serious question, and we have heard no new statement as to the objects or the intentions of the Government, because the noble Earl limited his observations as to the intentions of the Government to the statement that they adhered to the previous pledges given by them with reference to the defence of the Frontiers of Egypt. But the question of the Frontiers of Egypt is a very large and wide one, and one which I understand is not wholly decided upon by the Government themselves, and it certainly is not one as to which there can be any general agreement on the part of the Government. It seems to me, therefore, that the Government ask us to hold the sword over a great district in Egypt without telling us what use they are going to put their operations to, and we do not know when we are going to withdraw our troops from the Soudan. As I understand the noble Earl, it is not intended to withdraw those troops at once, and to bring them home; but they are to remain in Egypt as a reserve in case of necessity. It appears, therefore, that we are keeping a large Army in the Soudan without knowing what the intentions of the Government are with respect to that country. That is a matter, I think, upon which those who have not any confidence in the past or present policy of Her Majesty's Government may at least request further information. With respect to the other great question, the noble Earl has promised that we shall be placed in possession of the despatches of Sir Peter Lumsden, in order that we may know what the English officers say of the untoward event which has taken place in Afghanistan, for, according to all the maps, I believe the event did take place in Afghanistan, and not in territory belonging to Russia. But I can understand that the Government may wish at this moment to have their hands free, and not to be questioned too closely about the negotiations with the Russian Government. With respect to those matters, therefore, I shall be silent; but I cannot be silent about the Soudan. There has been a terrible slaughter in the Soudan of thousands of Arabs, and I want to know for what purpose that has been done, and what are the intentions of the Government with regard to that country?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, it is quite impossible to have listened to the words—the calculated and carefully prepared words—of my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary, without feeling that we are in the presence of a very grave conjuncture of public affairs. I have hitherto taken no part in the discussions in this House on the Egyptian question; but I cannot help now expressing a very warm opinion that, except on the ground of public necessity and military necessity, with reference to the position of this country in other parts of the world, it would be a great and terrible mistake to go back from the policy announced by the Prime Minister in the other House of Parliament on February 19. That announcement was made after the fall of Khartoum; it was made after it was known that we could no longer hope to rescue that extraordinary and gallant man, whose memory will remain for ever in the history of this country. It was a deliberate announcement on the part of the Prime Minister that the Government, after full consideration of the circumstances in which they were then placed, knowing that General Gordon's life had been lost, knowing that the garrison of Khartoum had been sacrificed—it was an announcement to Parliament and the country that, nevertheless, they felt it necessary for the honour of England and the safety of Egypt that their original policy with respect to Khartoum should be pursued. My Lords, it has been an open secret that since that time a considerable portion of the supporters of Her Majesty's Government have wished that that announcement had never been made; and public meetings have been held expressing the opinion that it was wrong for England, now that Gordon had been sacrificed and no lives could be saved in the garrisons, to pursue the campaign in the Soudan. I had hoped that the Government would stand firm to the policy they had announced. I am so far relieved by the carefully worded announcement, read rather than spoken by the noble Earl, that it is still an open question with the Government; and I rejoice to hear that the ground upon which the suspension of those proceedings is founded is the ground of military necessity, of the necessity of holding a great Army of Reserve in the case of further proceedings in Asia. I could not allow this discussion to pass without expressing my earnest and anxious hope that the Government will be able to pursue their original policy with respect to Khartoum. I hope that the preparations which they are making with regard to the Afghan Frontier will not be necessary; and I believe that if both Governments are really sincere in their desire for peace a solution of the difficulty may easily be found. But I hope that these preparations will not be made an excuse for divided councils at home. I hope they are not now made the excuse for backing out of the pledges which were given by Her Majesty's Government on the 19th of February. It is my firm conviction that unless the power of England to overcome the resistance of the Arab population of the Soudan and of Upper Egypt is proved by force of arms, we shall never have peace in Egypt, and we shall have exposed ourselves to the taunts and reproaches of the other nations of the world. I will add my conviction that the opening of those regions by the making of the Suakin-Berber Railway is a necessary condition for the further civilization of the great African Continent—an object in which all the nations of the world are now expressing their interest and taking their respective parts. I hold that—not by our own will, but by a series of events over which, as the Government have told us, we had no control—we have been led on step by step and by such steps as indicate our manifest duty to take our part in the civilization of that region; and my belief is that civilization will never be secured there, and the horrors of the Slave Trade will go on for ever, unless England does her duty with regard to the Soudan. I have nothing to say as to the military necessity for the moment of keeping the Army of Egypt as an Army of Reserve; but I will repeat my hope that the circumstances in which we are now placed with regard to the Afghan Frontier will not be made a mere excuse by the Government for a vacillating policy and for divided councils.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY: I understand that of the Vote of £11,000,000, £4,500,000 are to go to the Soudan. Are we to understand that the proposed railway from Suakin to Berber, which has made considerable progress already, is not to be continued? I ask the Question because I understood the noble Earl to say that there was a doubt whether we should go on with that railway. I also understood the noble Earl to say in another part of his speech that the contract entered into still continued. My understanding was that the contract with Messrs. Lucas and Aird was for the construction of the railway and its continuance until within about 100 miles of Berber. Have the Government decided to alter their course as regards that railway?

THE EARL OF LIMERICK: I wish to ask a Question which arises out of the statement made by the noble Earl. Your Lordships will remember that some weeks ago a Royal Proclamation was issued authorizing the calling out of the Army and Militia Reserve. No action has been taken on that Proclamation, and I cannot help thinking that some steps should be taken at an early date which would indicate the intention of Her Majesty's Government as to the calling out of the Reserves, because the uncertainty as to whether they are to be called out or not, and as to the number that may be called out, has a most injurious effect on the circumstances of these men, and also of their employers. A considerable time has now elapsed, and I trust it will be possible for the Government to say what their intention is with respect to the matter?

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: Could the noble Earl state whether it is still the intention of the Government to proceed to Khartoum? I took down his words, and they were—"We do not contemplate an early advance to Khartoum."

EARL GRANVILLE: In answer to the Questions which have been put to me, I thought the House understood what I stated—namely, that we intended to continue the Wady Halfa Railway, which would be useful for military purposes. With regard to the Suakin-Berber Railway, it is the present intention of Her Majesty's Government to continue it as far as is advantageous for the defence of Suakin itself and the outposts, as the Military Authorities may think necessary. With respect to Khartoum, I stated that we reserved to ourselves entire liberty of action.

LORD NAPIER OF MAGDALA: My Lords, I am not quite certain that I correctly understood the noble Earl the Minister for Foreign Affairs to say that the Forces in Egypt were to be held as a Reserve to meet any emergency that may happen to the country. Is it the case, then, that if such emergency should arise the Forces would be suddenly withdrawn from Egypt, leaving the country to anarchy? No preparations have been made for any supplementary Force to replace the present troops when withdrawn from Egypt. I trust that Her Majesty's Government will reconsider their decision to abandon their declared intentions regarding the Soudan. Lord Wolseley received the instructions of Her Majesty's Government to take Khartoum. That was their declared intention. In pursuance of that intention the Expedition from Suakin was undertaken. It will be a great national disgrace if we retreat from the Soudan. It cannot be that the power of England, if vigorously exerted, is insufficient to carry out the intentions announced regarding Egypt and to meet any dangers that may arise. We have destroyed a certain amount of civilization in Egypt, which existed to a far greater extent than we were aware of, and I consider that it is our duty to replace the Soudan in that condition from which we threw it down. We have made no increase to our Military Forces notwithstanding the difficulties that surround us. The Militia have not been embodied; the Reserves not called out. It is said that the confidential officer of the Government, the Adjutant General, has demanded 10,000 men to work the present Army system. It is said that the Viceroy of India has demanded 10,000 men more to hold India. But it will be a great disgrace to this country if the Government abandon the Soudan, and I trust they will maintain their original purpose. If we withdraw from Suakin we shall disgrace ourselves in the eyes of the world, and I hope the Government will reconsider that matter.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, I very earnestly hope myself that Her Majesty's Government will not follow the advice of the noble and gallant Lord who has just sat down, and engage in military operations in the Soudan for the purpose of spreading civilization in that country. I am one of those who form, it may be, but a small minority in this House, but who do not believe that civilization can be spread very easily by warlike operation; and I must certainly strongly deprecate such an extension of the policy of the Government already announced as would be involved in any attempt of that description. It is perfectly true that the Government last February gave orders under the circumstances which then existed to Lord Wolseley to make an advance upon Khartoum if the military conditions of the country would allow of it. But when that announcement was made there still remained a certain amount of uncertainty as to the fate of General Gordon; and it was perfectly obvious that the first duty of the Government under such circumstances as those was to take whatever steps might be necessary to ascertain fully the fate of that gallant and deeply-lamented man. I certainly never understood the Government to declare the smallest intention of conquering or occupying the Soudan for the purpose of introducing and spreading civilization in that country. For my own part, I certainly heard even the declaration then made with regret, because, while I was as ready as any man in this House to support the Government in taking any measure that might be necessary for ascertaining the fate of General Gordon and fulfilling honourably our engagements and duties in Egypt, I failed to see that these obligations involved the necessity of an advance to Khartoum. I am glad, therefore, to learn now from my noble Friend below me that Her Majesty's Government, while they do not declare their intention of not taking that measure, hold themselves perfectly free with regard to it to follow whatever course under the circumstances of the time may appear to them to be most advisable. I cannot but think that, looking at the complications which have arisen since February last in various parts of the world, Her Majesty's Government are bound to keep for themselves the most perfect freedom of action in the position in which we are now placed. The noble and gallant Lord who has just sat down said—and said, as I think, very truly—that it would be impossible for us, and improper on the part of Her Majesty's Government, to abandon the defence of the frontier of Egypt. But I perfectly understood my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to declare that it was the full intention of

Her Majesty's Government completely to adhere to their obligations with respect to the defence of the frontier so long as they occupy that country. We have duties in Egypt which we must fulfil, but I find it difficult to believe that in the fulfilment of these duties the Government need undertake an advance on Khartoum; and I am very glad to hear that it is their intention to keep themselves entirely free with regard to any such operation.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH: I hope the noble Marquess who has just spoken does not express the sentiments of the Government, because I believe those sentiments are the cause of half, if not two-thirds, of the trouble we are now suffering in India, at the Cape, and in Egypt. Whether the Government were right or wrong in making their solemn pledges in regard to Egypt—and I am of opinion that they have been wrong throughout—it is evident that no confidence can be placed in them by our Allies if they are always prepared to yield finally under the influence of pressure.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I cannot congratulate Her Majesty's Government on the advocacy they have obtained from the noble Marquess, for they are in this position. If they accept that advocacy, they certainly bring themselves under the censure of the noble Duke who spoke just now. None of us, and indeed no sensible man, would object to the disposition of the troops by holding them in hand for any military emergency that might arise or that might affect affairs at large. What we take objection to is the opportunist policy, or no policy, which has distinguished the Government, and which has existed in South Africa and in other countries, and which we apprehend will also exist here. But I did not rise for the purpose of continuing this discussion, and if I did I should find it difficult to do so, because it is difficult to argue with persons who will not argue in reply. I rose for the purpose of asking a Question about another Military Expedition to which no allusion has been made. That Expedition has been fitted out on a very large scale, costing no less than £150,000 per month; it has been in existence some time, and may be in existence for a long time to come. The objects of the Expedition and the conduct of it are very uncertain. I allude to the Expedition under Sir Charles Warren in South Africa, and I want to know whether it is included in the Vote of Credit now asked for, or whether it is to be over and above the £11,000,000 which we are told is to be the amount of the Vote?

THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, one or two Questions have been asked to which I may be permitted to reply. My noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Limerick) has complained that delay has occurred in acting upon the Proclamation calling out the Reserves. I may say that an Army Circular has been issued to-day with regard to the mobilization of the First Class Army Reserve. The terms of the Circular are (1) that a sufficient number of Reservists belonging to regiments having in India battalions which are not up to their establishment will be recalled to the Colours with a view of completing the establishments of battalions in India. This will require about 2,000 men. (2) All the First Class Army Reserves are warned that they may be recalled to the Colours at short notice.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY: Army and Militia?

THE EARL OF MORLEY: I am speaking only of the First Class Army Reserve. At once a certain number of Reserve men, those belonging to the 15 regiments of the battalions now in India, which are at present below their strength, will be recalled to the Colours; and the men belonging to the 14 other regiments will be warned that they may also be recalled to the Colours at very short notice, but they will not be actually recalled pending further instructions. There is no intention at present of calling the Militia Reserve to the Colours. The First Class Army Reserve consists at present of about 39,000 men, and of these about 2,300 will be at once recalled to the Colours for the purpose of making up the full establishment of the regiments in India which are at present below their establishment. In answer to the noble and gallant Lord opposite (Lord Napier of Magdala), I may say that, as regards the Army in Egypt, which has now 20½ battalions of Infantry, the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs did not intend to imply that the whole of that Force might be at once withdrawn and employed as an Army of Reserve elsewhere. What he intended was that as long as no forward movement was made in the Soudan so large a Force is not required for the safety of Egypt. The battalions—say 10—would thus be relieved, and, supplemented by a like Force from home, would give us a Force equivalent to an Army Corps of Reserve for general service. The noble Earl opposite has referred to Sir Charles Warren's Expedition. That Expedition has been provided for out of the Estimates for the year.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY: My Lords, in the present state of affairs I think we ought not to lose any opportunity of rallying round the Government. It is impossible to overlook the gravity of the announcement made this evening, for if it means anything, it means that the Government are in the greatest possible alarm as to the safety of the Empire at large, and that they think that the dark cloud which has so long threatened on the side of Russia is only too likely to burst. I can imagine nothing more grave than the announcement made to-night, and I think that in view of this great emergency we should all be on one side and support the Government through thick and thin. One reservation only I must make, and it is that if this extraordinary change of policy with regard to Egypt is carried out, the country should be plainly and fully informed what the policy of Her Majesty's Government with regard to Egypt is. If they call upon us to rally round them regardless of Party, we have the right to demand that there shall be a clean breast made with regard to the policy of Her Majesty's Government in Egypt. As a matter of fact, the country is in a position of wild alarm, and it is utterly in the dark as to what we have been doing and are doing in Egypt. If they do really wish that, in the grave emergency they foreshadow, the country as one man should rally round the national flag, we have the right to a clear statement of the views of the Government as to Egypt. We really know nothing as to them. One month we have one policy and another month another. At one moment one party in the Cabinet seems to gain the day, at another moment another party; at one moment it is the Peace party, and at another moment what people vulgarly call the Jingo party. At such a moment a good patriot is only doing his duty in saying that the matter should be cleared up. Do not let it be said that retirement from our position in Egypt is a light matter, and one that may not involve serious cost hereafter. Remember what we found when we deserted Suakin last year after those brilliant victories over Osman Digna. We had to do the work over again and to spend British life and treasure more largely than before. For one, I should wish heartily to support Her Majesty's Government in an emergency like this; but I do feel confident that the people of the country will require some clear explanation of the policy of the Government as to Egypt, if they are to submit to the enormous sacrifices they are called upon to make.

THE EARL OF RAVENSWORTH said, there could be no doubt that all would be ready to stand by the Government in this emergency. He desired to know what provision would be made for the wives and families of the Reserve men when they were called upon to rejoin the Colours?

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, the wives and families of Reserve men recalled to the Colours would be treated, as regarded separation allowances, on the same footing as those of soldiers married with leave.

INFANTS BILL.—(No. 46.)

(The Lord Fitzgerald.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD FITZGERALD, in moving "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee," said, that Notice had been given of an Amendment by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Beauchamp) which went to the root and principle of the Bill; and if the Amendment were carried, he should consider it his duty to abandon the Bill. The principle of the Amendment ought really to have been discussed on the second reading of the Bill. The object of the Bill, which had its origin in the other House, was to amend the Common Law which gave the father of a family absolute control over his children to the exclusion of the mother. Under the law great cruelties had been practised and great hardships suffered. The Bill declared that in certain circumstances the mother should be guardian or joint guardian. It had had been erroneously supposed that the late Earl Cairns was an opponent of the Bill; but he was not. Earl Cairns said that it would interfere largely with social relations, and that the details could not be settled satisfactorily except by a Select Committee; and the Bill had been carefully considered and amended by a Select Committee. The Bill of last year was supported in the other House by the Law Officers of the Crown, the Lord Advocate, Mr. Horace Davey, Mr. Bryce, and 17 Members of the Government. It was opposed by Lord Randolph Churchill and Sir R. Assheton Cross. The present Bill differed in some particulars from that of last year; but its leading principle was to confer upon the mother the right to which she was morally and inherently entitled of appointing guardians for her children in case she survived her husband. Some objection had been taken to the proposal to give jurisdiction in these questions of guardianship to the County Courts. It was said that questions of great delicacy and difficulty might arise unfit for such a tribunal to adjudicate. But he thought it was impossible for any injustice or inconvenience to arise, inasmuch as either party was entitled, without assigning any reason, to require the transfer of the matter to the Chancery Division of the High Court. The Amendment swept away the whole principle of the measure, and if it were carried, he should abandon the Bill.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."—(The Lord Fitzgerald.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, that the Bill entirely overlooked the interest of the children, which was sacrificed to the sentiment on behalf of the mother. Nothing could be more injurious to the welfare of the children than a divided guardianship, and the law of England had not been unwise in throwing upon the father the entire responsibility of bringing up the children. The mother had not equal rights in the matter with the father. There was no reference in the Bill to the case of the mother remarrying. It was important to remember that, as the father was the head of the family, the mother, on a second marriage, became part of her second husband's family. Then there was no provision for divorced persons, and a divorced woman, whose children had been placed by the Court under the protection of the husband, would still, under the Bill, be entitled on the father's death to the guardianship of the children. If their Lordships passed this Bill, they would be introducing a principle which involved the utmost confusion in our families. The Bill would introduce discord between husband and wife, it would place women in a position of equality with men which by nature they did not possess, and it would open out sources of the gravest disaster in order to meet some exceptional cases which certainly had not been laid before their Lordships. All cases of litigation were cases of difficulty and doubt. What their Lordships had to consider was how our existing law affected our English homes in our every-day life. In his opinion, that law was for the benefit of the children. He did not deny that there were exceptions to the general rule; but for the sake of exceptions which were limited in number, and for which the proposed remedy was exceedingly doubtful, they had no right to upset the principles regulating the relations of a father towards his children. Perhaps he might be told that a Select Committee had carefully considered the Bill; but really this question was one not so much for the consideration of lawyers as for the consideration of fathers of families. The Select Committee did not pay so much respect to the interests, the position, and the duties of fathers of families as they did to the somewhat exaggerated and hysterical view of the case which had been made out for mothers as against fathers. He thought he had now shown that the Bill itself was full of dangerous matter. He quite admitted, however, that there was one point in which the law might be amended with safety. As the law at present stood, the mother did not become guardian of the children if the father made no appointment at all. He thought there could be no doubt that when the guardian nominated by the father was dead, or if the father waived his paternal rights, it was right and proper that the mother should become the guardian of the children. This was one reason why he had hesitated to move the rejection of the Bill; but he thought he had shown that the measure would introduce novel and dangerous principles into our legislation, and therefore he intended to move, in Committee, the Amendments of which he had given Notice.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR remarked, that if the noble Earl's speech were of any value at all, it did not stop short of the total rejection of the Bill. He had listened to that speech with much regret, because it showed that his noble Friend had not a just appreciation of the legitimate claims and rights of the mothers of this country, and of the scandalous state of the law, which at present entirely ignored them. He had hardly expected to be so soon reminded of the enormous and irreparable loss which that House had sustained in the death of Lord Cairns. The noble Earl had spoken of the Select Committee as if it had been composed of men who approached this question with the feelings of lawyers only. Some of those who sat on that Committee, including himself, might accept such censure; though lawyers, as well as others, were husbands and fathers, and, if influenced at all by professional prejudices, were not likely to be so in the direction of change. But was there a man in that House who would say that Lord Cairns had not considered the question with a mind open to broad and generous views of the rights and interests of fathers and children? He would now make a few observations on the criticisms of his noble Friend. In the first place, there was not in the Bill a single word which interfered with the rights of a father. He denied that a father, after he was dead, was capable of discharging the duties of guardian of his child, and he also denied that any person whom the father might put in his place could possibly succeed to the father's position and to his natural rights, however earnestly he might desire to discharge the duties intrusted to him. The objection of a divided authority had been raised; but surely such an objection would have no validity, because the Bill introduced no change of principle in that respect. As things were now, more guardians than were might be appointed by the father, and the authority might be divided between them. In the event of a disagreement between the guardians, the Bill provided that the Court might be appealed to, and would make such order as might appear to promote the welfare of the children. In his opinion, the welfare of the children was intimately bound up with their relations to their parents, and the law, at all events, had enough of humanity in it to treat the mother as a child's guardian, when there was no other. And what was the title it gave her? The language of the law was "guardian by nature and nurture." He thought it would be a very unfortunate day for their Lordships' House on which such a Bill as this were rejected on such grounds as had been urged against it.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE expressed his fear that the Bill would give rise to a large amount of litigation, which, as their Lordships knew, meant ruin to the purse and continued hostility between the parties concerned. The Bill would, in fact, bring about a totally new state of society. The domestic habits and relations in this country were as good if not better than in any other part of the world. The onus probandi of the existence of the evils which this Bill was intended to remedy lay with those who were responsible for the Bill, and yet the noble and learned Lord in charge of the measure had not cited any cases of cruelty which did not come under the law as it is at present, and therefore showed no good cause for new legislation.

LORD INCHQUIN said, he objected strongly to that clause of the Bill which empowered a mother to appoint a testamentary guardian to act jointly with the father. If a father should object to being associated with a guardian of that kind, he would be compelled to prove before the Court of Chancery his fitness to have the sole charge of his own children.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH thought it would be a great mistake to refer questions of such extreme delicacy as those connected with the custody of children to County Court Judges. He, therefore, on that ground alone, would be prepared to support the rejection of the Bill, if it should be moved, on the third reading.

Motion agreed to: House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 2 (Surviving parent to be guardian).

EARL BEAUCHAMP moved, at the end of line 9, to leave out ("if surviving"), and insert ("unless the father shall have by deed or will otherwise appointed"). He thought they should be acting much more wisely by retaining the right which the father now possessed. He believed the system, on the whole, was conducive to the peace of families. In cases of this kind they usually heard a great deal about the law of other countries. According to the law of the United States, the father had the right of appointing a guardian to his children. That was an argument which ought not to be disregarded. He entreated their Lordships not through the consideration of exceptional cases to upset a well-ordered system of English law which had existed for upwards of 200 years.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 9, leave out ("if surviving"), and insert ("unless the father shall have by deed or will otherwise appointed").—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the exact point involved in the Amendment was that though there might have been a divorce through the husband's fault, and though the children might be in the wife's care during their father's lifetime on account of his misconduct, he might by will appoint a guardian who was to supersede the mother.

CHANNEL TUNNEL (EXPERIMENTAL WORKS) BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, that in consequence of an intimation he had received from the Secretary of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain), who had a Motion on the Paper for the rejection of the Bill, he would move that the Bill be read a second time upon that day week.

MR. HICKS: No; this day fortnight.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, that if the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks) chose to amend his proposal to that day fortnight, he had nothing to say against it; but his own proposal was to postpone the second reading for a week, with a view, upon that day, of fixing such a day for the discussion as would be most convenient for the right hon. Gentleman and the House in connection with the despatch of important Public Business. He desired to say that last week a similar adjournment had been made, as the night originally fixed was not considered a convenient night for discussing the Bill. He wished now to suggest that a question had since been raised which might very much shorten the discussion whenever it did take place. He understood from the newspapers that the noble Lord the Member for Flintshire (Lord Richard Grosvenor) had stated publicly that the Prime Minister was still in favour—he thought these were the words of the noble Lord—of the construction of a tunnel under the Channel to connect England with the Continent. He (Sir Edward Watkin) would, therefore, suggest that the Prime Minister should say whether he corroborated the statement of the noble Lord, because, in that case, he would be quite prepared, as the issue would be a very short one, and seeing that a General Election was coming on, to move the discharge of the Order for the Second Reading, after that expression of opinion. He thought, however, that from his (Sir Edward Watkin's) point of view an expression of favourable opinion at this moment would be exceedingly useful in calming certain asperities which were manifesting themselves on the other side of the Channel. If, on the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister were now to say that his opinion having been in favour of the construction of a Channel Tunnel, he had altered that opinion, and at no time or under any circumstances would he support the establishment of direct communication between the Continent and this country, he should be equally prepared to move the discharge of the Order for the Second Reading, hoping that he might be more fortunate after the General Election, which might possibly, among other changes, bring about a change of Government. He begged to move that the second reading of the Bill be postponed until that day week.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be read a second time upon Tuesday next." — (Sir Edward Watkin.)

MR. HICKS said, that having been the humble instrument in a previous Session—no Member of Her Majesty's Government having risen to oppose it—of causing the Bill to be thrown out, he desired to say a few words upon the proposal of the hon. Baronet. He believed that the large attendance in the House at that moment was in consequence of the feeling entertained by hon. Members as to the importance of the questions at issue in connection with this Bill; and he did not think the general feeling would be in favour of postponing the consideration of the measure for so short a time as a week. If it was to be postponed at all, hon. Members ought to have full Notice, so that they might be able to make arrangements to be in their places to oppose the measure. He felt fortified in expressing that opinion by the fact that on entering the House he heard from the Officers of the House that an understanding had been come to between Her Majesty's Government and the promoters of the Bill for the postponement of the second reading for a fortnight. He, therefore, begged to move, as an Amendment to the proposal of the hon. Baronet, that the second reading be postponed until that day fortnight.

Sir Edward Watkin

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "next," in order to insert the words "5th May,"—(Mr. Hicks,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'next' stand part of the Question."

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he did not object to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman. All he wished was to fix a convenient day consistent with the discharge of the important Public Business now before the House, and also with reference to the convenience of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade.

Question, "That the word 'next' stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

"5th May" inserted.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill to be read a second time upon Tuesday 5th May.

QUESTIONS.

LUNACY LAWS—DETENTION OF PAUPER LUNATICS.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to recent decisions of magistrates as to the detention of pauper lunatics in workhouses pending their admission to lunatic asylums; and, whether he intends to promote such legislation as will make it clear that such detention is legal, in order to prevent the scandal of lunatics being confined in prisons?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The question is now under consideration in connection with the Lunacy Bill which has been brought in by the Lord Chancellor.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked if the hon. Gentleman had seen the decision of the magistrate at the Lambeth Police Court, reported in The Times of that morning, illustrating the point in question?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, he had seen it.

ARMY (CONTRACTS)—BEESWAX.

MR. MARRIOTT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether notices for tenders for not less than three tons of beeswax for lubricating purposes have been issued by the authorities at Woolwich; whether the quality specified was the best African beeswax according to a sample; whether in fact the sample was "manufactured wax" prepared from mineral and other substances; whether the authorities made a contract on the basis of this sample; and, whether the jamming of cartridges, of which there have been so many complaints in the Soudan, is due to the combination of this "manufactured wax" with other substances?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: Tenders have been issued for beeswax, the supply to be genuine beeswax, not necessarily African, with a minimum melting point. To secure this minimum supplies may be mixed—that is, may consist of various sorts of beeswax in combination; but all must be genuine beeswax, and none manufactured from mineral and other substances. The samples were submitted to and approved by the War Department chemist. The beeswax used has not had anything to do with the jamming of cartridges.

[FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND).

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the delays complained of in connection with projects for the construction of Fishery Piers and Harbours in Ireland is due to any action on his part in stopping communication between the Fishery Piers and Harbours Commissioners and the Treasury?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Irish Government have been the medium through which certain correspondence has been carried on between the Treasury and the Fishery Piers and Harbours Commissioners with respect to the allocation of the remaining balance of the fund, but they have stopped no communication whatever. The last letter on the subject, dated the 11th of last month, was addressed to the Fishery Piers and Harbours Commission, and has not yet been replied to.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)— MALIN HEAD PIER.

MR. SEXTON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, How soon the construction of Malin Head Pier (Donegal) is to be commenced, according to the terms of the contract concluded with Messrs. Colhoun, of Derry; whether the estimate of the Irish Board of Works for this pier was £10,000, and whether this estimate was met as follows:—£300 by subscription from the locality; £1,000 loan by the Board of Works, to be repaid in twelve years by the county at large; £1,000 further loan from the Board of Works, to be repaid by a tax on the ratepayers of the district of one shilling in the pound for twelve years; and £7,700 free grant; whether the contract for the pier has been taken at £7,765, and whether a proportionate part of the saving will be returned to subscribers, and a proportionate part deducted from the charge upon the county and district, or whether the saving will be used in further improvement of the harbour, or how it will be applied; whether the Board of Works have declined to furnish to any ratepayer interested a copy of the detailed plan and specification; and, whether, in view of the local interests concerned in the work, the money subscribed in the district, and the taxation to fall upon it in consequence of the construction of the pier, the Government will arrange that a copy of the detailed plan and specification shall be available for examination by the interested ratepayers?

MR. HIBBERT: The contractors for this pier have been making preparations on the spot, and hope to be vigorously at work early in May. The figures are correctly given by the hon. Member; but it is impossible to say what actual saving will be realized until the works are complete, as there are expenses, such as the pay of the clerk of the works, not included in the contract. A copy of the detailed plans and specifications will be given to the secretary of the Grand Jury if he applies; and full information will be given to any interested person who may apply. A plan showing the position and nature of the work has already been sent to the Rev. Mr. Doherty.

MR. SEXTON: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Irish Government would consider the propriety of allowing the savings made upon the estimates of the contract to be allocated for the commencement of further works?

MR. HIBBERT: The case stands thus. The Treasury have estimated that after the probable working expenses, there now remains a balance of £45,000 to be allocated, and they have suggested that the Commissioners should look into the various cases and select those which have strong claims, so that the amount of preliminary future grants should be decided.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Government is prepared to limit the provisions of the Irish Registration of Voters Bill to the necessary provisions relating to Registration of Voters only, in regard to the new Franchise Act, and so promote the withdrawal of all opposition?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I can only say that the Bill, which is down for second reading to-night, contains the provisions which the Government consider necessary to secure the due registration of voters and other objects of a similar character in connection with the new franchise.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) ACT—PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATES AND FREE BREAKFASTS IN THE EAST END.

MR. LEWIS asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been called to a recent announcement in the newspapers that Mr. George Russell, M.P. the Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board, and Liberal candidate for one of the Metropolitan boroughs, was present and spoke at a free breakfast, given on March 24th in Bermondsey by Baron Ferdinand de Rothschild, the Liberal candidate for St. George's-in-the-East, to labourers from the docks situated in that borough, and to a subsequent announcement that Mr. George Russell, M.P. is now about to give a free breakfast in St. George's-in-the-East itself also to labourers from the docks; and, whether it is an infraction of the Corrupt Practices Act for a gentleman to first identify himself with a candidate at a free entertainment in the way Mr. Russell did with Baron Ferdinand de Rothschild, and afterwards to give a similar free entertainment to the same class of people in the borough for which his friend is a candidate?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): I have no personal knowledge of the matters connected with these breakfasts, and therefore I have had to seek information from my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board. I trust that the House, considering the nature of the question, will bear with me while I read a letter which I have received from my hon. Friend on the subject—

“18, Wilton Street, S.W., April 18, 1885.—

“My dear Attorney General,—I am sorry that you should be troubled with inquiries about my personal actions. But as Mr. Lewis has thought right to question you about them, it seems desirable that I should put you in possession of the facts. These dock breakfasts originated with the ‘Bitter Cry,’ published in 1883. I was invited by Mr. Arnold White to attend one of them in February last. Mr. White is most zealously endeavouring to deal with the great problem of finding employment for the unemployed. His plan is to attend at the docks at an early hour of the morning, when the gates are shut upon the hundreds whose services are not required. When he has means at his disposal, Mr. White invites these men, without any previous notice, to come to a breakfast. They are then addressed, solely in relation to their own position. Each man is asked to give his name and state his case; and after full inquiry endeavours are made to afford them the means of emigration, or to find them employment at home. By means of these breakfasts, which have been given by different donors, upwards of 300 men have since January last been helped to emigrate or provided with work at home. From first to last the movement is entirely unconnected with politics, and at the breakfasts no reference is made to any political subject. From the proceedings at the breakfast on the 24th of March, I understood that these exertions of Mr. White met with the approval of men of all parties. Sir Stafford Northcote, whose original letter I enclose, wrote most kindly and heartily, regretting that he could not be present at the breakfast; but entirely approving the movement and wishing it all success. The right hon. Baronet in his letter says—‘I had hoped to be able to attend and say a few words at your breakfast, but I have so much work to get through this morning I find it is impossible to do so.’ Among many others, Sir Baldwin Leighton and Mr. J. W. Lowther were present on this occasion, and many, whose names I need not mention—some were ladies—promised to contribute to the expense of a breakfast, and I gave in my name with others. I had no communication with Baron F. de Rothschild, and acted without his knowledge; I had no voice in the selection of the place; and I had not the slightest notion that any political benefits could accrue to myself or to anyone else from this act of mine. I may mention that I should suppose that not one of the men who have received these breakfasts is an elector. I fear they would be able to give no better residential qualification than the casual ward in winter, or an arch of London Bridge in summer. I have only to add that my motive has been simply to help some of the poorest of the industrious poor to help themselves. But I should be sorry, even with this object in view, to run the slightest risk of appearing to use treating as a political weapon. Therefore, if you will let me, I will place myself in your hands, and, if you think that, even by misconstruction, this breakfast can by anyone be regarded as illegal, however sorry I may be to send the hungry away empty on Tuesday morning, I will intimate to Mr. White that my contribution must be withdrawn. Forgive me for troubling you, and believe me, sincerely yours, G. W. E. RUSSELL."

Upon that statement every Member of the House is as capable as I am of forming a judgment of the course which my hon. Friend has taken. But as my hon. Friend thought it necessary to throw some responsibility upon me, I, forming the best judgment I could, wrote my hon. Friend a simple reply that he could give the breakfast.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES—REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he can now state when he expects that any Report of the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes will be presented?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Report as to the Housing of the Working Classes in England and Wales will be presented to Her Majesty in the course of next week. The Scotch Report will probably follow before Whitsuntide, and the Report with regard to Ireland soon afterwards.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE CLERK OF THE CROWN IN DUBLIN.

MR. WARTON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, What was the annual amount of salary, fees, and emoluments received by Edward Geale as Clerk of the Crown in Dublin; what annual amount, in salary and fees, is it contemplated will be received by George Fottrell who has been appointed temporary holder of that office; what amount of pension is to be paid to Mr. Geale; if the offices of Clerk of the Crown and Clerk of the Peace had been amalgamated on Mr. Geale's retirement, what would have been the saving effected; and, if Mr. Geale had appointed a deputy, approved by the Government, what would have been the saving effected?

MR. HIBBERT: Mr. Geale's average receipts in the last five years were about £1,500 yearly, and his statutory pension is about £1,000 per annum. His successor will receive salary and fees from the same sources; but as the latter fluctuate it is impossible to predict how much his emoluments will be. There are separate Clerks of the Peace for the County and City of Dublin; and it is not possible to say what might have been the financial effect of the amalgamation, though there would probably have been a saving on the present temporary arrangement. The Government have no power to compel Mr. Geale to appoint a deputy, even had this been otherwise desirable; and it is, therefore, unnecessary to consider what would have been the financial effect of such a course.

DECLARATION OF PARIS, 1856.

MR. M'COAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the two Despatches of the 13th and 18th of April 1856, which conveyed to Lord Clarendon the approval of Her Majesty's Government of his previously unauthorised signature of the Declaration of Paris?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: In Lord Granville's opinion there would be no public advantage in laying these despatches on the Table, which previous Foreign Secretaries have always declined to produce.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—RAILWAY TO SARAKHS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the fact, as stated by the special correspondent of The Daily News at Krasnovodsk, that the Military Attaché of the British Embassy at St. Petersburg has been refused permission to visit the railway which is now being made from Krasnovodsk to Sarakhs; and, whether any confirmation has been received from Her Majesty's Minister at Teheran of the following statement, made by the same correspondent, as to the Russo-Persian frontier:—

“The Russian advance into Turkestan necessitated a more exact delimitation of the Persian frontier from the Caspian to Sarakhs. This work was gone over a year or two ago, and was supposed to have been definitely settled. The boundary was laid down, but now the Russians are taking it upon themselves to determine what had been determined, and to settle where the boundary had been fixed. I understand that one subject of dispute is connected with the Attrek River, near its junction with the Caspian. About forty miles from its mouth this stream splits in two, and these branches flow separately into the bay of Hassan Kuli. The Attrek was settled to be the boundary between Persian and Russian soil; but whether the Commissioners forgot to define which branch of that river was to be the frontier or not I cannot say. Russia now claims the southern fork, and Persia claims the northern. The Russians, I am informed, have taken a very effective means of settling the question; they have constructed, or are constructing, a dam where the northern branch separates, and thus it will cease to exist. The southern branch will thus become the River Attrek, and that as been defined as the frontier?”

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government are not aware that the Military Attaché at St. Petersburg has been refused permission to visit the railway in question. The Russo-Persian Frontier as far as Lutfabad is defined in the Treaty of December 9-21, 1881. (“Asia,” No. 1, 1882, p. 8.) The appointment of Commissioners to mark out the Frontier was delayed for a long time, as the Russian Commissioner did not reach Teheran until July, 1883. The position of Hassan Kuli was one of the first questions to be decided by the Commission. Details on this subject will be found in “Asia,” No. 1, 1884, p. 89. It is the case that the Attrek enters the Caspian by two channels. No information has reached Her Majesty's Government as to the construction of the dam referred to, though rumours on the subject existed some years ago. The question of Hassan Kuli has not, as far as they are aware, been settled yet, as the Commission proceeded to the Eastern instead of the Western end of the Frontier.

CYPRUS (FINANCE, &c.)—REPORTED REVENUE FRAUDS.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the loss of revenue in Cyprus from systematic frauds in assessment has, during the last few years, amounted to from £15,000 to £30,000 per annum; whether a collector who, in 1884, reported to the Chief Inspector of Revenue the irregularities, the embezzlement of arrears, and the fraudulent assessments, was dismissed for so doing; whether, on the recent trial of Pappa, the Deputy Inspector, it was proved that the Chief Inspector knew of the frauds in the Famagusta District; whether, on the same trial, the Chief Justice commented on the suppression of evidence on the part of the Government counsel who conducted the prosecution; what charge was brought against the Chief Inspector by the Government of Cyprus; whether he was acquitted after trial, or whether the charge was dismissed by the magistrate in consequence of the non-production of evidence in the possession of the Government of Cyprus; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will cause some impartial and independent inquiry to be made into the history of the revenue frauds in Cyprus?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No information that we have yet received supports the estimate of loss suggested in the hon. Member's Question. We know nothing of a collector having been dismissed in 1884. As to the third and fourth Questions, if the hon. Member will communicate the grounds on which the suggestion is based, due inquiry shall be made. As to the fifth and sixth Questions, the charge against Mr. Bistachi seems to have been the taking of “hush money.” It was dismissed by the magistrate on the ground of the evidence being untrustworthy. We have no reason to believe that evidence was withheld; on the contrary, that much doubtful evidence was admitted for what it was worth. As to the last Question, I can only repeat what I said the other day, that the Secretary of State, before deciding, must await further Reports from the Governor and the Receiver-General.

PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE—ELECTORAL DISTRICTS.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether an elector having a qualification at the present time for the Division of a County, say South Warwickshire, and voting at an election for two candidates, will, when the Division is divided into single member districts, have a vote in each district, or only in the district in which his qualification is situate?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No proposal has ever been made, as far as I know, that an elector connected with one division should vote in another.

EGYPT (THE MILITARY EXPEDITION)
—THE TROOPS IN THE SOUDAN.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is the case that already more than four per cent. of the Troops now employed in the Soudan are sick; whether the Government are determined to leave the Troops in the Soudan all through the summer months; and, if it is the intention of the Government to complete the Railway from Suakin to Berber, as set out by the Secretary of State for War in his letter to General Graham of the 20th February?

MR. MACFARLANE asked if the noble Lord could tell the average amount of sickness among troops at home and in the British States abroad?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I cannot state the average, as the Returns differ. In reply to the Question of the hon. Baronet, my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the War Office said on Friday that, from the circumstances in which the Force is now situated, it is scarcely possible to state the present percentage of sickness. On the whole, the health of the troops is good; but I think it is probable that the percentage of sick exceeds 4 per cent. The replies to the two latter Questions would be more conveniently given after the Prime Minister has made his statement with reference to the Vote of Credit.

EGYPT (THE MILITARY EXPEDITION)—
THE TROOPS ON THE NILE.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been called to the following letter from an officer up the Nile, which has been published in the papers:—

"They are supposed to be going to build straw huts for us, but its not begun yet. The sun is most frightfully hot, and the tents we have are really unbearable in the daytime. The thermometer was 112 yesterday in the tents, and this is only March. We have nothing to read and nothing to do all day, and they have stopped the parcel and newspaper post, and we are only to get one newspaper a regiment, and we all want things so badly, and by the parcel post being stopped we can get nothing. The men have no clothes, except the rags of what they started in, and there are none for them;"

if he has any reason to doubt the accuracy of this report; and, if not, whether he will at once take steps to improve the lot of our brave soldiers up the Nile; and, if he will cause inquiries to be made, and inform the House of the exact number of soldiers now sick from climatic causes?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that of course they were aware that the heat on the Nile, and also at Suakin, was very great; but they had not received any Report showing that any extraordinary suffering now prevailed among the troops. Their arrangements for the troops were made locally. A large supply of clothing and other requisites for the troops had been sent out; but it was impossible to state how far the means of transport at the disposal of the authorities in Egypt enabled them rapidly to distribute them. The arrangements in regard to hutting and other accommodation for the troops were under the control of the General Officer commanding; but they had not at present a detailed Report on the subject.

THE DARDANELLES AND THE BLACK SEA.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he can state what protection would be given to British vessels in the Black Sea in case the Dardanelles were closed during hostilities between this Country and Turkey; also, whether there is any truth in the report that the Governments of Austria, France, and Germany have made representations to the Government of Turkey, on the subject of the closing of the Dardanelles, in case of hostilities between this Country and Russia; and, if he can give any information to the House on the substance of such communications? He would not press for an answer to the first Question if it were inconsistent with the public interests.

MR. GLADSTONE: I accept the offer of the hon. Member, and will, therefore, not answer the first Question, which relates to a contingency that has not arrived, and which does not appear to be probable on the face of it. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that at the present moment it is hardly possible for a person holding my Office to deal with the subjects that demand my immediate attention, and it is quite beyond my power to undertake to investigate matters of this kind, however interesting. The second Question, however, refers to a matter of fact. As to that, I am able to inform the hon. Gentleman that no information has been received at the Foreign Office, either from Turkey or from any of the Governments named in the Question to any such effect.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHAN-ISTAN—ATTACK BY THE RUSSIANS
ON THE AFGHANS AT PENJDEH—SIR PETER LUMSDEN'S DESPATCH.

MR. GLADSTONE: I may perhaps be allowed to refer to the question of the intelligence received from Sir Peter Lumsden. I was obliged to inform the House yesterday that it was in my power to communicate very little in addition to what I had previously stated; but I signified to the House that important instructions had been addressed to Sir Peter Lumsden on the 10th of April, to which we had not then received a reply, but to which we were in constant daily expectation of receiving one, so far as one can use those words with regard to a country with which communication is somewhat variable. That reply has been received to-day. It contained what I may call a full and detailed account of what Sir Peter Lumsden considers to be the main points of the case connected with the painful incident of the attack near Penjdeh. And it will serve to show how seriously Sir Peter Lumsden has been at issue with General Komaroff on important points connected with that attack. It would not be in my power—it is a long telegram, entering into details with particulars for which we had specifically asked—it would not be in my power to state its effect in a few words. But we will lay it on the Table, as it is a document which is, I think, complete in itself, and gives important and valuable information to the House. In fact, it has been laid on the Table, and it will be circulated generally to-morrow morning, and copies of it will, I believe, be accessible to hon. Members in the Vote Office at an early hour this evening.

Mr. Gladstone

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Is it proposed also to lay on the Table the telegram that was received on Friday night from Sir Peter Lumsden?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir. Any question with regard to that telegram would embrace also the previous series of telegrams, and with regard to these I am very doubtful whether they would add anything to the information contained in the telegram received to-day. I do not refuse to review it if it is desired for the purpose of examining exactly how that matter stands; but the series contain a good deal of hearsay, a good deal of here-and-there expressions of opinion, and do not present a narrative of what took place. I think that when hon. Gentlemen have seen and considered the telegram received to-day, they will be able to say whether it is desirable to press us to examine the old telegrams in order to see what portions should be laid on the Table.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Then none but this particular telegram will be presented; none of the other communications will be produced?

MR. GLADSTONE: Not at present.

EGYPT — RUMOURED NEGOTIATIONS FOR OCCUPATION BY A TURKISH FORCE.

MR. M'COAN asked the Prime Minister, Whether there was any truth in the generally reported statement that negotiations were either in progress, or had been already completed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Turkey for the occupation of Egypt by a Turkish Force under English officers?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; I have nothing to communicate on that subject. I am not aware that there have ever been any negotiations on a proposal corresponding with that to which the hon. Member refers.

Afterwards,

MR. GLADSTONE said: In the absence of any Notice, I did not know whether I could speak very confidently, and therefore I gave a limited answer to the Question of the hon. Member. But after conferring with my right hon. Friend near me for a moment I have to say that there is no foundation whatever for the Question which the hon. Member (Mr. M'Coan) has put.

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE — THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the House would have in its hands when the Budget was being introduced a statement of the Receipts and the Expenditure, as was the case last year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): Before the Budget is brought in I will follow the rule observed last year.

NAVAL AND MILITARY OPERATIONS, 1885-6 (VOTE OF CREDIT).

RESOLUTION.

MR. GLADSTONE: In laying this Vote of Credit on the Table, Her Majesty's Government have engaged that it should be accompanied by a brief explanation, which will contain nothing in the way of apology, argument, or controversy, but the whole object of which is to give to the House of Commons a clear idea of the course we are now taking and the meaning of the Vote proposed. The House of Commons was apprised soon after its meeting in February that it would be necessary to make provision for military charges in the Soudan, not only during the unexpired portion of the year 1884-5, but also during the financial year 1885-6. At that period we had in view the expenditure in the Soudan, and expenditure in the Soudan alone; but circumstances which have since occurred, with the greater portion of which the House is acquainted, have obliged us to widen our investigations and greatly to enlarge our demand for funds. We have found it necessary to review our military position, not with reference to the Soudan only, but with reference to the general condition of public affairs and to all the possible demands upon the military resources of the Empire. We feel that it is necessary at the present moment, in our judgment, to hold all these resources as far as possible, and including the Forces in the Soudan, available for service wherever they may be required. In these circumstances, the Vote for which we are now asking does not include any provision of money for further offensive operations in the Soudan, or for military preparations with a view to an early advance upon Khartoum. It does, however, include items having reference—as will be readily understood—to such contracts or undertakings as, being already considerably advanced, could not be stopped with any appreciable advantage, and which, at the same time, do not involve any necessity for hostile action. For example, we provide for the river steamboats which have already been contracted for, and for the completion of what is known as the Wady Halfa Railway—the railway beginning at Wady Halfa—towards which extensive preparations have already been made, and which will have advantages altogether apart from military necessities. As to the ulterior steps beyond what I have stated, we reserve our entire liberty of action, subject to the discretion and control of Parliament. Perhaps I ought to add—though it is hardly necessary—that what I have now stated with respect to the Soudan does not imply any change of view or intention as to the defence of Egypt and its frontier. There are many considerations of importance—moral, military, political, and physical—which bear upon the question of the operations in the Soudan. I refer to them now merely to say that the whole of them are entirely beyond my present purpose, that purpose being merely to explain the basis of the Vote; and I may repeat for the convenience of the House the most important words I just now used—words in which I declared that we do not in the Vote now laid on the Table ask for any provision of funds for further offensive operations in the Soudan, or for any military preparations with view to an early advance on Khartoum; but that we solicit Parliament to hold the military resources of the Empire, including the Force in the Soudan, available for service wherever they may be required. I think it may be convenient that I should add an explanation of one or two details which fall within the scope of what I have already said. The Suakin Railway was projected and commenced as a military work in support of the Nile Army; but with the cessation of active operations on the Nile any considerable extension of the railway will be suspended. But until some other permanent arrangement can be made, it will be necessary to hold the Port of Suakin with British or Indian troops. The experience of last summer has proved to us that in order to hold Suakin for any useful purpose—indeed, in order to hold it without undue exposure and risk to the garrison, particularly including their health—it may be necessary to occupy one or more positions in the neighbourhood of that place. The Military Authorities will be consulted as to the positions which it may be considered necessary to occupy with that view; and as to the point up to which it will be necessary, on the grounds I have already stated, that the construction of the railway should now be carried. It is proposed to complete the Suakin Railway up to the point which may be determined as best for the garrison; and while that is being done—for it must take some little time—we shall consider our future course as to any prosecution of this railway beyond that point. We consider, Sir, that if the Nile Railway be, as we think it is, an advantageous work for general purposes, the prosecution of it need not be discontinued, as it does not involve any question of hostility. The addition to our resources which will be effected by holding the Soudan Force available for service elsewhere is an addition quite independent of the demands which have been recently made upon Her Majesty's Government by the Government of India for large reinforcements. These demands will be entirely met by provision at home, leaving the Force released in Egypt and the Soudan as an additional reserve for employment in India or elsewhere. I may perhaps say—my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War has furnished me with the information—that in the total Vote it is proposed to provide, first, for the Government of India, as already stated; and, secondly, for the mobilization at home of a Force which, with that released in Egypt and the Soudan, will constitute a complete Army Corps; thirdly, for guns, submarine mines, and defences in addition to, and in aid of, naval preparations. I will now state in outline the particulars of the Vote. Perhaps I may first explain to the House the change which has taken place in our views as to the order of Business, which was suggested—although I will not say it was asked for—by the short statement or question of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote). When we first had to contemplate asking the House for a Vote of Credit it had reference to the Soudan alone, and as it was to be asked for with reference to the Soudan alone, besides that the amount was not so large, it was one with regard to which the question of time was not in our view of very great importance; and, consequently, we intended to propose that Vote to the House after the Budget; but, considering the important change that has taken place—the change in the proposition which the Government now make to the House, and the great change of their having to introduce other and larger items of great consequence into the Vote—and with reference to what I shall term special preparations, we think now that the considerable addition to the military expenditure of the year which it is our duty to ask Parliament to make should be distinctly submitted to Parliament at a very early day, and before we determine finally upon the financial proposition which will be necessary in order to enable us to meet the charge. The general principle upon which our arrangements are made is that before the Budget is submitted to the House the general scheme of expenditure is sufficiently known and sanctioned, though all its details have not been fixed. This is so considerable an addition to the annual Expenditure, that we believe it will be better that we should pursue a course founded on that basis on the present occasion; and, therefore, our proposal is to submit this Vote of Credit to the House for its sanction, if it should meet with approval from the House, on Monday next—which will, I think, give the House sufficient time for its consideration—and to postpone the Financial Statement of my right hon. Friend from Thursday to Thursday next week. Now, Sir, the total sum for which we ask the House by this Vote is £11,000,000. The sum is put in one Vote upon administrative grounds, but it is divided in that Vote between what I have termed the remaining charges relating to the Soudan, and what I have termed special preparations other than the Soudan; and I think it is a fact that, in point of law, we should be enabled to effect a transfer from one portion of this Vote to the other without any previous explanation to the House. I wish to state distinctly that we shall not effect any transfer whatever from the head which relates to special preparations to the head relating to the Soudan without full previous communication to Parliament. The House will, therefore, understand that the Government entirely gives up its discretion in that respect. Of the £11,000,000 I have mentioned, the remaining charge for the Soudan stands at £4,500,000. Of this £4,000,000 would be in the technical division military charges; out of that sum £750,000 would have relation to the Suakin Railway, for which very considerable cost has already been incurred, and £400,000 would have relation to the Nile or Wady Halfa Railway, making in all £1,150,000. Taking the military charge at £4,000,000, there would be also a naval charge of £500,000 in connection with operations in the Soudan. I may say, at once, it refers to the removal of the troops from one point to another. Under the head of special preparations we ask for the sum of £6,500,000. Of this sum, again, the House will please to understand that I am not able to speak with the rigid technicality of an Estimate; but the description I give is prepared in the Departments according to the best understanding they can form of the respective sums that will be required for each purpose. Upon that basis, the expenditure of these £6,500,000 would be approximately—for military charge, £4,000,000; for naval charge, £2,500,000. Under the head of special preparations there are £4,000,000 for military charges, including £1,150,000 for railways, and £500,000 for the Navy in connection with the Soudan. Thus we have £6,500,000 and £4,500,000, making together the total I have mentioned, £11,000,000. In conclusion, I can only say that we are sensible of the gravity of the proposal which we now make under a deep sense of our responsibility to the Crown and to the Empire. While we count with confidence on the liberality and patriotism of Parliament for meeting every just demand, our course, it is perhaps hardly necessary for me to say, will continue to be, in all our relations with Foreign Powers, what, as far as our intentions went, it has been already—that is to say, our aim and desire are, if it be possible by pacific means, to obtain a just and honourable settlement of every controversy in which we are, or in which we may be, involved.

Estimate presented,—of the Sum required to be Voted, beyond the ordinary Grants of Parliament, towards defraying the Expenses which may be incurred during the year ending the 31st March 1886—(1.) For Remaining Charges in the Soudan and Upper Egypt; (2.) For Special Naval and Military Preparations—£11,000,000.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The statement of the right hon. Gentleman, both in what it actually contains and what it implies, is so important that I do not propose to say much upon the subject at the first blush. I cannot, however, help noticing the change, the change in the arrangements which the Government propose in the order of Business. I regret that we should have the Budget delayed; at the same time, if it appears to the Government to be important that they should proceed rapidly with that portion of this Vote which refers to special preparations, I can quite understand that it may be necessary and desirable to lay aside or postpone other Business for a time in order to arrive at the consideration of that very important proposal. It is one the magnitude of which, and the circumstances under which it is brought forward, must at once strike the House with a sense of its gravity, and impose caution upon us in dealing with it. With regard to one part of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman—that relating to the expenses in connection with the Soudan—I am not entirely satisfied with the right hon. Gentleman's statement; and if it were not for the fact that this question is coupled with another which requires careful attention, and which I should be most sorry to damage by premature criticism, I should feel it necessary to make some observations upon the subject. I do not think the Government are dealing with the Soudan Question, if it can be regarded as a question by itself, in a manner that would be satisfactory to the House. We ought not to be asked to spend money, and especially to give Votes of Credit, for operations in the Soudan without a fuller and more complete statement of the policy of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have not even attempted to sketch the policy of the Government.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE:
When the right hon. Gentleman states that he is going to ask for the large sum of £4,500,000 for expenditure in the Soudan, I think it is only reasonable that Her Majesty's Government should give us full and complete explanation of their policy. I understand, however, that we may look for that statement when the time comes for the question to be raised. With regard to the matter as a whole, I am glad to hear that the Government intend to proceed rapidly; and if it is necessary for the purpose to postpone the Budget, of course I shall make no objection to that course being taken. If the Government find it more convenient that the Budget should follow the statement, that is a course to which, I think, the House will offer no objection.

Estimate referred to the Committee of Supply, and to be printed. [No. 155.]

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) (re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 49.]

COMMITTEE. [Progress 17th April.]

[SEVENTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SEVENTH SCHEDULE.

COUNTIES AT LARGE.

NUMBER OF MEMBERS AND NAMES AND CONTENTS OF DIVISIONS.

PART III.

IRELAND.

MR. HEALY, in moving an Amendment, in page 101, to leave out from line 21 to line 4 of page 102, and insert—“Barony of North-West Liberties of Londonderry.

Barony of Tikeeran (except the parish of Learmount, and that part of the parish of Banagher which is in this barony).

Barony of Kennaught (except the parish of Dungiven, and that part of the parish of Banagher which is in this barony, and except that part of the parish of Bovevagh which is bounded by the parishes of Dungiven and Errigal.

Barony of Coleraine.

Barony of North-East Liberties of Coleraine.

No. 2.—The South Londonderry Division.

Barony of Tikeeran (parish of Learmount, and that part of the parish of Banagher which is in this barony).

Barony of Kennaught (parish of Dungiven, and that part of the parish of Banagher which is bounded by the parishes of Dungiven and Errigal).

Barony of Loughinshollin,” said, it was necessary to call the attention of the Committee to the manner in which the Boundary Commissioners had acted in regard to this division, and the changes which they had made in the division as originally laid down. In the first place, he was reminded that the hon. and learned Gentleman Her Majesty's Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) was represented before the Commissioners by counsel. [“No, no.”] He understood that hon. and learned Gentleman denied the soft impeachment; but the counsel who appeared at the inquiry stated that he represented Mr. Walker, and that he was exceedingly dissatisfied with the boundaries which had been agreed upon. Now, he (Mr. Healy) must say, that for any counsel who appeared on behalf of a Law Officer of the Government, or of any Member of the Government, to attempt to intimidate the Commissioners by alleging that fact was extremely unsatisfactory, unprecedented, and he might almost say shocking, and especially so when viewed from a point of general policy. What must have been the effect produced on the minds of the Commissioners when they were told that the Irish Solicitor General, and a strong supporter of Her Majesty's Government—namely, the hon. Baronet the Member for the county of Londonderry (Sir Thomas M'Clure), were disappointed at the arrangement which had been made. He would say, at the outset, that the inquiry was prejudiced to a very large extent by that unfortunate statement. He was quite willing to admit that the proposal put forward by the hon. and learned Gentleman was not adopted; and that it would have been worse for the popular Party in Derry than the scheme finally adopted by the Commissioners. As he had said on a former occasion, the object of the Commissioners had been, not to jerrymander the divisions altogether, but just to jerrymander them enough; and the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman to draw a line through the barony of Loughlinshollin, which was largely Catholic, was so indecent and outrageous that it was even too much for the strong stomachs of the Boundary Commissioners. The Irish Members had been attacked by the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) for having imported religious distinctions and some sectarian bitterness into this controversy. For his own part, he altogether repudiated any charge of the kind. The religious element had been introduced into the discussion by the Commissioners themselves, who, at the instigation of the Tory Party, had undertaken the inquiry with a theodolite in one hand and a Religious Census Table in the other. In point of fact, the Religious Census Table, from first to last, had been the guide which had been followed in Ulster. And what had happened? The county of Derry had been divided into four baronies, one of them being the barony of Loughlinshollin—a very large Catholic barony; and the question arose—what parishes of the Northern baronies were to be thrown into the division which comprised that barony? The original scheme of the Commissioners was to throw in bits of the barony of Tikeeran and the barony of Kennaught in order to obtain the requisite amount of population. That provision would have given the popular Party a Member for South Derry, the Catholics being 47 or 48 per cent of the entire county. Seeing how persons of other denominations were divided, it was not too much to say that the Catholic Party, under that arrangement, would have been entitled to one Member. It happened that in the lower division, as it was at first arranged, the Catholics, not to speak of the Nationalists, would have had a majority of over 2,000. When that fact came out the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, who, of course, was extremely well informed with regard to the county of Londonderry, and was kept well supplied with information by his agents, immediately presented a counter-proposal to the Commissioners. Before he (Mr. Healy) touched upon that proposal he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to this extraordinary fact—that with the exception of the counties of Dublin and Kildare, the scheme for the county of Londonderry was the last issued by the Commissioners. It was the third of the schemes published, and it was not kept back until the very last moment without a purpose, for the operations of the Commissioners had not been of such an unbiased character that it could be supposed they had been occupied in the interim with an entirely innocent investigation. However, in spite of the delay they were not able to hit the mark accurately enough for the Solicitor General; but, at all events, the fact remained that the county represented by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite supplied nearly the last scheme that was made public. However, when the Commissioners held their inquiry the hon. and learned Gentleman was represented at it by counsel, who protested, in the strongest terms, against the scheme of the Commissioners. He would leave the House to imagine what kind of impression was produced on the minds of the Commissioners, connected as they were with Dublin Castle, when they were informed that Her Majesty's Solicitor General was opposed to their scheme; and he would ask what guarantee of fair play the Nationalists had in the matter? The Government, or the Whig Party, were represented upon the Commission by Mr. Piers White; the Tories had two representatives—Major Macpherson and Captain Johnston; and the Irish Official Party were represented by a member of the Irish Local Government Board—Mr. Burke; while the popular Party, with whose constituents the Government were dealing in five out of six cases, were not afforded a single representative. They were not even consulted in regard to the names of any individual appointed upon the Commission. The Conservatives had two representatives, and the Whigs two; but the Nationalists had no representative at all, although 85 out of 103 seats to be dealt with were Nationalist constituencies. He thought that fact alone was sufficient to damn the Report made by the Commission in the opinion of every fair-minded man. In the next place, they had the operations of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland. Perhaps it was indiscreet for the Liberal agent in Derry to have employed Dr. Todd, notwithstanding the fact that he was a distinguished barrister; and it might have been indiscreet for Dr. Todd to have avowed to the Commissioners that he represented the Solicitor General for Ireland. He (Mr. Healy) had no doubt that by-and-bye the hon. and learned Gentleman would get up at the Table and tell the Committee that Dr. Todd was altogether unjustified in stating that he represented him (Mr. Walker); because the hon. and learned Gentleman could not but feel the extraordinary position in which the Commissioners were placed by having a distinct statement made to them that one of the chief Law Officers of the Crown in Ireland, possessing a seat in the House of Commons, disapproved of the Commissioners' scheme. He would ask the Tory Party in the House what interest they had in backing up this scheme, which was a scheme for returning two Whigs for the county of Derry, although the Tories had not a single Member in that county at present, except for the city of Derry; and the present scheme of division no more interested the Tory Party than it interested any political Party not connected at all with the county. It was purely a Whig scheme, from first to last; for the Tories would have no chance of returning a Member for Derry. He asked, then, was it right or fair, in the interests of decency, for a lawyer and advocate to get up in Court and tell the Boundary Commissioners that Her Majesty's Solicitor General disapproved of their scheme? He maintained that it was a monstrous attempt to interfere with the judgment and liberty of action of the Commissioners, and that it was an indecent attempt to wrest from them a scheme in favour of the views of the Government themselves, and what they considered to be best for their own purposes. No doubt the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland would say that this was not his scheme, or that of the Government. How dared the hon. and learned Gentleman have a scheme at all? He had no business whatever to put forward a scheme for any county, even although he happened to represent that county in the House of Commons. The hon. and learned Gentleman could not sink his position as one of Her Majesty's Advisers, and as one of the Gentlemen whose advice the Lord Lieutenant was bound to take when he appointed this Commission. He should like to know what English Members would have said if the Attorney or Solicitor General had gone down to Taunton, or Durham, and said—"We disapprove of the scheme of the Commissioners?" What would have been said in England if such a declaration had been made—if the declaration received no disclaimer from Her Majesty's Government? It might suit the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland in that House to disclaim the action of Dr. Todd; but he did not disclaim it at the time, or before the Commissioners sent in their Report—which was the proper time to make it, if the disclaimer was to have any effect at all. It was only after the hon. and learned Gentleman found that the views of his representative had been adopted, and when the statements of Dr. Todd had been reported, and made the subject of adverse comment in the Dublin newspapers, that the hon. and learned Gentleman came out with a disclaimer. He (Mr. Healy) contended that the present scheme was tainted by the action of the hon. and learned Gentleman; and on that ground, if upon no other, he would ask the Government to send it back to the Commissioners, and call upon them to make a fresh Report, seeing that it was a scheme which had been obtained, to a large extent, by undue influence, if not by actual intimidation. What were the merits, or rather the demerits, of the original scheme? What fault was to be found with the original scheme? As far as he knew, no fault whatever could be found with it. The Commissioners said—and this was a remarkable point, to which he would call the attention of the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke)—that Mr. James O'Doherty, the solicitor, and others who represented the Nationalists, had contented themselves with saying that they were satisfied with the proposition of the Commissioners, and that they objected to any alteration of it. What was that but a sneer, with the intention of implying that the Nationalists had put themselves in the wrong by not proposing any scheme of their own? The Commissioners then went on to make a very remarkable admission. They said that the alternative scheme was supported by maps and Schedules, put forward by Mr. Lane, the solicitor for the Conservative Party, and by Dr. Todd, the counsel for the Liberal Party. "Both of these schemes," they added, "concurred to a certain point." No doubt, both of them concurred in cutting off people of the barony of Loughinshollin from their co-religionists. Both Whig and Tory concurred in that; and, therefore, the Commissioners said that it would be an improvement upon their original proposal, and they agreed to provide that the barony of Kennaught should not be divided, as had been proposed originally. Probably the defence of the Government would be that the present scheme of the Commissioners only divided one barony; whereas the original scheme divided two. The right hon. Baronet had pointed out that the area of the Derry boundaries was divided only in one instance now. That would have been an admirable argument if the Government had adopted it in the case of Armagh, Donegal, Tyrone, or Down, or in any other single instance in connection with an Irish county; and if the right hon. Baronet put forward that make-believe and absurd argument, he (Mr. Healy) would only say that, on the Report stage of the Bill, he would call upon the right hon. Gentleman to re-propose the old divisions of Armagh, Donegal, Tyrone, and Down, or otherwise the argument would put him entirely out of court; and, certainly, what was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander. The Commissioners went on to say that these detached parishes contained a population of 9,000 persons, and that, by leaving them united to their own baronies, a more compact division was formed. But where was the compactness of the division? He defied any Member of the Government to show in what the compactness consisted. The Commissioners said that the two baronies under the old scheme were divided by a high and almost uninhabited range of mountains; but was not that the case in the county of Donegal? How was that argument allowed to hold good in the case of Donegal? Kilmacreenan was separated by mountains, and utterly uninhabited spaces of ocean—visited only by herrings and seagulls from Innishowen, yet both were shamelessly united in one division. If that argument had been used in the case of Donegal, it would have been entirely worthless, in the view of the Government; but as this was a case in which the Government were anxious to suit their own purposes, they introduced the argument of separation by a range of mountains. It must be borne in mind that in no other case had such a ground been allowed to stand in the way of the connection of one district with another; and in this case, under the old scheme, the population was entirely homogeneous. It was a Catholic population, having intimate communications with each other—one in blood and in religion, and also in language; and also, from a geographical point of view, far more compact than the division which had been substituted for it. For the Commissioners, who scarcely spent an entire hour over the matter, to set up their opinion against that of the inhabitants of the district was simply hypocrisy and audacity. The Commissioners went on to state, in their Report, that the suggested improvement was one which recommended itself, and that it necessitated a corresponding reduction from Division No. 1, in order to make up and complete Division No. 2. Nevertheless, it was a remarkable fact that the parishes struck out were parishes containing a purely Catholic population, and that the two parishes put in from the barony of Coleraine contained a purely Protestant population. As a matter of fact, out of the barony of Coleraine, the Commissioners had taken the two most Protestant parishes of the entire division; and out of the original Northern Division they had struck out the two most Catholic parishes; and this course could only be defended by arguments which it was admitted had no force in regard to other counties—such as the counties of Armagh, Donegal, Tyrone, and Down. It was monstrous, then, that the Nationalist Party should be attempted to be stalled off by this miserable threadbare argument. First of all, he would state to the Committee the religious effect of the scheme. In the original scheme of the Commissioners the Southern Division had a majority of 3,000 Catholics. By the present scheme of the Commissioners, a majority of 3,000 Protestants had been secured. Wherever any change had been made in Ulster, time after time and in county after county, the effect of the change had been to put the Catholics in a minority; and therefore the action of the Commissioners and of the Government was capable of but one interpretation. These schemes bore the brand of infamy upon them, and so long as these boundaries were allowed to exist they would be a monument of the bigotry, the prejudice, and the partiality of the Commissioners appointed by Lord Spencer. In Derry, as in the case of Down, Donegal, Armagh, and Tyrone, every change which had been made told against the popular Party; and, bearing in mind that in no single instance had the Tory Party come forward and asked for an alteration which had not been adopted, it was impossible to draw any other conclusion than that the object was to keep the Nationalists down as far as possible. The two Whig Representatives and the two Tories upon the Commission had put their heads together to cheat and chouse the Nationalists out of the rights to which they were fairly entitled. How did the Government defend their scheme? They threw out the parishes of Learmount, Dungiven, and Moville, and put in their stead from the barony of Coleraine the Protestant parishes of Aghadowey and Desertoghill. He would ask the Government for some explanation upon another point—namely, why it was that they had taken so much of these parishes? Why was it that there were now 3,000 more persons in the South Derry Division than in the North Derry Division? Surely it was not necessary to take so large a portion of these parishes if they only wanted to equalize the population. In the original scheme the number in each division was nearly equal; but now, for the purpose of swamping the Catholics in the barony of Loughinshollin, they took out 3,000 Protestants from the barony of Coleraine. They had had mountains and lakes flung in their faces, compactness, the squareness of the barony, and everything except a frank admission, which, of course, the Government could not with decency make, that the design from first to last was to deprive the Nationalists of their rights by means of fraud and chicanery. He viewed the boundaries now proposed by the Bill with all the more apprehension, because he believed that the Government had made them, although that assertion would, doubtless, be denied, not merely for the purpose of Parliamentary areas, but for the purpose of Local Government arrangements hereafter, so that not merely were the Nationalists to be swindled now, but later on they were to be equally swindled when the areas in connection with the Local Government Boards were formed. Lord Spencer appeared to have pointed out, in his secret instructions to the Commissioners, that these areas would be subsequently used for Local Government purposes; so that not only would the popular Party be swamped at the present moment in the constituencies in connection with the return of Representatives to Parliament, but later on, when the Local Government scheme was on the anvil, the areas now apportioned would be rendered available for cheating the popular Party in the North in the matter of Local Government Boards. He believed that that was really one of the main reasons which had influenced the Government. He would only say, in conclusion, that turn where they might in the case of these counties—

In all other cases in the South of Ireland, in over 90 constituencies, except Dublin, Kerry, and an island in Mayo, no change whatever had been made in the schemes of the Commissioners; but no less than 11 changes had been made in the nine counties of the North of Ireland. There were changes in Down, in Antrim, in Belfast, in Derry, in Tyrone, in Armagh, in Donegal—and only two practically throughout the rest of Ireland—namely, in Dublin and in the county of Kerry. What did it all mean? Could they ever succeed in eradicating from the minds of the popular Party the feeling that they had been choused and cheated, and defrauded of their rights? The boundaries of county after county in Ulster had been changed, and complaint after complaint had been made in that House by those who represented the popular feeling. The Tory Party and the Whig Party had no complaint whatever to make. It was the Nationalists alone, who were not represented on the Commission, who were compelled to stand up in the House of Commons and put forward their claims, and urge their grievances, although they knew beforehand that the compact which existed between the two Front Benches would prevent them from securing their rights or obtaining justice. He trusted that, at any rate, this debate would prove to the people of the North of Ireland that they had nothing to expect in the shape of justice from the Government of Dublin Castle, or from any Commission which Earl Spencer might appoint. They had been cheated once before by the Commission appointed under the Land Act. They were being cheated now by a Commission under the Redistribution Bill. Whatever Commission Lord Spencer appointed, it would be found that he was unable to give a fair and decent representation to the popular or Catholic Party. Every Commissioner was appointed in the Tory or Whig interest; and so long as these divisions lasted they would recall to the popular mind the unfairness, indecency, and fraud of the British Government in Ireland.

Amendment proposed,

In page 101, to leave out from the words "The Baronies of," in line 21, to the word "Shanlongford," in line 35, and insert the words "Barony of North-West Liberties of Londonderry."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan had stated once again what he had said before—that some secret instructions had been given by Lord Spencer to the Boundary Commissioners with regard to the alterations they ought to effect in the original scheme. If so, such instructions were so secret that he himself (Sir Charles W. Dilke) did not know of them. But even beyond that extraordinary secrecy with regard to himself, he was bound to say that Lord Spencer had authorized him to state that nothing of the kind had taken place. The hon. and learned Gentleman had alluded before to the presence at the inquiry of a legal gentleman, who said that he appeared for the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker). That statement was also inaccurate.

MR. HEALY said, that it had appeared in the public Press, where it had gone uncontradicted as having been made by Dr. Todd himself.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had had some communication with the Members for the county of Derry, and they denied that they were in any way represented before the Commissioners. But however that might be, if his hon.

and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland had felt inclined to attend before the Commissioners himself, he would have been altogether justified in doing so. For his own part, he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had been present at the inquiry which took place in regard to his own division; and, as a matter of fact, he had taken an active part in the proceedings.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that occurred in England, and not in Ireland.

MR. HEALY remarked that, while the Liberals were represented upon the Commission, the National Party were not.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would only say what, so far as he was personally concerned, was the fact. He now came to the merits of this particular case. There had been a Paper laid upon the Table of the House, in which the reasons of the Commissioners for making this change in their scheme were submitted. The alterations which had been made in the original scheme had been made in consequence of its being found that the maps, which formed the basis of the original scheme, did not show the physical conformation of the country. There was a range of mountains which ran North and South, and the present scheme followed the geographical arrangements. He did not think it was desirable to carry a division across a mountainous range; and there had been several cases in England where hills much less considerable had been taken into view by the Boundary Commissioners. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Healy) complained that the result of the change had been to make a difference of 3,000 between the population of the Northern and of the Southern Divisions; but the Northern Division would contain three large towns, and it was necessary to allow for an increase of the population in those towns.

MR. HEALY remarked, that Londonderry had a Member already, and was not included in the county divisions.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he only wished to point out that the tendency of the population in the neighbourhood of large towns was to increase; whereas in the rural districts of Ireland the tendency was the other way. Certainly the decrease of population had been much less rapid in the Northern than in the Southern parts of the county. It was said by the hon. and learned Member that the changes had been suggested by the Tory and Liberal agents.

MR. HEALY said, it was the Commissioners themselves who said that.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, it must be borne in mind that additional changes were suggested that were not accepted by the Commissioners. So far as the religious point was concerned, the Protestant population in the county was about 78,500; while the Catholic population was only 57,000, so that it did happen that the Protestant section had a majority in each division.

MR. HEALY said, that that would not have been the case if the first scheme of the Commissioners had been adhered to.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the first scheme was exceptionally objectionable, and the moment it came to be inquired into it became evident that it must be changed.

MR. HEALY said, that the Catholics were always cheated in that way.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE continued. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that no change had been made in other counties; but in three Conservative counties changes had been made, and the reason why changes had been made from the scheme as originally prepared was owing to the evidence given before the Commissioners at the local inquiry. Presumably the present scheme was the best that could be devised. He altogether denied that there had been any intention on the part of the Government or of the Boundary Commissioners to make such a division of the county as would be adverse to either the Catholic or the National Party of Ireland. He must, therefore, oppose the Amendment.

MR. SEXTON said, that some reference had been made to the constitution of the Commission which had prepared the boundaries of the Irish counties. It was proposed, first of all, that these important functions should be entrusted entirely to military officers. He almost thought it might have been better if military officers had been allowed to do the work. Military officers were not, as was sometimes claimed for them, altogether free from political passion; but they usually gained their promotion for military and professional reasons, and if military officers solely had been employed in framing the boundaries, it might have been hoped that there would have been nothing in the character of the work to induce them to plan unfair divisions for the sake of pleasing their employers, or in the hope of obtaining more rapid promotion. As a matter of fact, however, the work of the Boundary Commission in Ireland was confided to three gentlemen, one of whom was a military officer; another an official, who, of course, would like promotion; while the third was a Queen's Counsel, who was not a Government officer now, but who doubtless expected to be one soon. He thought it was a mistake to transfer the work from military officers to civilians, either officials now or officials expectant. When the scheme of the Commissioners was originally proposed the popular Party, unfortunately, went through the ancient and time-honoured, though not very sensible, practice of "holloaing before they were out of the wood." The right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) now stated that no secret instructions were issued by Lord Spencer. Well, there were more ways than one of doing things at Dublin Castle. Of course, it was not necessary for Lord Spencer to put down on paper secret instructions to the Commissioners; but when he (Mr. Sexton) found, as he did find, that the boundaries were drawn in this county, and in other counties in Ireland, not in obedience to the public instructions of the Commissioners, but in contravention of them; when he found that the boundaries were drawn in conformity with some other instruction not included in the public instructions in order to minimize the influence of the Catholic population as much as possible in the Province of Ulster, it was open for him to assume that if Lord Spencer did not convey that desire by secret instructions, at any rate somebody on the part of the Government did convey such an intimation to the Commissioners, or, if not, they were appointed and selected from a conviction in the mind of the Government that they were men of such a complexion as not to need instructions, but that their own power of initiation would be stimulated by a lively sense of favours to come. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) appeared to disclaim

the position asserted for him of having been represented on the inquiry by counsel. He (Mr. Sexton) did not know whether it mattered very much whether the hon. and learned Gentleman was represented by counsel or not. Whether or not he was represented at the Derry inquiry, the hon. and learned Gentleman was in the House that day to represent himself; and he doubted whether the hon. and learned Gentleman, after hearing the statement which had been made, would have the hardihood to get up and say that he was dissatisfied with the division of the county which had been made by the Commissioners. The familiar argument of the maps not showing the configuration of the county had once more been trotted out. Did the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board really expect the Committee to believe, or hope to make them accept the statement, that these three gentlemen, sitting in Dublin, with all the resources of the Valuation Office at their disposal, with all the maps of every county in Ireland which had been taken officially during the last half-century deposited at their elbows—did the right hon. Gentleman mean to tell the Committee that these official gentlemen in Dublin went through the farce of dividing the county of Derry, without knowing from the Ordnance maps, from the geological maps, from the physical maps, and all the maps which had been produced from time to time, what every schoolboy knew, that this range of mountains cut the county from North-West to North-East? There was not an intelligent child of 10 in any National school of Ireland who was not acquainted with that fact, and there was hardly a map hanging on the wall in any school in Ireland which did not clearly show this range of mountains. When the right hon. Gentleman made use of a statement of that kind, he must credit the Irish Members with a degree of credulity which usually ceased in the human mind before a man arrived at the age which would enable him to enter that House. The first remark he (Mr. Sexton) had to make on the scheme of the Commissioners was that it afforded, perhaps, the most striking instance they had of the remarkable, and hitherto unexplained, fact that wherever the Nationalists had agreed to the first scheme of the Commissioners, the Commissioners immediately proceeded to alter it. If the Commissioners had no object, except the ardent performance of their duty, their attitude, wherever the Nationalists were concerned, was certainly most singular. If the National Party objected to a scheme, as they did in many cases, and said they were not satisfied with it, the Commissioners declared at once—"We are not able to satisfy you, but we stand to our scheme, and we will make no attempt to alter it." But if, on the other hand, the Nationalists said—"We think your scheme in a very good one, and we are quite satisfied with it," what did the Commissioners do then? They said at once—"If you are satisfied with our scheme, there must be something wrong in it;" and then they immediately proceeded to ascertain what the Whig and Tory agents had to say in regard to it, ultimately altering the scheme in accordance with the recommendations they received. It would be observed that this particular scheme had been unnecessarily kept back. The Commissioners were appointed in the month of December last year, but they did not produce this scheme until the month of February; and there was a shrewd suspicion in Ireland that the delay on the part of the Commissioners, who were alert enough in completing the other scheme for the Irish counties, was not altogether unconnected with the fact that the county had the honour to be represented in that House by Her Majesty's Solicitor General for Ireland. The Commissioners said the second scheme was more compact than the first. That was a matter that was capable of being judged by the human eye. The first division was marked by a blue line, which ran across the county. That blue line divided the county pretty equally from a point in the West to a point in the East. It left an equal area on both sides of the line. It gave an equal population to either side of the line; it almost left inviolable the well-known areas, and it only separated three or four parishes from a barony in one case. It was a division that was not open to any strong objection. In fact, Mr. O'Doherty, who appeared at the inquiry on behalf of the Nationalist Party, read a statement which had been drawn up at Dunganon on the previous day. That statement was to the effect that the line fixed upon by the Commissioners, which divided the county East and West, met with their approval, and they gave their reasons for that approval. But the moment the Nationalists approved of the scheme, from that moment it was damned in the minds of its authors. The moment the Nationalists expressed their approval of any scheme, the Commissioners went a step further with respect to their scheme, and set about destroying it. In the original scheme of the Commissioners the creeds of the county were fairly divided; the non-Catholics had the Northern Division and the Catholics had the Southern Division; and by that arrangement the Commissioners had met the rough and general demands of justice. As the Committee was aware, the Whigs and Tories did not always agree in Ireland; but lately, in Ulster, they had been tending towards agreement, and the Whig and Tory agents, who appeared in Derry, agreed that the first scheme should be amended by taking four Catholic parishes out of the Southern Division, in order to swamp it with Protestants—both Parties agreed upon that. The next argument, so-called, he had to deal with was in the shape of a range of mountains, with respect to which he would observe that the mountain range was there, but no argument. The right hon. Baronet thought nothing of jumping over a range of mountains in Armagh—he thought nothing of jumping over a range of mountains in Donegal, between Boyleagh and Kilmacrenan. But wherever there was an excrescence on the surface of the earth, were it but the size of an anthill, if it could be used as an argument to weaken the influence of the Catholic Body in Ulster, it immediately assumed the proportions of a range of mountains—but the Himalayas themselves, whenever the matter went the other way, would be diminished in the eyes of the Government. Having thrown the four Catholic parishes into the Northern Division, a number of Protestant parishes were thrown into the Southern Division. The first scheme of the Commissioners had respect to the barony boundaries; but in the second scheme the baronies were cut into pieces. Anyone who compared the two schemes would say that the first was intelligible and reasonable; and he would think that Mr. P. White, in claiming for the second scheme compactness, was guilty of an audacity which had not been manifested in other cases. The Protestant majority in the Southern Division was between 1,000 and 2,000. Considering that the Protestants were better off in the North than the Catholics, it was clear that this county had been jerry-mandered in such a way as not to lose one Protestant vote in the Southern Division, and so as to maintain Protestant ascendancy in the Northern Division. If the Commissioners had any desire to allow fair play as between the two creeds, why had they thrown 2,000 out of their own district? It was clear that the Instructions given to the Commissioners had been thrown aside. The Instructions which the Government had given them, from beginning to end, was the unconfessed but still operative and dominant one—to cut up the county of Londonderry in the manner they liked best; to have no regard to the sympathies of the people, or creeds, or local interests; to jump over mountains and to produce the result that the Catholics should be deprived of their fair proportion of representation, and that the Protestants should be allowed to predominate. It was a pretty scheme, but a contemptible one, and he ventured to doubt that it would be successful. He believed that there would be found a great number of Protestant voters whose sympathies were with the Nationalist Party, and whose interests lay on the side of those reforms which that Party advocated, and which both Whigs and Tories despised. He did not think the Government could assure themselves that any success would result from these discreditable intrigues. He believed that intrigues more mean, more petty, and therefore more repugnant to a manly mind than this had never been engaged in by a Government; and he thought it would be found that as their various schemes for maintaining British Government and suppressing public opinion in Ireland had failed, so this device would prove the least successful of all.

MR. SMALL said, it was strange that this arrangement with regard to the county of Londonderry should have been made. In the case of Armagh, the Southern Division, under any possible arrangement, would go with the Nationalist Party; and it was only with regard to the Mid Division of the county that any doubt existed. The Commissioners, accordingly, took every Protestant district out of that division, and threw them into the Southern Division. But in the case of the county of Londonderry, the Northern Division could not be captured for the Nationalists—it was the Southern Division only with regard to which any doubt existed, and hence the different action of the Commissioners in the two cases. The Commissioners here took a course quite opposite to that which they had pursued in reference to Armagh; in the one case they took the Catholic districts from the South Division, and threw them into the North Division; and in the other they took the Protestant districts out of the North, and threw them into the Southern Division. As the Commissioners had transferred several parishes from the Southern to the Northern Division of the county, it might be interesting to the Committee to know the relative proportion of Protestants to Catholics in those parishes. They contained Catholics to a number which was in the proportion of 50 per cent and 75 per cent of all other denominations. Three of the parishes were possibly the most Catholic in the entire county. Then, with regard to the parishes which the Commissioners had transferred from the North to the South, the position was reversed, the various denominations being enormously in excess of the Catholics; in fact, out of 14,115 Denominationalists there were only 4,773 Catholics. It did, indeed, seem strange that the Commissioners, who were said to be actuated by the best intentions, should have transferred from the Northern to the Southern Division parishes only where there were Protestants enormously in excess of the Catholics; and, on the other hand, that in all the parishes which they had transferred from the Southern to the Northern Division there should be a large majority of Catholics. It seemed to him that the Nationalists were fairly entitled to one seat at least for the county. By the Census of 1881 the Catholics formed 45 per cent of the entire population; and they knew that amongst the rest of the population there were as many Nationalists as amongst the Catholic Body. The Nationalists of to-day must, in his (Mr. Sexton's) opinion, form one-half of the entire population of the county; and he said that if there were to be two seats for the county, and the two Parties were balanced, it would have been only fair for the Commissioners to have made such a division as would leave one Member to the Nationalist and one Member to the non-Nationalist Body, rather than to give two Members to the non-Nationalists and none at all to the Nationalist Body. The Bill said that the North-West Liberties of Londonderry, except so much as is comprised in the Parliamentary borough of Londonderry, was to be included in the North-West Division, and the barony of Tikeeran, also, except so much as is comprised in the Parliamentary borough of Londonderry. Now, it appeared from this that the Parliamentary borough of Londonderry was not to be included for any purpose whatever in either of the divisions of the county of Londonderry; and that being so, he would ask the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland what he meant to do with the freeholders who voted in the City of Londonderry? Were they to be disfranchised? Because that would be the effect of the scheme as now framed by the Commissioners. Possibly the hon. and learned Gentleman would get up and say that the freeholders would vote in the City of Derry; but that was not the case, because if the freeholders were not enfranchised in the City of Derry, and if they were excluded from all the divisions of the county, they would not be allowed to vote either in the county or the city. He did not know whether the freeholders in question would be friendly to the hon. and learned Gentleman; but he rather thought that at the next General Election it would be found that they were not so on account of the way they had been treated in this matter; at any rate, the effect of the Schedule would be to disfranchise them. The hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had pointed out that the barony of Loughinshollin was entirely a Catholic barony. That was the case, and it was also true of the adjoining baronies of Tikeeran and Kennaught. Other matters being equal, would it not have been fairer for the Commissioners to have joined the Catholic parishes to the Catholic baronies rather than joining them to Coleraine, and thus uniting Catholics with men who were alien to them in interest and religious feeling. Many meetings had been held, and the people of Loughinshollin had unanimously protested against the scheme which joined them to the uncongenial inhabitants of Coleraine, rather than to those with whom they had sympathy of feeling and community of interest in the baronies of Kennaught and Tikeeran. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had endeavoured to prove that the revised scheme was better than the first scheme, as there was a chain of mountains between the two baronies; but was the right hon. Baronet aware that there was also a considerable chain of mountains between the barony of Loughinshollin and the places in Coleraine which it was, by the present Amendment, proposed to join to the other division? He could assure the right hon. Baronet that the mountains in the one case were as considerable as those in the other. But supposing that the obstacles between the two baronies were not so great, he would point out that there were other barriers of a far more serious character between the barony of Coleraine and the barony of Loughinshollin. He thought the Commissioners might have taken into consideration, as between the two baronies, the entire absence of intercourse, community of interest, and religious feeling. He trusted, therefore, that this scheme would not be agreed to by the Committee; but if it were, and notwithstanding that the Catholics in the county had been placed in a considerable minority, they would still be able to give a very good account of themselves; and when the next General Election took place it would, he thought, be seen by the Commissioners and the Treasury Bench that they might as well have left the people of the district in question where they wished to remain, and not have joined them with people they did not want to be associated with for the purpose of this Bill. Having proposed reasonable Amendments to the Government scheme in the case of Armagh, Donegal, and Londonderry without success, he and his hon. Friends would look with concern to the course the Government would take in respect of Ulster, in order to see whether any concession would be made to them when the name of that county was reached in the Schedule.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he did not know why he should speak on this question at all, and he should not have done so were it not for the manner in which the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had used his name—that was to say, as if he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) were to blame for the arrangement made by the Commissioners in respect of the county of Londonderry. The hon. and learned Member said he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) appeared by counsel before the Commissioners. But no counsel appeared before the Commissioners at all, and that statement of the hon. and learned Member had been met when the general question was before the Committee. He decided to take no part in the inquiry at the time, and had not appeared there directly or indirectly. But the agent of the Liberal Party in Londonderry had written to him on the subject, and his Colleague in the representation and himself had instructed him that they “did not think that we should interfere or take any part in the inquiry.” That contradicted the statement that he had, either one way or the other, taken part in this matter. He did not know what scheme was proposed; he had not appeared, and he had instructed no counsel or solicitor to appear for him; and this arrangement with regard to Londonderry was not made at his suggestion. Of course, what he was saying did not touch the merits of the scheme which hon. Gentlemen opposite had discussed; but as regarded that scheme he would say that he thought it better it should have been made, because, in his opinion, the original scheme was wholly unsupportable from a geographical point of view, inasmuch as it did detach baronies and interfere with the compactness of the divisions, and put a range of mountains between the two baronies, as his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had stated. He believed that a proper division of the county had been made, and he should be going out of his way if he were to appear in that House to join with hon. Members opposite in condemning it. With regard to Mr. Piers White, everyone knew that he was a man of honour and integrity; and he would say, in conclusion, with respect to the scheme of the Boundary Commissioners, that he believed it was properly made; at any rate, he was prepared to acquiesce in it.

Mr. Small

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) was well known as a dexterous counsel, and he had proved his title to that reputation on this occasion by the defence he had just made. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said that Dr. Todd did not appear for the Liberal Party for Derry; but he had not sat down without saying that Dr. Todd represented the Liberal Party, for he had said that he had represented him, the Solicitor General for Ireland. As Louis XIV. said—" L'état c'est moi," so the hon. and learned Gentleman might say under these circumstances—"I am the Liberal Party." The distinction the hon. and learned Gentleman sought to draw between Dr. Todd representing him and representing the Liberal Party was about as remarkable as the statement that counsel had not appeared, but only a solicitor. When the hon. and learned Gentleman had thought it necessary and proper to correct the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) upon the small fact that it was a solicitor and not a barrister that had appeared, he must have been very hard up indeed for an argument with which to defend his position. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did not, generally speaking, deny the right of a Member of the Government to take part in the settlement of these matters. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had told them how, in his constituency, he had appeared and had justified, as he was entitled to justify, his action in the matter; but he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had ventured to interject that the right hon. Gentleman was speaking of England, while they were speaking of Ireland, and that the action of officials in England differed entirely from the action of officials in Ireland. The two things might be called by the same name; but they were, as a matter of fact, very different things indeed. Everyone knew that the official hierarchy in Ireland were able to exercise the pressure upon all proceedings in their country, judicial and otherwise, which officials could not exercise in England; and if he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had not been called to Order by a recent decree in the House for stating that such a thing was possible as a partizan Judge, he should say that even the Judges in Ireland were at the beck and call of the Executive Government. What did the hon. and learned Gentleman say in defence of this proposal? He professed to be shocked at the Irish Members bringing the question of religious creed into this matter. But, unfortunately, religion marked political differences in the North and in other parts of that country. He was sorry to say it, but such was the case. He hoped that the fact that religion did mark political differences would gradually disappear, and that there would be other divisions of opinion in Ireland in future than those marked out by Catholicism and Protestantism. But they must take things as they were, and unquestionably they could only tell a man's politics in Ireland from the religious creed he professed. It was not the members of the National Party in that House who had introduced this question of religious difference at all. Their whole effort and aim, in the course of the struggle they had been engaged in during the last four or five years in Ireland, had been to drive sectarian differences from the platforms, and nowhere had they made more strained and consistent efforts than in the sacred conclaves of the Churches. He thought that by this time they would have succeeded in welding men of different religious creeds into one political society, if it had not been for the malignant, and he was afraid he must say shameful, effort on the part of the Conservative Party in the North of Ireland to revive the dying and almost dead sectarian spirit in that part of the country. Therefore, no one would misunderstand him when he spoke of the difference of religious creeds being one of the elements at work in this matter. He hoped that, in spite of the fact that the Boundary Commissioners had thrown Catholics into Protestant divisions, and Protestants into Catholic divisions, for the benefit of Whigs and Tories, the only effect would be to draw to the Nationalists a considerable section of those who professed the Protestant religion. Several matters had been alluded to in the course of a discussion with regard to which he would like to say a word. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had said that the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had stated that there were secret instructions issued by Lord Spencer to the Boundary Commissioners, and that the Lord Lieutenant had sedulously denied that statement. Well, his (Mr. T. P. O'Connor's) reply was that there was no necessity for issuing any instructions, either open or secret, to such Boundary Commissioners as had been appointed by Dublin Castle. Lord Spencer knew very well, when he selected the four gentlemen he did select, that there was no necessity on his part for preparing any instructions. He was perfectly sure that they would do the work of Dublin Castle without even a nod or a wink from him, or from anyone else in the Government. What was the character of these four gentlemen? He was not going to say anything about them personally, for he had no doubt that they were gentlemen of very high character indeed. But what he wished someone on the Treasury Bench to answer was this—Was it proper that in the appointments made representatives of the vast majority of the Irish people should be carefully excluded? Supposing they had been dealing with the case of England, and that the Commissioners had all been selected from the Conservative Party, would they not have had a howl from the Liberal Members of the House? Or, supposing all the Commissioners had been selected from the Liberal Party, would there not have been a howl from the Conservatives? Well, in Ireland the Nationalists outnumbered all other Parties in a way in which the Liberals could not claim to outnumber the Conservatives in England, or the Conservatives claim to outnumber the Liberals. The appointment of Boundary Commissioners in Ireland, as a matter of fact, seemed to have been regulated on the extraordinary principle that the only political Party which should not be represented should be the political Party representing three-fourths of the people of the country. When they heard the melancholy lay of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) on this question, he supposed they would be told that the Boundary Commissioners in Ireland were not selected for a political purpose. The right hon. Gentleman might say that; but the Irish Members would reserve to themselves perfect liberty of action as to the amount of credence they might think it necessary to give to the statement.' These gentlemen were selected because they did not profess certain political principles. They might not have been selected because they were Whigs, or they might not have been selected because they were Tories; but they certainly were selected because they were not Nationalists. Who were these gentlemen? Well, two of them were Engineer officers, he believed, and he would grant for the sake of argument that they had no pronounced political opinions. But what did an Irish Nationalist mean to an Engineer officer? Why, every Parnellite meant to such an individual a rebel. Every Nationalist in Ireland was a rebel—everyone who dared to follow the lead of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was to an Engineer officer that which he was to the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton)—that was to say, a person who had more or less trampled on the Oath of Allegiance. As a matter of fact, Engineer officers did not require any instructions from the Lord Lieutenant at all; their duty, as they would interpret it, to the Queen and the State, was to do everything they could to put down what they would call the Party of Disloyalty and Disorder in Ireland. Who were the other two Commissioners? Why, there was Mr. Bourke, an Inspector of the Local Government Board, and to Government officials, as well as to Engineer officers, of course a Parnellite was a rebel. Mr. Bourke could, of course, be depended upon for doing what he could to weaken the Party of Disorder without instructions from the Lord Lieutenant. Then there was Mr. Piers White, who might be called the pièce de résistance in this matter. The moment the Irish Members raised any objection to the Boundary Commissioners, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, both got up in the most solemn and serious manner and declared that Mr. Piers White was a Roman Catholic gentleman, as if the Irish Members did not know that some of the bitterest and worst enemies of Ireland and her national rights were respectable Roman Catholic gentlemen. Why, if there were no respectable Roman Catholic gentlemen in Ireland—

if there were no bad Irishmen, they would have settled the Irish Question to their satisfaction long ago. What was Mr. Piers White? An eminent lawyer, no doubt; a Queen's Counsel, a man who had, he believed, a very large practice at the Bar. In fact, one of the last occasions on which he had seen the learned gentleman was as leader—he might say as bare leader—to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) in a case in which he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) himself had some interest, and nothing could exceed the discretion and ability with which Mr. Piers White conducted his case. So eminent was Mr. Piers Whyte that he performed the same function to the Government in Ireland as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) was once reported to perform to the Government in general—that was to say, he acted as maid of all work. He got all the jobs which were going which could not be attended to by the Law Officers of the Crown. Mr. Piers White, amongst other things given him to do, had been sent down to Derry on a previous occasion, and his action there was such as ought to have incapacitated him in the eyes of every impartial man from ever going within 50 miles of any disputed matter in Derry again. What did he do on that occasion? There had been a riot in Derry—a most unprovoked and shameful riot. Because the then Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Dawson) had ventured to lecture to his co-religionists and brother politicians, he was sat upon by the Protestant Orangemen. This respectable Irish gentleman was sent down to inquire into the matter, and he had given all the merit to the Orange Tory mob, and had thrown all the blame upon his co-religionists. In his Report the learned gentleman said—"Mr. O'Donnell, solicitor, and others represented the Nationalists;" and he put the word Nationalists in inverted commas, after the style affected by The Dublin Daily Express. He acted under the delusion that those who called themselves Nationalists could only be described with the shameful and sarcastic addition of inverted commas. Mr. Piers White was, in fact, as anti-National as anyone in the House could possibly be. The triumph of the National Party was just as obnoxious to Mr. Piers White as it was to the right hon. and learned Gentlemen who represented the Irish Conservative Party on the Front Opposition Bench at the present moment (Mr. Gibson and Mr. Plunket)—in fact, Mr. Piers White belonged to the class of gentlemen who could never forget their Party, because they had been banished for ever from the political platforms of Ireland and from that House. In fact, he was sure Mr. Piers White would greatly prefer the time when an Irish constituency and seat in that House was the path of the dirt of corruption, and of treason to the dignity of the Judicial Bench. What had been the effect of the operations of the Boundary Commissioners on the city of Derry? Why, to disportion, or very much diminish, the chances of the Catholics of the place finding a Representative in that House. He agreed with the remarks of the hon. Member for Wexford County (Mr. Small) in the able speech he had made on this question. The hon. Member was an Ulster Catholic himself, and could speak with feeling upon this question. He had spoken of the cruelty of separating the Catholics of three parishes from their co-religionists in the barony. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) had talked of the barrier of a mountain; but the hon. Member for Wexford County (Mr. Small) had very properly said there were barriers far more impassable and far more insurmountable in Derry and other parts of the North of Ireland than barriers of that kind. Did the inhabitants of these three parishes, whose convenience, forsooth, had been so consulted, object to be thrown in with their co-religionists on the other side of this mountain? Did they make any representation of the inconvenience that the mountain would cause them in going to the polling booth? Were they not, on the contrary, all protesting as one voice against being thrown in with men of a different creed to themselves? The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had reminded him (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) that these people could have a temporary polling booth constructed for them on one side of the mountain, and that was perfectly true. But the barrier was not the mountain in that part of Ireland. The barrier was one of religious dissension and consequent political differences. He thought that in this matter the action of the Boundary Commissioners had been something horribly cruel. He did not envy those hon. Members who would have to fight the Ulster constituencies. He certainly should not go through a contest in any of these places if he could possibly avoid it. Those who had the small, but disagreeable, experience that he had had on one occasion, marching, as he did, between two companies of soldiers and a large body of police drawn up at the railway station amidst a shower bath of bricks, would know that an election in the North of Ireland was about as ugly a business as any political man could be called upon to face. But in the future what would be the state of things when the Catholics, instead of being left alone, would be mixed up in this way with Protestants? If the Catholics had been congregated into one district, elections would have taken place in peace and quietness; but now there would be every incentive and stimulus to horrible political excitement, and a terrible disproportion would be established between the Catholics and the Protestants in the North of Derry. He did not exaggerate when he said that the lives of the Catholics would scarcely be safe. He did not know how the Government would be able to cope with the difficulty, although, of course, it would be their duty to protect those who were likely to suffer. An hon. Friend of his suggested that they would have to add an additional sum to the Vote in order to meet the expenses of the police. On the present occasion, he thought the Irish Members had made as reasonable a demand as had been made during the whole discussion of this question of the Seats Bill. The proceedings of the Boundary Commissioners had been most unjust and unfair; they had acted in the interests of the so-called Loyal Party in Ireland. One would have thought that by this time the Government of this country and all English Parties would have become alive to the fact that injustice was the best way to compel and extend a spirit of disloyalty amongst the Irish people. The only hope of the Irish Members was that their protest, even if it were futile so far as that Assembly was concerned, would be heard and attended to outside, and that it would give every true Nationalist in Derry, and in other parts of Ireland, another argument in favour of putting an end to the revolting system by which Irish rights were at the mercy of English jerrymandering and trickery.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, it was, perhaps, useless to prolong the discussion—no good result seemed likely to be derived from it. They were appealing here to no tribunal. They had no verdict to expect from the Assembly on this question; because, as he had said on a previous occasion, the matter was one which had been already squared and settled between the two chief Parties in that House. The question they were now debating was a foregone conclusion, and nothing that hon. Members on those (the Irish) Benches could say would tend to alter it in the slightest degree. Nevertheless, they felt it their duty to make their protest against the arrangements which had been made in Ireland by the Boundary Commissioners, which the Irish Members, and he trusted the Committee, now knew were exceedingly unfair and dishonest to the National Party in that country. It was impossible for any impartial man, English or Irish, who had paid the slightest attention to the course of this discussion, not to see that in the North of Ireland, when the Commissioners reached debateable ground, they accepted the proposals of, and gave heed to, the arguments and representations put before them by the anti-National Party, and entirely disregarded the representations and claims of the National Party. The evidence upon that point was conclusive. How was it possible that the anti-National Party could be right in every one of their proposals?—and yet in every case their views had been acceded to. One could understand it if, in laying their cases before a fair tribunal, two or three or four decisions were given in their favour, and here and there others were given against them; but in these cases hon. Members were face to face with the remarkable fact that in every instance, with scarcely an exception, the claims of the anti-National Party had been accepted by the Commissioners, while the claims and pleadings of the National Party had been given to the winds. Not only was that the case, but, as had been already stated in the Committee, whenever the Nationalists objected to the schemes of the Commissioners, or to the schemes of the Tory Party, their objections went for nothing. Whenever the Nationalists had agreed with the Commissioners' schemes, and had said they would take no action in the matter—whenever the representatives of the National Party, in reply to the question—"Do you think this is a fair arrangement?" said—"We could wish for something a little better, but we do not expect to have everything exactly as we wish it, and therefore we do not object"—did they think the Commissioners had acted upon their own suggestion? Not they. Directly the Nationalists took up that course of action and seemed to be satisfied with the arrangement, the Commissioners appeared to lose confidence in their original scheme, and at once proceeded to alter it. These were plain and patent facts, and the conclusion to which they pointed must be obvious to every Member of the Committee. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland was an able lawyer and knew the value of evidence. Right well he knew the value of the evidence produced in this debate by the Nationalist Members. He knew that it was irresistible. He knew that if he had such strong evidence in every case in which he was engaged in Ireland for the Crown he would be able invariably to secure a conviction. Aye, on evidence less cogent and conclusive than that produced by the Nationalists in these cases, men had been hung in Ireland. But they had further proof of the fact that the Orange or anti-National Party in the North of Ireland had been unfairly benefited by the revised schemes of the Commissioners. Her Majesty's Government had been charged with a desire to make peace with their enemies and opponents in various parts of the world. They had made peace with the Boers, and they were now going to scuttle out of the Soudan. But they had done more than that; they had made peace with the Orangemen of the North of Ireland. There was not a word or a whisper against the scheme of the Boundary Commissioners in the North of Ireland, for the reason that the anti-Nationalists had got all they claimed. The Government, through their Commissioners, had made a complete surrender to this Party, and in this way peace had been purchased from the anti-National Party and the Orange and Emergency men of the North; but they had yet to learn whether the peace of Ireland would be promoted by the surrender to this Party. For himself, he did not think it would. He was of opinion that, by these unfair arrangements, a fund of trouble had been stored up both for Ireland and for England too. The arrangements, he felt convinced, would lead to the continuation of strife and heartburnings, because the consciousness was in the minds of the National Party that they had been unjustly treated, and that the divisions had been made without right and justice in consequence of the partizanship and political bigotry of the Commissioners appointed to deal with the matter. A good deal had been said about Catholics and Protestants; but he wished to say, and he believed the Committee recognized the fact, that the Irish Members had really no sectarian feeling in the matter at all. This was not a question of creed. The Irish Members merely asked for political justice and fair play in these arrangements, and they had not got it. Still they meant to fight a good battle for their rights in the North of Ireland, and it appeared to him that by-and-bye they would prove triumphant. However that might be, he was sure that the interests of justice and public peace and content would have been greatly advanced if the Commissioners had acted in an upright, honest, and impartial manner, instead of making a surrender to the advantage of one Party and to the disadvantage of the other.

Mr. BIGGAR said, there was a Dr. Todd, a member of the Irish Bar, and a Mr. Todd, a solicitor, and therefore it was very easy for the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) to have confused one with the other. Now, the letter which was referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) did not faithfully represent the facts of the case as far as Mr. Todd was concerned. He (Mr. Biggar) knew very little of Mr. Todd; but this he did know—that Mr. Todd had not obtained in Derry a reputation for truthfulness. It was generally accepted that Mr. Todd's word was not to be believed. Certainly, the letter which he had written, and which the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland had referred to, did not coincide with what Mr. Todd stated at the inquiry in Derry before Mr. White. Mr.

Todd stated at the inquiry that he appeared for the Liberal Party, and that he had a letter from Sir Thomas M'Clure and one from the Solicitor General for Ireland, and both those Gentlemen expressed themselves dissatisfied with the scheme propounded by the Commissioners, but they approved of the scheme which he (Mr. Todd) proposed on behalf of the Liberal Party. The proposition made by Mr. Todd was that the county, instead of being divided into North and South Derry, as proposed by the Boundary Commissioners, should be divided into East and West Derry. One of the points which Mr. Todd pressed upon the Commissioner, Mr. White, was that there was great community of interest between those who lived on the Eastern side of the county of Derry. Mr. Hunter, a wholesale grocer from Coleraine, was called to show that he was selling goods so far South as the town of Maghera, which was in the Southern part of the county. If Mr. Hunter's evidence was of any value at all, it had a closer connection with the towns of Kilrea and Garvagh, which were now placed in the Southern Division of the county. The tendency of Mr. Hunter's trade must be towards Coleraine. He (Mr. Biggar) knew quite well that the produce of Kilrea and Garvagh—two places which had been changed from the Northern to the Southern Division of the county—was taken to Coleraine and not to Belfast. There was no community of interest with these places and the Southern part of the county such as there should be if community of interest was the ground upon which the scheme was propounded. Evidence was given by parties who lived on each side of the mountain range near to the town of Dungivan to show that the connection was very strong between the inhabitants of the two sides of the range. He was not disposed, however, to press that point too strongly on the Committee; but what he did maintain was that the proposition to take from the barony of Coleraine the part which laid North of the town of Kilrea was a most reasonable one. The argument of the Government that the Southern Division of Derry should have a larger population than the Northern part, because of the possible or probable increase of the population of the town of Coleraine and the city of Derry, was quite untenable.

The increase in the population of the city of Derry could never have any influence on the voting power of the county proper, for the very reason that the liberties of Derry extended far beyond the city walls. That part of the argument, therefore, had no weight whatever, and was not entitled to any consideration. Then, with regard to the expected increase in the population of the town of Coleraine. One of the arguments adduced by the hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce) in favour of Coleraine being allowed to retain its Member, was that Coleraine was an ancient town. It was said that this ancient town was likely to increase its population by 3,000 within a very limited time. Now, the present population was only 7,000; so that at the rate of progress in times past they would have to wait for very many generations before the population reached 10,000. Reference had been made by some of his hon. Friends to the fact that Mr. White, the Commissioner who held the inquiry in Derry, was a Catholic in religion. He (Mr. Biggar) did not like to mention questions of religion, because he believed that, in time to come, a large proportion of the non-Catholics would vote with the Catholic Nationalists. But he was informed on very good authority that this Mr. White, who was sent down by the Government to act as their agent in Derry, went over to the Conservative agent at Kingstown in 1883, and made a perfectly bogus claim to a vote—a claim which was refused by the Revising Barrister. He (Mr. Biggar) thought that the Government, when they were making selections of gentlemen to represent them, should select gentlemen of a higher character for integrity than Mr. White seemed to possess. Taking all the circumstances into account, the Government ought to amend the scheme to such an extent as would bring the populations of the Northern and Southern Divisions more alike. By the original scheme of the Boundary Commissioners there was a very fair equalization of population between the Northern and Southern parts of the county; indeed, he was disposed to regard the original divisions as impartial and honest. The divisions as finally arranged were partial and dishonest, and could not be defended in reason by anyone. Even if the divisions were altered as suggested, he believed that in both divisions there would be, according to present expectations, a majority against the popular Party; but then the divisions would be honest and reasonable, and capable of being defended. As far as compactness or any argument of that sort was concerned, the present scheme was perfectly outrageous. The Government ought to agree to a more compact and reasonable scheme, and one more in conformity with the Instructions to the Commissioners.

MR. KENNY said, he thought that the attitude of the Government in the case of Derry was extremely unreasonable. The divisions of Derry were entirely at variance with local opinion. It was contended, in support of the scheme, that the Commissioners had been forced to follow the natural boundaries of the county. It was perfectly true, as stated by the Boundary Commissioners, that they had had regard to the fact that a range of mountains naturally divided the two divisions. But there was this to be said in reply to such a contention, that, no matter in what direction they adopted boundaries in Derry, they would have to follow more or less some range of mountains, because mountains were so numerous; no matter what course was pursued, a range of mountains might be used for the purpose of making what would be called a natural division. If the contention of the Boundary Commissioners was worth anything at all, they should, instead of running the line of demarcation Eastwards, have pursued a line further Northwards. They would then have obtained two perfectly compact divisions. Furthermore, although the Commissioners were instructed to observe as far as possible the ancient divisions of counties, they had, in the case of the county of Londonderry, set those divisions entirely aside. He could not understand how the Boundary Commissioners believed that the scheme they had proposed would command anything like general consent, for they had adopted lines which were utterly at variance with anything which would make it possible for the divisions to be considered compact. As to the names of the divisions, they were forced, owing to the lines of division pursued by the Boundary Commissioners in Ulster, to use the terms North-West Londonderry and North-East Londonderry. If, however, the divisions had been made properly in accordance with the points of the compass, the names North or South or East or West Londonderry might have been used. It was perfectly clear that, owing to the peculiar position of Parties in the county, the lines pursued by the Commissioners were dictated more by political expediency than by any real regard to the Instructions issued to them by the Lord Lieutenant. Under the original scheme, it was very probable that for the Southern part of the county a Nationalist would have been returned. As soon as this was observed by the Whigs and Tories, the boundaries were altered so that the Nationalist element in the South should be split up. So strong were the Nationalists in Londonderry, that they were fully entitled to return one of the Members. The Government would do well to accept the Amendment, which he would support if his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Healy) carried it to a division.

MR. SMALL asked if it was not the fact that, owing to the new arrangements, the freeholders would be disfranchised for the city of Derry?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he thought the freeholders would vote in the city as borough voters.

MR. SMALL said, that if the right hon. Baronet would refer to the Return presented in 1883, he would find he was quite in error. The city of Derry was not a county in itself, as the right hon. Baronet seemed to imagine.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he was much obliged to the hon. Gentleman for mentioning the matter. He would make inquiries on the subject, and promise the hon. Member that the matter should be set right if a mistake had been made.

MR. HEALY said, that this was a very important point; because, if the freeholders were to be thrown into the county from the borough, a re-arrangement of the scheme of the Commissioners would be necessitated. It was impossible to let the matter stand as it was, for 300 or 400 people would be thrown into the county. They had, in this fact, a good reason for referring the entire scheme to the Commissioners, and he thought he and his hon. Friends must press the right hon. Baronet to promise them that the whole question should be referred back to the Commissioners. This was not a trifling matter. A mistake had been made, and strange to say in the county for which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) was Member. It was proper to assume that the voters thrown into the county would be Tories, and it would be very interesting to discover why the Commissioners had made the mistake. The right hon. Baronet had got a precedent in the case of Southwark, for referring the scheme back to the Commissioners.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would undertake to make immediate inquiries into the matter.

MR. HEALY said, that the chief point involved was that the voters thrown into the county would unquestionably be Tories.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked if the allegation of the hon. and learned Gentleman was that the Boundary Commissioners had purposely made a mistake?

MR. HEALY said, he did not make such an allegation; but what he did maintain was that these voters, who were all Tories, would be disfranchised for the city of Derry. That was, no doubt, a very convenient thing for the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), who was the Member for the county. When the Nationalists had been cheated by dodges, as they had been in Donegal, Tyrone, Armagh, Derry, Belfast, and Antrim, there was no reason why they should be chary in giving their opinion. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had hardly met the matter fairly; he stated he would look into the matter. That was not the way he met the case of the borough of Southwark. In that case he ordered a fresh inquiry. Surely, the people of Derry were quite as much entitled to a fresh inquiry as the people of Southwark.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that if the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Healy) preferred it, he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would ask Sir John Lambert and Sir Francis Sandford to reconsider the matter and report upon it.

MR. HEALY said, there was an excess population in the division of 3,000, and there was no reason in the world why the figures should not be correct. The borough of Londonderry had increased; but as far as he could see the borough of Coleraine had not; if the population of Coleraine had increased, it had not done so by more than a score in the course of 10 years. Why should this fictitious reverence of the borough of Londonderry influence the Government? The overplus of 3,000 made a vast difference, and he appealed to the Government to bring about a balance of population.

MR. SMALL said, the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had expressed his readiness to reconsider the matter. That he should have time to do so, he (Mr. Small) begged to move that the Chairman should now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Small.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I will make every possible inquiry, and if I can remedy the mistake, supposing one to have been made, I will be happy to do so.

Question put.

The Committee proceeded to a Division, and the Chairman stated that he thought the Noes had it, and, his decision being challenged, he directed the Ayes to stand up in their places; and 17 Members only having stood up, he declared the Noes had it.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

MR. HEALY said, the incident which had just occurred formed an admirable example of the way in which the Bill had been got up. The Commissioner when he went down to Derry alleged, as a reason for putting 3,000 more people into one division than into another, that the city of Londonderry would act as a counterpoise; and yet it had been shown that it was not included in the division, and that the freeholders of the city of Londonderry were excluded from the Bill altogether and deprived of their votes. The Irish Members, in calling attention to the shortcomings of the measure, were met in Committee by no single shred or scrap of reason for anything that had been done. And it had further been pointed out that the scheme for the two divisions of the county of Londonderry was among the last issued by the Commissioners, and that it carried out, upon the face of it, the same principle of chicanery which had guided the House of Commons all through. Of course, the Irish Members were powerless in that House; and when they moved to report Progress in order to afford time for further consideration, the New Rules, for the first time since they had been passed, were put in force against them in Committee, and they were called upon to stand up in their places. That was an example of the way in which important Irish questions were always treated. The Irish Members were blocked and stopped by the Government and their majority in all their endeavours to obtain justice; but, at all events, they had convicted the Government and the gentleman deputed to conduct the Boundary Inquiry at Derry, not only of malignity, but of a conspiracy to deprive the Nationalist Party of their rights. They had also shown that so far as the Commissioner himself was concerned, he was in absolute ignorance of everything he professed to know so much about.

Mr. Healy

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 59; Noes 17: Majority 42. — (Div. List, No. 116.)

On the Motion of Mr. SEXTON, the following Amendment made:—In page 102, line 1, leave out "North."

On the Motion of Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, the following Amendment made:—In page 102, at end of line 13, leave out "and."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in moving, in line 14, after "Street," to insert—

"And in the parish of Clonbroney the townlands of Rinvanny and Cartronreagh, and in the parish of Grannard the townland of Castle-nugent," explained that the object of the Amendment was to place in the Schedule three small townlands which had been omitted in the North Longford Division.

Amendment proposed,

In page 102, line 14, after "Street," insert "and in the parish of Clonbroney the townlands of Rinvanny and Cartronreagh, and in the parish of Grannard the townland of Castle-nugent."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. SEXTON asked if the Amendment would alter the scheme?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE replied in the negative. At present, these townlands were entirely omitted.

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

On the Motion of Mr. CALLAN, the following Amendment made:—In page 102, leave out, in line 21, the words "The Dundalk Division," and insert the words "North Louth."

Mr. CALLAN proposed an Amendment, in the North Louth Division, to insert, after "Lower Dundalk," "and the parish of Killaney, and that part of the parish of Louth included in the barony of Ardee." He said he did not anticipate any opposition on the part of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill. It was not a matter which affected Party politics in the slightest degree. He saw that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) had been speaking to the President of the Local Government Board, and he presumed that it was in reference to this Amendment. He could, however, assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that his proposal would make no difference as to the state of Parties in the county, and that, however they might jerrymander and twist and turn the county of Louth, the result would be just the same.

MR. PLUNKET said, the hon. Member (Mr. Callan) was under a misapprehension. He had not been speaking to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board in reference to this question at all.

MR. CALLAN said, he was glad to find that his suspicion was unfounded; but he might add that no amount of jerrymandering to which the division could be subjected would prevent the return of Nationalist Members for the county of Louth, and his proposal only affected a matter which was deemed to be for the convenience of the inhabitants of the district. If hon. Members would look at the map, they would see that the parish of Killaney was 27 miles from the town of Drogheda, and only eight from the town of Dundalk, and he might almost offer a reward of £5 for every Killaney man who had ever been found in the town of Drogheda, without ever being called upon to pay the money. No Killaney man was ever found there, except, perhaps, on a fair day. He made this proposal simply on the ground of convenience to the people of Killaney, who were separated from Drogheda by a river, and if a man wished to go to Drogheda from Killaney, he would in the first place have to travel for some miles through the county of Monaghan. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would accept the proposition, and would refer this point back to the Boundary Commissioners, in order that they might make report to him simply how the question stood as a matter of convenience to the people of the locality. He had no intention of pressing the Amendment now; but he would be prepared to accept the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman that the matter would be referred to the Commissioners. In return, he would assure the right hon. Gentleman that the proposal had nothing of a jerrymandering nature about it, but simply related to a matter of convenience.

Amendment proposed,

In page 102, after line 27, to insert "And the parish of Killaney, and that part of the parish of Louth included in the barony of Ardee."—(Mr. Callan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he accepted the representation of the hon. Member (Mr. Callan). So far as he could find out there was no objection whatever to the change. The district proposed to be added to the North Division was in the Northern part of the county, in the barony of Ardee; and, no doubt, the Amendment would give a clearer and a more compact boundary. The figures also would be left pretty nearly as they now were. That being so, he would be very glad to refer the matter to the Boundary Commissioners, and if the hon. Member would move his Amendment on the Report, he would have no objection to it.

MR. CALLAN intimated that he would withdraw the Amendment on the assurance just given that it would be referred to the Boundary Commissioners, and would be accepted if it were not considered by them to be objectionable.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of MR. CALLAN, the following Amendment made:—In page 103, line 1, leave out the words "The Drogheda Division," and insert "South Louth."

On the Motion of MR. KENNY, the following Amendments made:—In page 103, line 8, leave out "The," and after the word "Mayo," "Division;" in line 13, leave out "The," and after the word "Mayo," "Division;" in line 18, leave out "The," and after the word "Mayo," "Division;" and in line 23, leave out "The," and after the word "Mayo," "Division."

On the Motion of MR. SMALL, the following Amendments made:—In page 104, line 4, leave out "The," and after the word "Meath," leave out "Division;" in line 12, leave out "The," and after the word "Meath," leave out "Division;" and in line 25, leave out "The," and after the word "Monaghan," leave out "Division."

Amendment proposed,

"In page 104, line 28, to leave out the words 'The South Monaghan Division,' in order to insert the words 'South Monaghan,'—(Mr. Small,)—instead thereof.

Question, "That the words 'The South Monaghan Division' stand part of the Schedule," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the words 'South Monaghan' be there inserted."

MR. WARTON said, that before the Amendment was agreed to, he wished to ask the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) what the effect of the Amendment would be? Would it not still be necessary to describe the division, when a new Writ was issued, as "The Southern Division of the county of Monaghan," so that it could not be strictly called "East" or "South?"

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that it was intended to insert a clause on the Report to explain this and other matters. For instance, in the case of Tullamore, it would be necessary, upon the Report, to show that that was one of the divisions of King's County.

MR. SEXTON said, there was no barony of Tullamore, and it would be impossible to call a Member by that name; but it might be convenient to call him the Member for the Tullamore Division of King's County. In regard to the objection which had been taken by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), he saw no force in it. In this county there would be two divisions, "North" and "South," and two Members.

MR. WARTON said, he spoke of the full title which it would be necessary to give in moving a new Writ. He was not speaking of the name which would have to be given to a Member from the Speaker's Chair.

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. LALOR moved, in Queen's County, to describe "the Upper Ossory Division" as "Ossory" only.

Amendment proposed,

In page 105, line 4, leave out the words "The Upper Ossory Division," in order to insert the word "Ossory,"—(Mr. Lalor,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'The Upper Ossory Division' stand part of the Schedule."

MR. WARTON asked what was the ground for this Amendment? He did not profess to have a very intimate acquaintance with Ireland; but he always understood that Upper Ossory was a well-known place, and that it was known by that name in order to distinguish it from Lower Ossory. By the Amendment moved by the hon. Member there would be no distinction between the two.

MR. LALOR explained that there were both an Upper and a Lower Ossory at one time, but there was no distinction between the two now.

MR. SEXTON said, he wished to point out to the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warton) that these names had been recommended to the Commissioner by two eminent Members of the Tory Party, of whom Lord Castletown was one.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the word 'Ossory' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. KENNY, the following Amendment made:—In pages 105, line 10, leave out "The," and after the word "Leix," leave out "Division."

On the Motion of Mr. SEXTON, the following Amendments made:—

In page 105, line 20, leave out "The," and after the word "Roscommon," leave out "Division;" in line 25, leave out "The," and after the word "Roscommon," leave out "Division;" in page 106, line 4, leave out "The," and after the word "Sligo," leave out "Division;" in line 9, leave out "The," and after the word "Sligo," leave out "Division;" in line 17, leave out "The," and after the word "Tipperary," leave out "Division;" in line 22, leave out "The," and after the word "Tipperary," leave out "Division;" in line 29, leave out "The West Tipperary Division," and insert "South Tipperary;" and in line 32, leave out "The," and after the word "Tipperary," leave out "Division."

Amendment proposed,

In page 107, line 4, leave out "The," and after the word "Tyrone," leave out "Division."—(Mr. Small.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

MR. CALLAN said, he desired, before the Chairman put the Amendment, to say a word in regard to the divisions of the county of Tyrone. He had understood the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to suggest, at an earlier part of the debate upon the Schedules of the Bill, that if it was considered desirable to give a Member to the city of Drogheda, it would be necessary to withdraw one of the Members from the county of Tyrone, and therefore the divisions of Tyrone, instead of consisting of four, would only be three. He intended to make no Motion on the subject; but he took that opportunity of intimating that on the Report it was his intention to move that one Member should be taken from the county of Tyrone and given to Drogheda. Instead of Drogheda being constituted one of the divisions of Louth, Drogheda was the only borough in Ireland which was extinguished by the Bill in regard to which a strong desire had been expressed to preserve its representation. That representation, however, could only be preserved on the Report; and he wished the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board to be in a position to give Instructions to the Boundary Commissioners, so that if the House, upon the Report, should be of opinion that the borough representation of Drogheda should be preserved, and a Member taken from the county of Tyrone, there would be the alternative of dividing Tyrone into three divisions instead of four. He did not wish to be met with the argument on the Report, presuming that the Committee was in favour of his proposition, that there was no time to do it.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that it was out of Order to discuss, in connection with this division, what they were to do with the borough of Drogheda. He would, however, promise the hon. Member (Mr. Callan), that when the question was raised on the Report, he would not raise against the proposal the argument the hon. Member hinted at in regard to time. At the same time, he could not hold out any hope that he would be prepared to accept the proposal. All that he had said was that the town of Drogheda had a better case for having its representation continued to it than some other boroughs. But that representation could only have been continued in the event of some general agreement being arrived at; and he had no reason to suppose that there was anything like a general agreement, even among the Irish Members themselves. However, as the Committee were not upon that point now, it was not necessary to discuss it further.

MR. CALLAN said, he did not wish to prejudice the merits of the case in any way; but all he desired was to take the first opportunity, now that they had reached the county of Tyrone, to intimate that it was his intention to make this proposal on the Report, and he certainly thought that he ought not to be met with the remark that the time was inappropriate for making the proposal. He quite accepted the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, which fully met his object in calling attention to the matter now.

MR. KENNY moved an Amendment for the purpose of fixing the boundaries of North Tyrone according to the original scheme of the Commissioners, instead of in the manner proposed by the Bill. He would, therefore, move, in page 107, to leave out—

Mr. Callan

"Strabane, Lower, and West Omagh, and so much of the barony of Strabane, Upper, as comprises the following Townlands in the Parish of Upper Bodoney, namely,—Aghalane, Ballynasollus, Bradkeel, Carnargan, Corickmore, Craigatuke, Cruckaclady, Dergbrough, Eden Back, Eden Fore, Eden Mill, Glencoppogagh, Glenga, Glashyngolgan, Landahussy Lower, Landahussy Upper, Learden Lower, Learden Upper, Letterbrat, Lislea North, Lislea South, Lisnacreight, Meenagarragh, Meenagorp, Tullagherin, and Tullynadall."

The effect of the Amendment would be to prevent the division of certain parishes and townlands in an objectionable manner. By the original scheme, the baronies of Stranorlar and West Omagh, which were united both commercially and physically with Lower Strabane, were connected, and the adoption of the Amendment would only have the effect of reverting to the original scheme of the Commissioners. He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) would see his way to support the Amendment, and that it would also commend itself to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill (Sir Charles W. Dilke). Certainly the simplicity of the arrangement was much more complete than that of the plan now proposed, and the original scheme had also the advantage of having received general approval from the people of the county of Tyrone.

Amendment proposed,

In page 107, to leave out from the word "Strabane," to the word "Tullynadall," in line 13, inclusive, and insert the words "Strabane Upper and Strabane Lower." — (Mr. Kenny.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had always understood that the original scheme for the division of the county of Tyrone was not very warmly advocated by Irish Members below the Gangway opposite, and he was not informed that there was any general agreement in its favour in the locality, but, on the contrary, that the people were rather favourable to the scheme as it now stood in the Bill. The hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny), who moved the Amendment for the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), intimated that there was a general agreement in the county in the direction of the proposal now made.

But that view was not borne out by the Report of the Commissioners, and before consenting to a change, it would be necessary to have complete information as to such general agreement. In this case also the districts were principally of the same character—namely, agricultural, but they were separated by a range of mountains. The population in all the four divisions would be about the same.

MR. PLUNKET said, that he had been consulted by his noble Friend the Member for Fermanagh (Viscount Crichton) upon this subject, and he had been asked to say a few words, as his noble Friend was not able to be present himself. Therefore, on behalf of his noble Friend and those who were interested in the county, he might say that they entertained a great objection to any alteration in the scheme after the very full and complete inquiry which had been made by the Commissioners, on the spot. The fact was that the principal towns in the baronies of West Omagh and Strabane would be separated from their natural surroundings and the district to which they were naturally attached, if the original proposal of the Commissioners had been adopted, and it was mainly on that ground that the original scheme was dropped, and this alternative scheme proposed. If any hon. Member would study the map, and the Report of the Commissioners, he would see that the original proposal would have been most inconvenient, seeing that, in point of fact, there was a mountain between two parts of one of these divisions, and the scheme, as finally adopted, would be in every way more convenient for the population. He put it entirely on the ground of the convenience of the people concerned; and, therefore, he must ask the Government to support the scheme of the Commissioners as it now stood.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, that he possessed an intimate knowledge of this part of the county of Tyrone, and he only wished to say that the natural division would be to put West Omagh and Lower Strabane in the same division. They were connected in every way, both in pursuits and in religious views, and neither politically nor otherwise would it make the slightest difference. From his own knowledge, he was able to say that one division of the county of Tyrone ought to include both West Omagh and Strabane.

MR. SEXTON said, it was quite reasonable to expect that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) would support the scheme as it appeared on the map, because the person who appeared before the Commissioners on the inquiry, and suggested the alteration of the scheme, was the representative of the Tory Party in Tyrone, which Party were represented in that House by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had spoken of the existence of a range of mountains; but that was becoming a threadbare argument. Anyone who had attended to the progress of the discussions upon the Bill would find that the Commissioners made use of the argument respecting the existence of a range of mountains in one way upon one occasion, and in an entirely different way upon another, and with equal facility. In Donegal, a range of mountains was no reason for bringing persons together; but in that case it was desirable not to interfere with the baronies of Raphoe and the selected preserves of the house of Hamilton. Therefore, the Commissioners attached no importance, in that instance, to the range of mountains argument. But it was altogether different here, although it might be said that the county of Tyrone consisted of mountains altogether. In one case, the Commissioners appeared to think that a range of mountains was no drawback, so they threw in a river. In another instance, one of the arguments raised was the existence of a tramway. It was pleaded that as between the boundary of West Omagh and Castlederg there was a tramway, it was therefore urged that the whole of that district should be added. In regard to compactness, there was nothing to choose between the two divisions. Anyone who would compare the red with the blue lines would see that the divisions they comprised were of equal compactness. Both were straggling, and there was not one iota of argument in favour of one more than the other on that ground. He did not expect that the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board would favour any Amendment which had been placed on the Paper by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), because the professional gentleman who appeared before the Commissioner at Omagh said he appeared for one of the Members for Tyrone; and he (Mr. Sexton) presumed that he meant the hon. Member opposite. Of course, that learned gentleman said he thought the scheme proposed by the Commissioners was the best that could be suggested; both as to equalization of population, and in following the lines of the baronies most closely. He said, further, that it had its defects, because West Omagh and Lower Strabane would be together. Under these circumstances, he (Mr. Sexton) was not surprised to find the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) now supporting his scheme. The right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill said that it had not been shown that the feeling of the inhabitants of the county was favourable to the Amendment. That was not so, and it proved more conclusively than any other case which had yet come before the Committee that when the Nationalists, with extreme frankness, ventured to express an approval of any scheme, from that moment there was no chance whatever of its being adopted. It was condemned from the moment they gave it their fatal approval. Mr. Reynolds appeared for the National Party before the Commissioner, and he certainly did not speak in complimentary terms of the alteration proposed by Mr. Symonds, and he said he did not think the Commissioners would pay much attention to it, because it was proposed only in the interest of an expiring Party. Dean Byrne, a well-known clergyman, appeared before the Commissioner, and also expressed his unqualified approval of the Commissioners' original scheme; and the parish priest of Donoghmore (the Rev. Mr. Macarthy) said that he was chairman of a meeting of delegates from the entire county, which was held at Omagh, and at which the plan of the Commissioners, and the alternative plan, was discussed, when an unanimous opinion was arrived at to abide by that of the Commissioners. What did the right hon. Baronet say to that as an expression of the opinion of the locality? All these three gentlemen—Mr. Reynolds, Dean Byrne, and Father Macarthy—were in favour of the scheme originally put forward by the Commissioners, and the last gentleman was able to say that the unanimous voice of the assembled delegates, representing the various parishes of the county, was in favour of it. There certainly could be no political object in resisting the Amendment. Take the test of creed, which was no test at all in this case, because whatever Protestants might vote with the Nationalist Party no Catholic would vote against them; but even upon that test, there were in these baronies 27,000 Catholics and 21,000 Protestants.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the figures given by the hon. Member for Sligo were not accurate.

MR. SEXTON said, he took the calculation from The Belfast Morning News, and he believed it to be approximately correct.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the numbers were 31,000 and 19,000.

MR. SEXTON said, that made the case still more favourable from his point of view; but taking the most favourable view for the other side, let them divide, sub-divide, and cut up these four baronies how they liked in order to form two divisions, it was perfectly obvious that two Nationalist candidates would be returned, unless the Whig and Tory Party had a great deal of money to spare, and did not care how they spent it. There was only one division, in which the Protestants numbered 24,000, and the Catholics and non-Protestants 23,000, in which there could possibly be the semblance of a decent fight. He, therefore, did not see why the opinions of the people of the locality should not receive attention at the hands of the Committee, especially as the interests of no political Party would be advanced by adhering to the proposal put down in the Bill.

MR. HEALY said, it must have been a great satisfaction to the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to hear that for the Northern Division of Tyrone there would be a Catholic Member. But, unfortunately, there were 80 per cent of Catholics in the county, and by no possible means could the division be jerry-mandered. The Commissioners had found it necessary to bring two or three baronies together, and accordingly they had used up the parishes in a very remarkable way. He called attention to the fact that they had taken 22 Protestant townlands out of the barony of Strabane Upper, and put them into the North Tyrone Division. Of course, that was pure accident; but all the other townlands were left in the Mid Tyrone Division, where they were not wanted. In whatever direction one looked there was shown the same disposition to cheat the Catholics. He was not suspicious or afraid of the politics of his fellow-countrymen; on the contrary, he looked for their votes in favour of the Nationalist Party at the next General Election; he merely pointed to facts, and left the public to draw their own conclusions from them. It appeared that three Liberal gentlemen had put up as candidates for Tyrone County; and he would be glad to know if the right hon. Baronet could explain how it was that Andrew Dunn, of London, expected to be returned, as well as Mr. Herdman and the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. T. A. Dickson)? Seeing that there were 80 per cent of Catholics in the county, the hopes of the hon. Gentleman seemed to surpass all notions of probability. The scheme of the Government presented the fact that at the inquiry the Liberals and Tories were once more in coalition, and the Nationalists on the other side. They adopted the proposition of Messrs. Moore and Wilson; Mr. Wilson supported Mr. Moore's scheme, and Mr. Simmonds supported the other. He observed that the hon. Member for Tyrone was not as hopeful over this coalition as were some of his friends; but he (Mr. Healy) would inform him, as he had taken the trouble to inform the other Member for the county, that not a single Whig would get in over the whole of Ireland, unless by the goodwill and pleasure of the Party to which he (Mr. Healy) belonged. Under the new electoral scheme, the Liberals and Conservatives would not be able to secure more than 20 seats in Ireland, of which the Conservatives would obtain nine; but, independently of the Party represented on those Benches, Liberals would not be returned for the remaining 11 seats. It would not be forgotten that the hon. Member for Tyrone had used his influence with the Government to support the scheme of the Commissioners. The hon. Member had already received some proofs that in his county the Nationalists had been able, to some extent, to make a good fight even before the franchise was extended; and yet he ventured to come forward at that time and support this scheme, knowing, as he did, that the people who put him in for Tyrone were in the bitterest manner opposed to it. The hon. Gentleman would not deny that it was by Catholic votes he held a seat in that House—he would not deny it, because he (Mr. Healy) regretted to say that, at the time of his election, the Catholic Party supported him instead of the Nationalist candidate; and, therefore, it appeared to him that the hon. Gentleman showed considerable indiscretion in getting up in that House to support the Government in their scheme, seeing that at the next election he would have to ask for the support of the very men whose Representatives were antagonistic to the scheme proposed. He, no doubt, expected to get the whole of the popular Party with him in South Tyrone; but he might be assured that his support of the Government scheme would not be forgotten at the next election, because in the minds of the popular Party that scheme was based on fraud. They had a right to expect that hon. Gentlemen who represented the Nonconformists of the North of Ireland would have made some return for the support they received in the past; but they had shown themselves ungrateful, they had trampled under foot the favours received at their election, and they had said—"As long as we were able we used you; and now that we have you in our power we shall back up the Government in putting you down—we have done with you, and we expect in future to do without you." But, as he had said, no single Whig would get into Parliament for the North of Ireland. He and his hon. Friends would not forget the treatment they had received in connection with this Bill.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had been astonished, in taking up this scheme, to find that even in a county with 80 per cent of Catholics, the Boundary Commissioners had not scrupled so to jerry-mander the constituency as to take away nearly half the Catholics from it. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Healy) had been severe upon the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson); but he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) would call attention to the fact that he was under the impression that a sort of coalition had been formed between the Tories and the Whigs in the North of Ireland. He did not know whether that was true or not; but he remained satisfied that the Liberal Member for Tyrone would be no party to such coalition. If he understood the hon. Gentleman rightly, he repudiated such connection, and denied it entirely, and he was glad that he had disclaimed an alliance of the kind. When some hon. Members on those Benches pointed out that the Catholics in Derry had a right to one of the seats for the county, the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) got up and said that the Protestants were in a considerable majority, and that it was by no means unnatural that they should have two seats; but now, when they came to Tyrone, where the Catholics were in a majority of 80 per cent, the right hon. Baronet considered it not at all extravagant that the right of the Catholics to two seats should be considerably endangered. This was, he believed, the last question that would be seriously debated on this Bill in Committee, and he regretted that they must wind up the discussion by saying that wherever an opportunity had presented itself, the Catholics had been filched of a great portion of what belonged to them.

MR. CALLAN said, as a Railway Director of many years' experience, he had heard with astonishment the statement that one reason for placing part of the barony of Strabane in the position which it occupied was that a range of mountains separated it from the barony with which it ought to have been united. What justification Mr. Macpherson had for putting the barony into North Tyrone altogether passed his comprehension. Probably he was a Scotchman, and wanted to give his Scotch friends a chance for Tyrone. At any rate, he would challenge the hon. Member opposite (Mr. T. A. Dickson) to get up and justify the arrangement on any but political and religious grounds. If on his honour he considered it a fair division, he would accept his declaration to that effect; but, until he so declared, he (Mr. Callan) should regard it as one of the most disgraceful divisions that had been made in the country.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had not the serious cause of complaint with regard to the scheme which he would have had if the baronies of Dungannon had been separated.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 50; Noes 18: Majority 32.—(Div. List, No. 117.)

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of Mr. SMALL, the following Amendments made:—In page 107, line 14, leave out "The," and after the word "Tyrone," leave out "Division;" in line 17, leave out "The," and after the word "Tyrone," leave out "Division;" and in line 22, leave out "The," and after the word "Tyrone," leave out "Division."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that two townlands were in a detached portion of West Waterford, whilst the rest of the division was in East Waterford. These two divisions in West Waterford contained only 25 people in all, so that it was not a very important matter.

Amendment proposed, in page 108, line 6, after "Clonea," insert "(except the townlands of Ballyrandle and Kilgrovan)."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HEALY said, that with regard to this Amendment, he wished once more to ask the Committee exactly how they stood? It was monstrous that they should have in a Bill such words as these—

"And the barony of Decies without Drum (except so much as is comprised in Division No. 2, as herein described)."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, these places would not be shown on the maps, as they were detached portions; and they would not be shown in the clause.

MR. HEALY asked whether a map of the entire country would be prepared by the Government, showing the divisions on a large scale in the manner in which the districts could be divided in the Ordnance map?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the question was one of cost. He had done all he could to meet the hon. and learned Gentleman's complaint that the public would not be able to procure the necessary map by purchasing the Returns containing all the information. He was afraid the hon. and learned Member would not be able to get the map he wanted without a very strong expression on the part of the House.

of it. The expense would be very great.

Mr. CALLAN said, that there seemed to be a difficulty in the way of spending a little money in order to convenience hon. Members. The Government, however, did not hesitate to spend any amount for the acquisition of American steamers in the case of a threatened war.

Mr. HEALY said, that if they could not get these maps published for general use, at any rate the Government might see that one was prepared for use in the Library, with all divisions marked out on it. It would not be necessary to prepare a new map, but some Engineer officer could very well mark out on the old Ordnance Survey map the divisions as they had been laid down in the Bill.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: I think that can be done. I will consult with those officials who would have to perform the duty on the matter.

Mr. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman let us have a map showing the English divisions marked in the same way?

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, it could be done; but, probably, when the map was prepared, it would not show such small details as those which we are now discussing.

Mr. CALLAN said, [the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles W. Dilke) might put himself into communication with the publishers of United Ireland, who had prepared a map showing the manner in which seats would be distributed in Ireland. He did not suppose that the hon. Members for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) and the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), who were part owners of that paper, would have any objection to give the right hon. Baronet the used-up wood-cuts of these maps so as to enable him to supply hon. Members with what they required. He thought it did not look seemly on the part of the Representatives of a large Department of the Government to talk about expenses in matters of this kind, seeing that a spirited Government had not done so.

would only cost him 1d. He could supply the right hon. Baronet with one of these maps, showing the divisions of a county. It was a farce to talk here of expense—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

Mr. HEALY: Rule!

Mr. ACKERS: I do not rise to a point of Order—

Mr. CALLAN: If the hon. Member does not rise to a point of Order, he has no right to rise at all, for I am in possession of the Committee. I was suggesting that it would be desirable, and that there would be no objection in regard to expense, if we were supplied with these United Ireland maps. If we were supplied with proper maps, it would tend to shorten the discussion on Report. I do not suppose the Treasury would object to the plan proposed.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question is, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. ACKERS again rose, and

Mr. CALLAN also rose.

THE CHAIRMAN: The speech of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) is irrelevant, and I must ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. HEALY: You have not declared it.

THE CHAIRMAN: I declare it now, and I ask the hon. Member to resume his seat.

Mr. ACKERS said, he wanted to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to reconsider the question of maps. In reply to the request of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), the right hon. Gentleman had said that everything the Committee desired had been done, and that a full statement had been published; but he (Mr. Ackers) was happy to find that the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan was not satisfied with that, and had again raised the point. The hon. and learned Member was very anxious to get that which, no doubt, the Committee was also desirous of obtaining—namely, maps showing all the alterations made in the divisions, the end of this great Bill, be one of the greatest Acts any years, they might have read of the divisions.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said, he was glad to give further consideration to the matter; and he had asked the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Healy) that he should give the subject further attention. If they were to have county maps, he thought the alterations which would have to be made would not be very numerous. By far the larger number of alterations had been made in the boroughs. Of course, the Committee would bear in mind that the set of maps now in the hands of hon. Members did not show exactly all the divisions in the county. They only showed the divisions that the Commissioners had had to divide. Therefore, a set of maps prepared on the lines of the set already in the hands of hon. Members, showing the alterations effected in Committee, would not give a complete view of the whole case. Sixty-eight maps had been circulated in a large book, showing the proposals of the Commissioners; but many of those had not been adopted.

MR. HEALY said, that the Ordnance map relating to Ireland was so minute that even the fences in different fields were shown upon it. If a tenant altered a fence, the alteration was shown on the next Ordnance map prepared.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that would apply to the Ordnance Survey map, which he had said might be put up in the Library. He was not sure that the suggestion could be complied with; but it would be done if practicable.

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. P. J. POWER said, that, no doubt, the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan would be content with the undertaking just given by the right hon. Baronet. They now came to an Amendment relating to the county of Waterford, which, he was happy to think, would not meet with opposition from any quarter. He did not think it would offend either the Nationalists, or the Whigs, or the Tories, and he proposed it merely with the view of the convenience of the inhabitants of the parish of Seskinan. The Boundary Commissioners, in following their Instructions, had divided the county of Waterford into two divisions, and in making those divisions they had had regard to population. They had endeavoured to make the population of the two divisions as nearly as possible alike; and to carry out that object they had had to cut up this parish of Seskinan. By this process they had made the population of West Waterford to exceed that of East Waterford by 635; and the Amendment which he proposed had for its object the placing of a part of Seskinan, which the Commissioners had put into East Waterford, into West Waterford, increasing the difference that already existed to about 1,435. The Committee would naturally ask, why not place the portion of Seskinan, which was in the West Waterford District, in the East Waterford District, thereby equalizing the population in the respective divisions? But he wished to point out to the Committee that all the interests of the parishioners of Seskinan lay in the West Waterford District—all their market interests, their fair interests, their dispensary interests, and their Poor Law Unions. As he had said before, the Amendment he proposed to give effect to would be of the greatest possible convenience to the inhabitants of the parish, and would not make the least difference to any particular Party. In moving this proposal, he felt that it was quite unnecessary to point out to the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill what the effect of it would be. The matter was one of detail, and the right hon. Baronet had made himself such a perfect master of every detail of the most complicated matter contained in the measure that it was quite unnecessary for any Member in any part of the House to point out what the effect of any Amendment would be. He trusted hon. Members on both sides of the House would see the reasonableness of the Amendment he proposed, and that the Government, as represented by the right hon. Baronet, would have no difficulty in agreeing to it.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that in the case of an Amendment relating to Louth, moved by the hon. Member for that place (Mr. Callan), there was no objection raised to the proposal, and he had not heard any objection raised to the proposal the hon. Member had now made. He should be very glad to accept it, provided that before the Report the Boundary Commissioners did not offer any strong objection to it. So far as he knew, there was no objection to it. It would possess the advantages the hon. Member had pointed out; but it would have the drawback of making the population rather less equal than it was at present. As the hon. Member had stated, the population of the Western Division would be 44,000, while that of the Eastern Division would be only 39,500 odd. He had no other objection to the proposal; and if, before Report, no one raised a protest against it, he should propose to take the same course with regard to it as he had taken in the case of Louth.

MR. CALLAN said, that supposing the Amendment was agreed to by the Boundary Commissioners as to East Waterford, what would be the result? The Amendment was, in page 108, line 7, to leave out "Seskinan;" and if Seskinan was left out, it would not be included anywhere. Unless it were included here, the inhabitants of Seskinan would be disfranchised.

MR. P. J. POWER said, the hon. Member was quite wrong.

MR. CALLAN: No; unless it was included here in West Waterford, the people in Seskinan would not be able to vote at all.

MR. WARTON said, he should like to make an observation here, because the mistake which the hon. Member who brought forward the Amendment had fallen into was the result of the eccentric drafting of the Bill, to which he had had occasion to call attention before, and to which the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill so persistently adhered. The hon. Member below the Gangway (Mr. Callan) seemed to be under the impression that if Seskinan disappeared from East Waterford, it would go nowhere. If they took the trouble to look at another part of the Bill they would find that Seskinan would go into West Waterford, because the barony in which it was situated formed part of that division. This was one of the results of neglecting to show the divisions in the Bill. The Bill had been drawn in a most slovenly manner. ["Order, order!"] It was not out of Order to say that. He was entitled to say that the Bill had been drafted in a slovenly manner. He had said it before, and he would probably have to say it again; and he should certainly not be put down by any amount of roaring. The draft of the Bill had given great dissatisfaction to other hon. Members besides himself. He thanked the right hon. Baronet for intimating that, in all probability, the House would be supplied with a Return of all the integral parts of parishes and divisions as finally laid down in the Bill; he thanked the right hon. Baronet for the promise, and also for the performance when he made it. He wished to point out that when they were put in this position, that certain parishes forming part, say, of a barony or Petty Sessional Division, were put into one division of a county, and they found that that division was expressed in another division of the county in very general words, such as "except so much as is comprised in Division No. 2," it would be convenient to have that division in which the parishes were named first, stated first without regard to No. 1 or No. 2. References of this kind had no meaning or sense, and only served to disfigure the Bill. It seemed to him that it would have been far better to have taken the East Waterford Division first, for then they would have the places relating to the barony of Decies set out; and they would then have had, secondly, the remaining part of the parishes mentioned in a less general manner put in. If they were to have this style of drafting it was as well to mitigate, as far as possible, its evil effects when they had the chance. They should do this in dealing fully, in the first instance, with the divisions in which the parishes were enumerated; and, secondly, in dealing with the divisions in which only, so to speak, the surplus part of the parishes were inserted. He mentioned this because it was possible that before Report the right hon. Baronet might desire to change the order of these places in the Waterford Divisions.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he should be happy to consider the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member.

MR. P. J. POWER said, that as to the number he had stated, he should like to inform the right hon. Baronet that he was not positive in saying that 800 were the exact figures. He had not been able to ascertain the number precisely before leaving Waterford; but he had been told that that was the number, or about it. As to the question raised by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) with regard to disfranchising a portion of the parish, if the Amendment were carried—

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Oh, that is all right; we understand that point.

MR. P. J. POWER: Yes; I think that question need not be gone into.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons) has the following Amendment on the Paper:—Part 3, page 109, line 26, insert,—“Royal University of Ireland | Two Members.” I have considered the Amendment, and I must say that as this is a Schedule relating to counties, a proposal to insert in it a provision constituting a new University constituency is not in Order.

DR. LYONS said, that the Amendment in question appeared in the Paper through an inadvertence for which he was not at all responsible. He merely wished to give Notice that he would put the Amendment on the Paper for consideration on Report.

Further Amendments made.

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

EIGHTH SCHEDULE.

FIRST PART.

MR. SEXTON rose for the purpose of moving an Amendment, in page 110, line 5, to leave out “33 & 34 Vic. c. 38 | An Act to disfranchise the boroughs of Sligo and Cashel,” when—

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would ask the permission of the Committee in order to make a statement in regard to the Schedule, which, he thought, would relieve the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) from the necessity of moving his Amendment. This question had been raised on Clauses 26 and 27. On Clause 27 the question as to what disfranchisement should be given to the electors reported on by the Commissioners in 1880 arose, and the Government accepted a proposition which came from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), to the effect that the penalty imposed on these voters should be seven years' disfranchisement from the date of the Report—for an offence at one election, and one election only. That was the view of the House—it might have been right or it might have been wrong, but they proceeded upon that principle; and, so far as he could gather, rather hoped that by dealing mercifully with those voters the House would not be encouraging corrupt practices for the future. In the same Bill, by Clause 26, they had to deal with electors who had been made the subject of legislation in times past. They had been of two classes—namely, those who had been scheduled for disfranchisement for a certain period, and those scheduled for disfranchisement for life—so as not to vote in a certain constituency for life. There were many of these people scheduled; and considering that they proposed to impose a penalty of only seven years upon those reported on in 1880, they could not maintain the heavier penalty on those who had been disfranchised now for 14 years. The result would be that in the new constituencies the disfranchised voters would be restored to their voting power, and those of the boroughs of Sligo and Cashel would be included. There were about 9,000 names on the Election Commission Reports; but that number, it was computed, must have been so reduced by death and change of dwelling-place, that no more than one-third of the original number now remained. Therefore, he did not think the Committee would be running any risk in acceding to what he thought was a consistent way of dealing with old offenders. On the Report, therefore, he would move an Amendment to Clause 26, to strike out the first part of the Schedule altogether. He made this announcement now in order to save discussion; but the matter would have to be practically dealt with on Report.

MR. SEXTON said, that of course the undertaking given by the hon. and learned Member opposite was satisfactory to him to the full extent of his Amendment. In that Amendment he had not dealt with cases other than those of Sligo and Cashel. As an Irish Member, he had not felt competent to deal with English cases. He would make no comment upon the fact that in moving this proposed alteration the hon. and learned Gentleman would be granting an amnesty to greater offenders than he (Mr. Sexton) was interested in. When he had put his Amendment down, he had felt that it could not be seriously contended for a moment that the remnant of the few people reported on in 1869, and disfranchised in 1870, should be still excluded from the franchise. The number of persons scheduled in Sligo was 27, and the number scheduled in Cashel, 100. These people had been scheduled 16 years ago, and disfranchised 14 years ago; and, seeing that that was the case, he considered that there could not be any very great impropriety in giving them the privilege of voting. He thanked the hon. and learned Gentleman for his statement.

MR. WARTON said, that before the Schedule was put, he had an Amendment to propose which had not been removed by what the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had stated. He begged to propose the omission of the word "Knaresborough" from the Schedule. He did so on the ground that Knaresborough stood in a perfectly different position to every one of the other boroughs mentioned in the Schedule. It would be in the recollection of hon. Members that at the last General Election there was a close contest in the borough of Knaresborough—that a Liberal, whose name it was not necessary to mention, was returned by the narrow majority of 26 over the Conservative candidate, that an Election Petition was presented, and that the Judges reported that the borough had been a guilty borough. The result was that Commissioners were sent down; but, contrary to what was done by the Commissioners in the cases of Boston, Canterbury, Chester, Gloucester, Macclesfield, Oxford, and Sandwich, the other places mentioned in the Schedule, they found that a hasty conclusion had been come to by the Judges, and their Report was eminently favourable to the character of Knaresborough. Two of the Commissioners were Liberals and the third a Conservative; so it could not be said that their Report was prompted by political considerations. The Commissioners agreed in their Report, and they distinctly stated, referring to the way in which the Election Petition was tried, that the counsel for the respondent asked permission to refute some of the charges made; but the Judges declined to hear them, on the ground that the inquiry was finished. Hon. Gentlemen knew perfectly well how Election Petitions were conducted. Owing to the extraordinary way in which things were conducted in election cases, if a single case of bribery was proved, the sitting Member lost his seat, though he might not himself be morally guilty. The most trumpery case of bribery was quite enough to unseat a man; the question between the political Parties was settled if one clear case of bribery was made out. But it was a very different thing when the honour of the borough was at stake. The Judges reported somewhat hastily that Knaresborough was corrupt; but the Commissioners, after a cool and quiet investigation, found—

"That corrupt practices did not extensively prevail at the Election in 1880. Corrupt practices," the Report went on, "did exist to some extent, but they were not carried out upon any system or premeditated plan on either side. The cases of direct bribery were few and slight, and the treating was not of the serious nature as would appear from the ex parte evidence given before the learned Judges."

Not only, therefore, did the Commissioners say, in one page of their Report, that the Judges refused to hear the contrary evidence, but they said the same thing again in other words upon another page; they complained of the complexion given to the case from the ex parte evidence laid before the learned Judges. Why, the total amount proved to have been spent during the Election, including the sums paid by persons who were mere volunteers, did not exceed £120, a perfectly trivial sum as compared with the money spent in some boroughs with which even the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) was acquainted. Knaresborough came out of the investigation with a reputation of almost perfect purity. At the following election their late much-respected Friend, Mr. Tom Collins, was returned, also by a narrow majority—374 to 335. Indeed, the Commissioners, who went somewhat at length into the history of the borough, found that Parties were so evenly balanced that it was with them pretty much turn and turn about. He (Mr. Warton) knew very well what the answer would in all probability be. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) might say that all they were trying to do was to provide certain punishment to certain individuals who were scheduled by the Commissioners. That, however, was unjust to the borough of Knaresborough. Under this ruthless Bill, Knaresborough was one of the ancient boroughs which was to lose its separate representation. If boroughs having a history of many centuries were to be deprived of their political rights, they ought, to say the least, to be allowed to preserve their good name. He must say that in comparison with the otherscheduled boroughs Knaresborough stood out distinguished for its purity—in fact, it might be said that Knaresborough stood in a very enviable position. It had, it was true, been found guilty; but it had been found that the acts of bribery committed within it were exceedingly small. To put Knaresborough amongst the corrupt boroughs was exceedingly cruel; and therefore he thought it his duty, in justice to the borough, to move its omission from the Schedule.

Amendment proposed, in page 110, to leave out the word "Knaresborough."
—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Knaresborough' stand part of the Schedule."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that, as far as he could judge, a great deal of what the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Warton) had said was perfectly irrelevant. The fact of the matter was, that certain persons in Knaresborough were guilty of corrupt practices. No doubt, if they had let the borough alone, the mass of voters would have been pure. Why should the guilty persons at Knaresborough be pardoned any more than the guilty ones in any other of the scheduled boroughs? If the place was as pure as the hon. and learned Member had said, those who did bribe could not have been led away by the impurity of their surroundings. Their offence must have been all the more deliberate and intentional; and, therefore, there could be no special reason why they should be pardoned.

MR. BULWER said, he agreed with much the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) had said. He would not mention any borough in particular, but boroughs with which hon. Members, not even excepting his hon. and learned Friend (the Attorney General), were all familiar were far more corrupt than Knaresborough. It was mere prudery to talk of corruption in Knaresborough, when there was not more than £120 spent during the election. He should be very much surprised if any Representative of a borough, after inquiry into the matter, would be able to say that in his borough a much larger sum was not spent corruptly at the last Election. [HON. RULERS: English boroughs.] He did not wish to wound the susceptibilities of the Irish Members; he understood that they did not resort to bribery, but to intimidation. He would confine his remarks to this side of the Irish Channel, and would challenge the Representative of any English, Scotch, or Welsh borough to rise in his place and say, of his own knowledge, that in his borough £120, or a good deal more, was not spent corruptly on one side or the other at the last Election? Everybody knew that there was more or less corruption, though, of course, nobody could prove it. He agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridport that no sufficient case had been made out for the inclusion of Knaresborough in the Schedule.

COLONEL STEBLE supported the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Warton). He did not rise to make a speech, but simply to repudiate the statement of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Bulwer) that bribery prevailed in every constituency. He could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that Scarborough was perfectly pure at the last Election.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he also protested against the remark of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bulwer) that at the last General Election corruption universally prevailed. So far as Wales was concerned, he could say with confidence that at the last Election there was no corruption whatever, nor had such a thing been known in the Principality in modern times, except in one borough which would now cease to return a Member.

MR. WARTON said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James), with that acuteness which distinguished him on all occasions, had given the go-bye to his (Mr. Warton's) principal argument, which was that it was perfectly unfair to put in this disgraceful Schedule Knaresborough, pure and innocent, as compared with any one of the other seven boroughs mentioned in the Schedule. To that argument the hon. and learned Attorney General did not condescend to reply. Perhaps it was as well he should remind the hon. and learned Gentleman and the Committee how the bribery began. It began in a Liberal club. About 70 or 80 gallons of beer was distributed amongst the people. What did 70 or 80 gallons of beer amongst the people of Knaresborough amount to? And what mitigated the crime was, that a good deal of the money with which the drink was paid for was subscribed by persons who were at the time sharing in the drink, so that these corrupt voters were treating themselves after all. He could only say that if the hon. and gallant Member for Scarborough (Colonel Steble), whom he was glad to find supporting him, would tell with him, he would certainly press the matter to a division.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 76; Noes 15: Majority 61.—(Div. List, No. 118.)

Question, "That the Schedule stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be reported to the House."

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question is, "That I report the Bill, as amended, to the House."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It is not unusual, at the close of a Committee on a Bill of this importance, to thank the Committee for the assistance they have given in regard to certain details of the Bill. I have to thank hon. Members in all quarters of the House for the manner in which they have worked on the Bill, and to express the hope that the result of our labours may not be unworthy of the attention which has been given to it.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman when he intends to take the Report stage of this Bill; and when the Bill will be in the hands of Members reprinted?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have expressed a strong desire that the Bill be circulated unstitched to-morrow; but, if not circulated to-morrow, it will be on the following day. I propose to fix the Report stage on Monday, with a view of taking it on Tuesday or Wednesday.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 134.]

MOTIONS.

POLICE AND SANITARY REGULATIONS SELECT COMMITTEE.

Ordered, That Four be the quorum of the Select Committee on Police and Sanitary Regulations.—(Mr. John Talbot.)

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (STANDING ORDER, PUT- TING THE QUESTION).

RESOLUTION.

MR. BIGGAR, in rising to move—

"That the Standing Order of the 27th November 1882, relating to Putting the Question, be amended by leaving out the following words, 'it shall appear to Mr. Speaker, or to the Chairman of Ways and Means in a Committee of the whole House, during any Debate, that the subject has been adequately discussed, and that it is the evident sense of the House, or of the Committee, that the Question be now put, he may so inform the House or the Committee, and, if a Motion be made 'That the Question be now put,' and inserting the following words instead, "a Minister of the Crown shall declare to the House, or to a Committee of the whole House, during any Debate, that, in his opinion, the subject has been adequately discussed, and that it is the evident sense of the House, or of the Committee, that the Question be now put, and shall thereupon make a Motion, "That the Question be now put.'" said, the Amendment prevented the necessity of the Speaker or the Chairman of Ways and Means coming into conflict with any Member of the House or any section of the House. That was a very unfortunate position for the Speaker or the Chairman to be in, especially as it was the special function of those Officials to protect the minority in that House. The position of a Speaker and a Chairman should be purely judicial, and all such things as allegations of Party or partizanship should be avoided as far as possible by those functionaries.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at Eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE:
 May I ask the right hon. Baronet opposite whether he can tell us what the arrangements will be now as regards the Business of the House? We have to consider the Registration of Voters Bill to-day, and we shall be glad to know what Business will be taken to-morrow and on Friday? I should be glad, at the same time, to be allowed to take this opportunity of expressing my regret that I was not in the House when the Redistribution Bill was finally passed through Committee. I should have liked to express my high sense of the great ability, tact, and good humour with which the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board has conducted the measure in its progress through the House. I should be glad also to know whether it is probable that any other Papers will be presented to us besides what we have already before we consider the Vote of Credit on Monday next?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the kindness with which he has referred to my own exertions in connection with the Redistribution of Seats Bill. Having done so, I have to say that it is not in my power to state whether any further Papers can be presented before the Vote of Credit; but I will communicate with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on the subject in the course of the afternoon. With reference to the course of Business, it is intended to take Supply first to-morrow—the Civil Service Estimates. A doubt was expressed, however, last night as to whether it would not be desirable to report Progress at 10 or 11 o'clock, and to continue the discussion on the next stages of the Scotch and Irish Registration Bills.

 That depends upon the progress made to-day, and on the feeling expressed by the Committee on the subject. It is also proposed to continue these Bills on Friday, on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair, but probably not with the intention of going on with the discussion of the clauses of these Bills in Committee. My right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate does not propose to take the clauses of the Scotch Bills this week, in order that the people of Scotland may have time to consider them. Probably the same course will be taken with regard to the Irish measure.

MR. WARTON asked when the Corporate Property Bill would be proceeded with?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he could not state when it would be possible to go on with it. He saw no prospect of going on with it for some time.

MR. SEXTON said, he understood that the Redistribution of Seats Bill was to be put down for Monday for its Report stage. It had not been circulated as reprinted.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the Bill would be circulated to-day. It would be put down for Monday, but he did not see much chance of the Redistribution of Seats Bill being proceeded with on that day. Perhaps it might be proceeded with on Tuesday or Wednesday.

ISTAN—SIR PETER LUMSDEN'S
DESPATCHES.

MR. O'KELLY asked whether the Government would consider the advibility of laying on the Table the suppressed despatch of Sir Peter Lumsden?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: There is no suppressed despatch. Sir Peter Lumsden is in daily communication with Her Majesty's Government, and as many as four, five, and six telegrams come from him every day on various points of detail. The despatch presented last night is the only telegram going over the whole ground and giving an account of the engagement near Penjdeh.

MR. O'KELLY: The despatch I refer to is the long one which was announced to the House, but not laid before us.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That despatch is only one of the series to which I have alluded, and it gives no facts which are material beyond those contained in the despatch presented yesterday.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I shall be glad to know if there is any fresh news which the Government can communicate to the House?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No, Sir; there is no news at all.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 110.]

(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made. and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

MR. PLUNKET: It is not my intention to oppose the second reading of this Bill, so far as it is an attempt to apply the existing Law of Registration in Ireland to the actually qualified voters that will exist under the Franchise Bill; but I must call attention to the fact that Clause 3 of the Bill, which enacts that dispensary relief shall not in future be a disqualification for the franchise, is an entirely foreign element introduced into such a Bill. It has nothing, practically speaking, to do with the Registration Bill. I am not going into the merits of the question at present, or to say how far the clause is an advantage or a disadvantage. I only wish to take note of the circumstance that this Bill is not—as is the English corresponding Bill—a simple attempt to apply the Registration Law, as it stands, to the new circumstances that will arise under the Franchise Bill, and to point out that an effort is made by this Clause 3 to introduce a new principle of qualification and disqualification of voters in Ireland.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he wished to remind the House that the clause was moved twice in the discussion on the Franchise Bill, and that they were then told from the Front Bench that the Registration Bill would be the proper place for its introduction; and on that occasion no objection was offered by the Opposition. It was an absolute necessity that the clause should be introduced here. It was altogether hopeless for Irish Members to attempt to remedy their grievances by a separate Bill, amid all this press of Business, and wars and rumour of wars taking up so much time. This Clause 3 was the most valuable and essential part of the Bill; and without it two-thirds of the new voters would be practically disfranchised. It should be remembered that the greater part of the people of Ireland paid poor rates, and thus they contributed to this very fund which brought them medical relief. Some did not actually pay poor rates, perhaps; but then they paid it in the form of rent to the landlord, the landlord paying the actual rate. This was a system which English rule had encouraged. The dispensary system was a very good system in Ireland. The people had adopted it, and now it would be cruel in the extreme to disfranchise them because they had adopted the method which the Government had recommended to them. He wished to point out the distinction which existed between Ireland and England in this respect. In the latter place the people had doctors of various degrees. They could get their half-crown or five shilling doctor. He believed that every Irish doctor charged 20s. He did not know an exception. Passing away from this clause of the Bill, he would take exception to that clause in the Bill which cast the cost of registration upon the local rates. It was essentially an Imperial question, for it was owing to registration that they came to that House for an Imperial purpose. Though they liked it not, they were told that it was for the general interest of the Empire; and it was necessary for their coming there that there should be registration, and hence this was an Imperial question simply. There might be some argument in favour of throwing the cost upon the local rates if the Local Bodies had any power to keep down cost in this direction. This, however, was not so, for the whole scale was fixed by the Local Government Board, and the Local Bodies had no authority to alter it. All they had to do was simply to raise the money. The present local rates were burdened with half-a-dozen other taxes—such as that with regard to explosives—which were not really local rates at all. He was sure that if the Ministry would give this matter consideration, and take these burdens off the Poor Law altogether, they would confer a great benefit on the people.

MR. WARTON said, he thought that this Bill, in its present shape, would give rise to endless litigation. Instead of leaving the Revising Barrister to state a case, if he was in doubt, the individual voter was to be allowed to go through the whole form of getting a rule nisi and going through the other stages. The 1st clause of the Bill was really a breach of the understanding which had been come to with the House, as it practically made the Franchise Act date back a whole year.

MR. LEWIS said, it seemed to him that this Bill had better have been confined to the question of registration, and not extended to the question of franchise. As he understood, the object of the Bill was to assimilate the law of Ireland with regard to registration with the law of England. As he understood the law of England, the receipt of medical relief was a disqualification for the franchise; yet this Bill proposed to make a different law for Ireland. He would deal with this point further in Committee. He thought it desirable to press on the Government the necessity for securing purity of registration in Ireland, and he would call their attention to what was now going on, and what was likely to go on. At a very recent meeting of the Athy Board of Guardians, a proposition was made that the persons to be appointed to make out the new lists of voters under the Franchise Act should be the local secretaries of the National League Branches in every parish in the union. It was pointed out that the ordinary course was to appoint rate collectors, whose public office would be likely to secure independence, or, at any rate, responsibility; and a very reasonable suggestion was made that the extraordinary course of appointing the secretaries of the National League should not be adopted without notice. This moderate idea was, however, scouted by the Guardians, and the Land League secretaries were appointed straight off. Now, if that were the way the extension of the franchise was to be carried out in Ireland, good-bye to the smallest chance of the Loyal Party having any representation in that House at all. The Local Government Board had power in the matter, and he had fixed responsibility on the Government by bringing the matter to their attention. He hoped an Amendment would be introduced in this Bill meeting such an abuse which, if attempted in England, would meet with the severest censure.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) thought the matters which had been brought forward were all subjects for Committee, and he suggested that the hon. Member for Derry City should prepare an Amendment.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 132.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Lord Advocate.)

MR. PRESTON BRUCE said, he did not think there would be any opposition in Scotland to this Bill, although there might be some disappointment on finding that it did not deal with certain questions connected with registration, which, he supposed, were considered to be of too contentious a nature. He only rose at present to remark that this Bill had only been circulated to Members this morning, and that, therefore, although he did not propose to take any objection to the second reading being passed to-day, he would like to suggest to his right hon. and learned Friend (the Lord Advocate) that there ought to be allowed an interval before taking the clauses in detail, in order that the various persons interested in the subject in Scotland might have an opportunity of examining the Bill and making suggestions upon it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): My hon. Friend the Member for Fife has touched on the reasons for which the Government do not propose to enter into the larger questions of registration to which he has referred. I think it was explained by the Prime Minister, and it has been more than once explained, that these Registration Bills were not intended to cover the whole ground of the questions bearing on that most important subject, but merely such parts of them as are essential to bring into speedy and effectual operation the Act for the Representation of the People, and accordingly this Bill has been limited to that. In regard to what my hon. Friend further stated, as to the Bill being only circulated to-day, I may repeat the explanation I gave before, that we thought it right, in a matter of so highly technical a kind, in regard to which it was very important to have the views of those who have practical experience of the framing of the Register, to communicate with the assessors in the largest and most populous counties in Scotland while the Bill was in draft. Accordingly, some delay has arisen in that respect; but I may state that, while I propose to put down the Bill for Committee to-morrow, and if an opportunity is offered to ask that you, Mr. Speaker, should leave the Chair, I shall postpone the taking of the clauses till next week, so that there will be time to have the Bill sent down to Scotland, and to have the views of those interested in it obtained. I hope the hon. Member will be satisfied with this explanation.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (No. 2) BILL.—[BILL 74.]

(Sir Joseph Pease, Earl Percy, Mr. Tremayne, Mr. Charles Palmer.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. T. Richardson.)

MR. WARTON, in rising to move the rejection of the Bill, said, of all the rapid surprises which had ever come under his observation this was far and away the most surprising; and he greatly regretted to find becoming infectious the habit so persistently pursued by those who sat in front of the hon. Gentleman—namely, that of placing measures before the House without offering any observations whatever in explanation of their purport. Here was a great, a grave, and an important question, whether the sale of liquor on Sunday throughout England should in a great measure be suppressed; and the Government, who were responsible for the conduct of Public Business, had their minds so occupied with foreign questions that they failed to give their supporters a hint to avoid wasting valuable time at this period of the Session, and in the midst of a war-impending crisis, in promoting the discussion of Bills of a fragmentary character. One Member ventilated his hobby by proposing legislation for Durham; another took Northumberland in hand; a third directed his attention to Cornwall. In point of fact, they had quite a plethora of those narrow-minded and exasperating schemes interfering with popular rights and privileges. He was under the impression that the Bill which the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. T. Richardson) silently sought to pass through the House was one of those local county Bills—how could it be otherwise when no explanation was given of its object?—but he now found that it was a general measure applying to the entire length and breadth of England, and of the most arbitrary character. It was a most disreputable mode of proceeding, and paying a very bad compliment indeed to the common sense of the House to ask it to accept such an important measure without offering one single argument in favour of the deteriorating and unjust alterations of the existing law for which he demanded Parliamentary sanction. Why should any trade or interest be perpetually harassed or vexed in this cruel manner? The law recognized the highly honourable but anxious occupation of the publican. On the faith of British law the licensed victualler devoted his energy, time, and capital to the carrying on his business in a respectable manner, yet they found that the trade was more harassed than any other by perfectly well-meaning Gentlemen bringing forward Bills of this description with the object, as they foolishly imagined, of preventing drunkenness. Men tried to signalize themselves, and some liked to appear at least better than other people. In this country there was a great deal of hypocrisy; but he was quite at a loss to know what were the arguments on which the hon. Member for Hartlepool, whose name, by the way, did not appear on the back of the Bill, sought to justify the legislation he now asked. It was nothing short of hypocrisy on the part of those who took a glass of drink, and had every comfort around them in their homes, good cellars filled with wines of the choicest vintage, comfortable clubs to go to when they pleased, not only on week days, but on Sundays at all hours of the day and night, to say that the labouring man or the hard-struggling clerk should not have the opportunity at reasonable hours of getting on the Sabbath whatever liquor or refreshment was required. He did not know what were the personal habits of the hon. Member for Hartlepool. He might be either a thorough abstainer or a moderate drinker; but, regarding him as an impersonal abstraction, he was driven to ask with what object he had brought forward this Bill? Some people, no doubt, were entirely opposed to the consumption of intoxicating liquors; but it should be remembered that there were others of an opposite opinion. In his view, it was little short of narrow-minded despotism for hon. Members, because they abstained themselves, to seek that those who moderately indulged should be placed in the same category by legal enforcement. Such an assumption of virtuous morality was neither more nor less than downright tyranny, based on an affectation of moral superiority, and a monstrous invasion of the rights of individuals. In the absence of explanation from the hon. Member for Hartlepool, he was driven to speculate and to look at this question as one which might be brought forward in the interest of those who were called total abstainers. But the hon. Gentleman possibly might belong to those who thought temperate drinking permissible. If that were so, he appealed to him as a moderate drinker to know what right had he to lay down any rule as to the restriction of Sunday drinking? Beer was the Englishman's natural drink. Some time ago one of the Liquor Alliance Leagues offered several large prizes, ranging from £700 down, to the person who would produce the best non-alcoholic beverage to take the place of beer. In spite of those repeated and, as they were considered at the time, brilliant offers, the League never succeeded. There was no liquor so suitable, so palatable to the English taste, so pure, so invigorating, or so cheap as beer. It was, therefore, in his opinion, nothing short of absolute cruelty to deprive the public from getting beer when they required it on Sundays. The poor man was unable to afford laying in a stock of bottled beer, and malt liquor purchased on a Saturday night for consumption on Sunday lost its excellent flavour and became flat, if not tasteless. In fact, those who proposed such an arrangement displayed an utter ignorance of the national habits, and he was inclined to assume that the hon. Member for Hartlepool participated in that ignorance. At present public-houses on Sunday were regulated by law, and certain hours were fixed, both inside and outside the Metropolitan Police district, as well as throughout the country, for the sale of liquors. These rules and limits were arrived at after careful examination, and might be regarded as the result of compromise. He did not ask that public-houses should be kept open the whole of Sunday; but what he contended for was that there should be at seasonable periods ample time given for the purchase of beer, so that the comforts of an Englishman's family might not be in any degree either encroached upon or interfered with. On the principle of Christian charity, they ought to shrink from curtailing the pleasures of the thousands of young men, clerks and shopmen, in London who resided in lodgings. How often did they find the arrogance of science united with the fanaticism of religion? They knew how medical opinion changed on this subject of liquor. Some doctors prescribed a good deal of brandy as likely to benefit the patient. At other times they pronounced brandy to be poison. On one occasion the physician said it would be well for the patient to drink whisky; within 24 hours he declared it must not be touched. It need not be said that all over the world some form of exhilaration was required. The necessity and the habit of taking some stimulant was ingrained in many people's constitutions. They knew there was a virtue in generous liquor, and that it did them good and not harm. Were they to be put on the same level as persons who drank to excess for the mere sake of drinking, and simply because a number of fanatics drank nothing at all? Whichever of the latter two classes it was that was represented by the voiceless Gentleman who had charge of this Bill, he had very little respect for them. He should like to know what the hon. Gentleman would think if a Bill were brought in to compel him to drink so much liquor? The hon. Gentleman would doubtless say it was a terrible violation of private rights; but it would be only a fair counterpoise to the action of the teetotallers; for if A had a right to say that B should not drink at all, surely B had an equal right to say that A should drink a certain quantity. What he (Mr. Warton) wanted was a fair recognition of individual and personal rights. If a man drank too much and made a noise in the streets, he rendered himself amenable to the police; but if a man did not interfere with the public order, he ought not to be meddled with. Moreover, the effect of this kind of legislation had been to increase rather than to lessen drunkenness, and there was far less excuse now for introducing these Bills than there was five years ago. The House knew what had happened in regard to Wales. There was more Sunday drunkenness in Wales since the passing of the Sunday Closing Act in that country than ever there was before. In Cardiff, Swansea, Denbigh, and Flint Sunday clubs had increased immensely, and the police all testified to the evil results of the Act. At Cardiff there had been disgraceful disclosures. Two or three Catholic clergymen came forward and gave the most revolting evidence as to the dens of infamy which had grown up in Cardiff since the Act came into operation. The advantages of drinking in a public-house over drinking in these secret dens were obvious. In the one case, there were the securities of law and order; in the other, there was every facility and incitement to law-breaking and crime. At Cardiff it was shown that young girls were debauched at these so-called clubs, and the priests to whom he had referred called attention to it in the interests of humanity. The private drinking clubs in Wales had quintupled since the passing of that wretched pharisaical piece of Sunday legislation; and hon. Gentlemen who brought in these Bills year after year showed a strange disposition to shut their eyes to the facts. Looking at the deserted condition of the Treasury Bench at the present moment, he thought it was rather disgraceful that no Member of the Government was present. He would particularly like to see the Home Secretary in his place, in order to remind the right hon. Gentleman of the answer which he gave some time ago with regard to the Police Report from Flint. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that because the Mayor of Flint was interested in the liquor trade, therefore the Inspector's Report as to the tremendous increase of Sunday drunkenness was not deserving of attention, and must be pooh-poohed in the Home Secretary's grand manner. But he (Mr. Warton) strongly objected to that manner of answering a Question, and he now quoted the incident as having a bearing upon the subject under discussion. He did not know whether any Welsh Members would take part in this debate—he noticed that most of them had discreetly kept away; but he challenged them to deny that since the passing of the Act there had been an immense increase of drunkenness, and terrible scenes had taken place. Hon. Gentlemen who promoted these Bills did not seem to understand human nature, or they would know that prohibition often lent a stimulus to enjoyment. The fact that Sunday drinking was prohibited and difficult would make lots of people more anxious to drink on Sunday, for "stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant." To be told not to do a thing was a great temptation to go and do it. He advised hon. Gentlemen to study the fable of the hen and her chicken. The hen warned the chicken not to go near the well. The chicken would not have thought of going there; but, of course, directly he was told not to do so, he went and tumbled in; and his dying words were—

"Hadn't it been for prohibition
I ne'er had been in this condition."

The hon. Member who brought forward the Bill seemed now to have retired into an obscure corner of the House. He hoped they should have a few words from the hon. Member, and he would appeal to him to try and grapple with those facts with regard to Wales. Personally, he felt bound to condemn the Bill as an unnecessary and unwarranted interference with a great and respectable trade, an infringement of private rights and liberties, a measure incompatible with the spirit of true Englishmen, and inspired only by a canting, fanatical, and sanctimonious hypocrisy. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Warton.)

MR. H. G. ALLEN: The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) has referred to the operation of the Sunday Closing Act in Wales, and has incidentally alluded to myself in relation to that matter; but I have to state that the information I possess on the subject leads me to take a totally different view from that expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman. It is very true, as he has stated, that in Cardiff, which is a place where certain exceptional circumstances may be cited as against the operation of the Sunday Closing Act, the measure had not been so successful as I have every reason to believe it has been throughout the rest of the Principality of Wales. I can certainly say, without hesitation, that within the limits of my own constituency the Sunday Closing Act is regarded as an incontestable boon. There is hardly a single person in my constituency, unless among the publicans—and I am told that there are many even of them who appreciate the advantage of having a holiday on Sunday—but, at any rate, I believe there is hardly anyone in my constituency, and very few to be found in the constituencies of other hon. Members representing the interests of the people of Wales, who do not regard the Sunday Closing Act as a measure which has been productive of great and most valuable results. With respect to the town of Cardiff, which has very naturally been put in the forefront of the argument used by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport, there are, as I have already stated, peculiar circumstances which have caused the Sunday Closing Act not to be so successful there as it has been in other parts of the Principality. The hon. Member was, no doubt, quite right in saying that a great deal of drinking goes on in unlicensed houses, such, for instance, as sham clubs, which it will probably be the duty of the Legislature to put an end to, if the means of so doing can be found without further interference than is desirable with the convenience of the public. Among the peculiar circumstances that exist in Cardiff, one of the most noticeable is that there is in that town a large and constantly floating population, composed of seamen from all parts of the world, who do not know what to do with themselves on the Sabbath day, and who indulge, to a great extent, in the pernicious habit of drinking. In this respect Cardiff undoubtedly differs from most other places in Wales; and there is another circumstance which tends to place that seaport in an exceptional position as compared with other places in the Principality—namely, that the town is situated within about a mile and a half of the English Border, so that on Sunday, during the hours the public-houses are open in England, it becomes a sort of amusement and bravado on the part of certain portions of the Cardiff population, finding the public-houses in their own town all closed, to walk across the Border into the neighbouring county of Monmouth for the purpose of having a drink. There can be no doubt that this custom has engendered a certain amount of drunkenness, and that a certain number of persons who thus go into England, and who begin to drink by way of joke, often end in taking a good deal more than they intended when they first set out from the place in which the Sunday Closing Act is enforced. In this way a good deal of drunkenness among the Cardiff population may be accounted for; but, notwithstanding the energetic appeal made to me by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport, I am not able to say what the total effect of the Sunday Closing Act in Wales has been. No doubt there is some evidence in support of the view the hon. and learned Member has taken. He is right in saying that one of the Roman Catholic pastors in Cardiff has made statements adverse to the Sunday Closing Act; but I may mention that after the Easter holidays I happened to be returning to town, through Cardiff, by train, when several gentlemen of that town, one or two of whom I was well acquainted with, got into the carriage in which I was, and I asked them what they considered to have been the effect of the Sunday Closing Act in Cardiff. I am sorry to say that their opinion was that, as to Cardiff, mischief had been done in the way of promoting the establishment of the sham clubs and unlicensed houses, and thus producing a good deal of Sunday drinking. Two of the gentlemen I have referred to, whose testimony I think I could rely upon, said, notwithstanding the statement of the reverend gentleman, or any other evidence that may have been adduced, that they believed that on the whole the Sunday Closing Act had been productive of a balance of benefit. In Cardiff, as I have already shown, the matter stands on peculiar and exceptional grounds; but in other places throughout the Principality—and I do not think that even Swansea can be termed an exception, although as a large seaport with a great many sailors constantly reckoned among its population it might be so—I am of opinion that there is no exception to the general rule. I am quite confident that, for the reasons I have mentioned, whatever may be the case with regard to Cardiff, the Sunday Closing Act throughout the whole of the rest of Wales is greatly appreciated by the inhabitants. As the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) did me the honour to refer to me, I have thought it right to give my testimony on the question; and, in conclusion, I may express my belief that the more the matter is inquired into, as far as the operation of the Act in regard to Wales is concerned, the more clearly will it be shown that I am right in the views I have expressed.

MR. MONK said, he thought the House would agree that there could be no two opinions as to the inconvenience of an hon. Member moving the second reading of a Bill of which he was not in charge. Up to the present moment the House had had no explanation whatever of this Bill, and the two hon. Members who had addressed the House had been discussing a different measure from that which was before the House. He would proceed, therefore, to tell the House what this Bill was. It was a misnomer to call it a Sunday Closing Bill. It was really a Bill for further restricting the hours during which public-houses should be opened on Sunday. A distinction was drawn between public-houses in the Metropolitan district and in towns and populous places; but he could not find that the expression “a town or populous place” was defined in any part of the Bill. He was of opinion that if it was desirable that public-houses should be opened for the sale of liquor during a portion of the Sunday in a populous place, it was desirable that they should be permitted to be open throughout the country for the same purpose. However, this Bill provided that if the premises were situated in the Metropolitan district they should be open on Sunday afternoons from 1 to 3 o'clock, and on Sunday evenings from 7 to 10; and he did not suppose that anyone would take exception to that limitation. If the premises were situated outside the Metropolitan district, but within the Metropolitan Police district or a town or populous place, then they were to be open from half-past 12 to half-past 2, and from 7 to 9. That he thought was a very reasonable limitation, and so far as it went he could support the Bill. But then it was provided that if the premises were situated outside a town or populous place they should be closed altogether, except for the sale of liquor to be consumed off the premises. There might be a considerable divergence of opinion as to whether that was not too large a limitation. He must ask those in charge of the Bill to define what they meant by a populous place, whether it was a place of 1,000 or 2,000 inhabitants, and to undertake to insert that definition in the Bill? If the hon. Member for North Durham, whose name was on the back of the Bill, would give an assurance that in Committee Sub-section (b) of Clause 1 should be extended so as to allow the sale of liquor off the premises in rural districts during the same hours as its sale was permitted in towns, he would not oppose the second reading. But if he found that this Bill was merely another phase of the Alliance Bill, and was meant to prevent the sale of liquor throughout the country on one of the days of the week, he would oppose the second reading.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he thought that the House had some reason to complain of the manner in which this Bill had been brought forward. The general subject of Sunday closing had been discussed; but that question did not really arise, because they were considering a Bill which, proposing a certain definite change in the law of licensing, did not attempt to bring about the complete closing of public-houses on Sunday. That, therefore, was not the question they had now to consider. The Memorandum which had been printed with the Bill in order to explain the measure stated that it was not proposed to alter the present law relating to the bond fide traveller or to railway refreshment rooms; but he found no exceptions of that nature in the Bill. The fact was a Memorandum on a Bill of this character was out of place, and they ought to have had the Bill explained by some hon. Member who was responsible for its production. The whole Bill had been drafted in the most vague terms possible, and it was difficult to forecast what its exact effect would be, while its Preamble entirely misdescribed its objects. Moreover, he was of opinion that a question of this kind was far too large a question to be taken up by one or two private Members. If anything of the nature of Sunday closing or the alteration of hours on Sunday was to be carried out, it ought to be by the Government; and the House would be perfectly justified in resisting, without reference to the merits of the proposal, any attempt in this direction by a private Member. The truth was that these so-called Temperance Bills went upon a wrong principle altogether. More good would be done by cultivating a taste for non-intoxicating liquors than by continually interfering with the sale of intoxicants. He suggested that an inducement should be offered to the keepers of public-houses and refreshment-houses, by allowing them longer hours for the sale of non-intoxicants, which would be an inducement to them to improve the quality of those beverages. He objected altogether to the way in which licensed victuallers were regarded by the promoters of these Bills, who appeared to look upon them as a sort of criminals, or, at any rate, as persons only to be barely tolerated. Hon. Gentlemen appeared to wish to make licensed victuallers as uncomfortable as possible, and to drive all the best men out of the trade. He thought that was a most unfair and unwise policy, and that Parliament ought not to lose sight altogether of the interests of the licensed victuallers. In putting the trade under restrictions they ought to have regard to the conditions under which the licensed victualler carried on his business, and they ought not grievously and without due reason to hamper him in the exercise of his trade. The scheme proposed by the Bill was a crude one, and if adopted would lead to considerable inconvenience. He should, therefore, vote against the second reading of the measure.

MR. CHARLES PALMER said, the second reading of the Bill being moved to-day had undoubtedly taken the House by surprise; and he could not but regret that the other hon. Gentlemen whose names were on the back of the Bill were not present to take part in the discussion. The hon. Member who had just sat down had devoted the whole of his speech to criticizing the manner in which the Bill had been drawn. He (Mr. Charles Palmer) did not wish to follow him in that respect. He wished to say, as his name appeared on the back of the Bill, that those who had brought it forward regarded it as a sort of compromise between the existing condition of things and the extreme measure of total Sunday closing. When hon. Members saw on the back of a Bill the names of Members on both sides of the House, they had no difficulty in believing that there was some likelihood of its being generally accepted. He could assure the House that if it was allowed to pass the second reading stage there would be no difficulty in amending it in Committee, so as to put it in such a form that it would meet with general approval. He did not propose to go into the whole question of Sunday closing; but this he might say, that the question was one which affected the working classes peculiarly, and that if he did not think that the majority of working men—especially in the North of England—were in favour of such a measure as this, he should be the last to recommend it. If even a large minority of working men were against it, he should not be found supporting it; but he believed it was accepted by them as a move in the right direction—towards temperance. As a large employer of labour, he could only say that if they could get rid of this Sunday drinking it would conduce very materially to their men coming to work with certainty and regularity on Monday mornings. That, however, was a very large question, and he did not propose to go into it. He only wished to assure the House, as one whose name was on the back of the Bill, that if it was allowed to go to a second reading, he should be quite prepared to assist in amending it so as to meet the general wishes of the House.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): I had no intention of taking any part in the discussion when I came down to the House this afternoon; and I am sorry to say that so little did I think the Bill would be taken to-day, that I did not read it before coming down. However, I have read it since I have been here; and as there is no one else to speak upon it from this Bench, and as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) has made allusion to what he calls the failure of the Welsh Sunday Closing Act, I ask the indulgence of the House whilst I make two or three observations. The hon. and learned Gentleman is altogether incorrect in his statement, and I agree with what has already been stated to the House with regard to the Welsh Sunday Closing Act—namely, that it has proved a great boon to Wales. It is, indeed, felt—particularly in the Border Counties, one of which I have the honour to represent—that it does not go far enough. That opinion, I believe, is also entertained in Cardiff. The evil consists in people going for drink from the Welsh counties, where the public-houses are closed on Sundays, into the English counties, where the public-houses are open. They walk sometimes four or five miles, and think at the end of the journey that they have a right to indemnify themselves for it by drinking more than is good for them. Such increase of drunkenness as there has been on Sunday has, I believe, taken place in districts which are within easy reach of public-houses which remain open on Sunday. But to come to this Bill—it really is not a “Sunday Closing Act” at all. It establishes three different systems of closing. In the Metropolitan district it fixes the closing hours at from 7 to 10. It specifies another closing time for other populous places; and it is only in the rural districts where public-houses are to be closed during the whole of Sunday, except for certain purposes. With regard to the alleged difficulty of defining the words “populous places,” I think the fears on that head are altogether groundless. My impression is that the words have received either a statutory or a judicial interpretation; but if not it will be easy to find an acceptable definition when we get into Committee. On the whole, I do not think the Bill is open to the objection which has been taken to it. At any rate, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Charles Palmer), who is the only Member present whose name is on the back of the Bill, has met hon. Gentlemen who are inclined to take exception to it in a very fair and liberal spirit. He has promised that all the Amendments which may be put down for the Committee stage shall be carefully considered, and that modifications may be introduced. Under the circumstances, the Bill being a fair one, as well as a short and simple one, I think the House should affirm its principle by giving it a second reading, and should leave all objections to it to be dealt with in Committee.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD said, that if it were proved that the great majority of the working classes were desirous of having the Bill passed, he would not say one word against it. He had taken the trouble to search in the Library for Petitions respecting it, and he had found one Petition signed by one person in favour of it, and one Petition signed by one person in opposition to it. Under those circumstances, how could it be said that the masses of the middle and the working classes were in favour of this Bill? He spoke with all due deference of, and even with sympathy with, those who desired to promote temperance in this country. In fact, all right-minded people were in favour of promoting temperance. But what Members present but teetotallers were there who did not take wine or beer on Sundays? Let them have no hypocrisy on that subject. If the Act were brought to bear upon public-houses, and the working and the lower middle classes were to be deprived of their beer or their spirits on Sundays, then let the Clubs—the Carlton, the Reform, the Devonshire, and others—be closed. Public-houses were the clubs of the poor; and a certain amount of political capital was being made out of this question by the one side or the other, which ought not to be the case. Were they prepared to apply that restriction of liberty provided by the Bill for one class of the community without applying it to the others. If so, why did they not say so? The truth of the matter was that they dared not do so. It was a dangerous thing to make laws to prescribe the liberties of any one class, while they did not apply them to themselves and to other classes. While he believed if all others as well as the working classes agreed to go without intoxicating liquors on Sundays they would be none the worse for so doing, at the same time, so long as Members of that House thought fit to drink wine or beer on Sundays, they had no right to object to the middle and the working classes being in a position to get their beer, wine, or spirits on Sundays. He should oppose the second reading of the Bill.

MR. GOURLEY, in moving the adjournment of the debate, said, he could not understand why, if the rich man could have wine and beer or spirits at his house on Sunday, the middle and the working classes should not be allowed on that day to procure such beverages at the only place where they were in a position to obtain it. He could not support the Bill, because it was only of a partial character—it merely aimed at partially closing public-houses on Sundays. He was not only in favour of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday; but he was, also, in favour of Local Option as advocated by the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), whose absence and the cause for it they all so much deplored. At the same time, he was not in favour of such a measure as the present. He begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. P. H. MUNTZ, in seconding the Motion, said, that so long as there were several millions of men who were interested in the subject who had not been consulted, and who had had no voice in the matter, it was only fair that the debate should be adjourned. The Bill, as presented to the House, was of a hybrid, imperfect character, which ought not to be allowed to pass in its existing form. If they were to stop drinking on Sundays let them begin at home. Let them begin at that House. [Laughter.] Well, let them begin at the Clubs. Why were the Members of the Clubs to have their beer, wine, and spirits, while the poor man was not allowed to go for a walk into the country and have his glass of ale or spirits?

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Debate be now adjourned.”

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Wednesday next.

PUBLIC HEALTH (MEMBERS AND OFFICERS) BILL.—[BILL 114.]

(Sir John Kennaway, Mr. Long, Mr. Cowen.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ACLAND, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the points raised by the Bill were that the officers and members of Local Authorities might be exempted from certain penalties which were now, in such a manner as to entail grievous public inconvenience, attached to their having any interest in the sale, purchase, lease, or hiring under contracts, with particular Companies of which they were shareholders, or in respect of advertisements in newspapers in which they might have some interest.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Acland.)

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, the Bill had the entire concurrence of the Local Government Board.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (QUARTER SESSION BOROUGH) BILL.

(Mr. Dodds, Mr. John Bright, Mr. Barran, Mr. Jackson.)

[BILL 133.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DODDS, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to repeal the 2nd section of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Dodds.)

MR. HIBBERT said, that the Bill had only been issued this morning, and the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department was engaged in a Committee upstairs. He would therefore suggest that the debate should be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Hibbert,)—put, and agreed to.

(Mr. Acland, Mr. Elton, Viscount Ebrington, Mr. Cheetham.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ACLAND, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that the object of the Bill was to enable Highway Boards to take proper care of the fences and the trees overhanging highways, and to act for this purpose in such a manner, and at such times, as might be most useful for the purpose, and most convenient to the ratepayers and other inhabitants of their districts. By the present law owners and occupiers only could be compelled to act for this purpose during part of the year, and that part was not the spring or summer.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Acland.)

MR. ELTON said, that he had assisted in drafting the Bill, which had the unanimous support of the people of the West of England.

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, the Bill had the assent of the Local Government Board.

MR. WARTON objected to this Ministerial way of moving the second reading of a Bill, and he objected also to the Bill, which embodied a mischievous interference with the rights of property.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT wished to know what was the present state of the law?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, the Bill had been carefully considered by the permanent officials of the Local Government Board, and it extended to the whole year what could only now be done during part of the year. The Bill was permissive only, and enabled Local Authorities to charge upon the rates, if they thought proper, the costs of carrying the Bill into execution.

MR. P. PHIPPS said, the Bill, though short, contained a pernicious principle. The rates were already too heavy on houses and landed property. He protested against hasty legislation of this kind, and intimated his intention to vote against any measure which put an additional burden on the rates. Common decency called upon the promoters of the Bill not to press for a second reading that afternoon.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 87; Noes 28: Majority 59.—(Div. List, No. 120.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday.

MOTION.

—o—

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE said, he begged to move the adjournment of the House. He did so on the ground that the Registration Bills, which were understood to be the Business of the day, had been disposed of.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Sir William Hart Dyke.)

MR. CALLAN expressed his surprise at a Motion of this kind being made at an early hour of the afternoon (3.25). He was also greatly surprised to find that the Motion was proposed by a prominent Member on the Front Opposition Bench. He did not think that tactics of this kind were at all seemly, because they gave the appearance of a desire to shirk the discussion of subjects intimately connected with Ireland. There were three questions on the Order Paper of great interest to Ireland—the appointment of a Select Committee on the industries of Ireland, the consideration of a Bill affecting barristers in Ireland, and a measure dealing with private lunatic asylums in that country. The Motion to appoint a Select Committee for the purpose of inquiring into the industries of Ireland had been upon the Paper for some time, and the hon. Member who had introduced it had obtained leave to bring it in on Wednesday. Now, when there was a fair chance of the Committee being appointed, and the Business portion of the day was over, an effort was made to prevent the Committee from being formed. On these grounds he objected to the Motion for Adjournment.

MR. HEALY said, he thought that a Motion of this kind indicated a want of faith in the power of talk which had hitherto characterized hon. and right hon. Gentlemen of the Conservative Party. In regard to measures which were looked upon with disfavour by the Tory Party, the practice had hitherto been to talk against time; but now different tactics were adopted. What was the reason of this falling-off in the powers of talk of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen? He had never known them on previous occasions to display so much powerlessness. He believed that the real motive of this Motion was to prevent his hon. Friend bringing forward his Bill admitting barristers to practise in Ireland without the necessity of their coming to England to eat their terms. Being Wednesday, a count could not be moved until 4 o'clock, and they did not wish to keep the Speaker in the Chair until that hour. The right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) occupied a very distinguished place at the Bar of Ireland; and he did not think that he would have been a party to moving the adjournment of the House when a Motion which so much concerned Irish Law students was upon the Paper. As private Members got so few opportunities of bringing forward legislation on Wednesdays, he appealed to the right hon. Baronet to withdraw his Motion until, at least, the Irish Business was disposed of.

MR. GIBSON said, he believed that his right hon. Friend who moved the adjournment of the House did so, not because he had been prompted, but because he himself thought it right, and accordingly he had introduced the topic himself in his usual clear, precise way. The hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) said that the Conservative Party appeared to have "lost credulity in their powers of talk." That was a serious charge.

MR. HEALY: I said your own powers of talking.

MR. GIBSON said that this was a more serious charge still; for to suggest gravely that an Irishman had lost faith in this power was to suggest that he had lost faith in the gifts of his race. He would not attempt to pursue the hon. Member in the various topics which had been introduced, and he did not feel inclined to discuss the various Bills which had been referred to. The next Bill which he saw on the Paper was one dealing with sporting lands in Scotland, which he did not know very much about. There was also a Bill about the River Thames. One of the reasons why he supported the Motion for Adjournment was that on that day there had been a rush of Bills through the House. Some of them had been passed without any discussion, and some with only a few observations from hon. Members. Now, if Bills were to be rushed through in that way legislation would be reduced to an absurdity. With regard to the Bill of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) for the admission of barristers, he might, of course, say that he knew something about it. The Benchers would, he believed, discuss the matter that day; and but for the lamentable death of the late Lord Chancellor (Sir Edward Sullivan), an eminent Irish Judge, he believed the matter would have been discussed some time ago. It was obvious that the matter was one for the calm consideration of those who were concerned in the administration of justice, and the government of the Bar and law students in Ireland. With regard to the other matter—the Motion for the appointment of a Select Committee upon Irish industries—that was a Motion upon which they were all agreed that there would be no difficulty whatever in the hon. Member bringing on the Motion to-morrow night or any other time.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY hoped that the Motion for the adjournment of the House would be withdrawn. It would be vexatious to interfere with the discussion of the Bills of private Members.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE disclaimed having made that Motion at the suggestion of his right hon. and learned Friend. He had done so simply on the broad ground of policy. They had met to discuss the two Registration Bills, and they having been disposed of they found themselves face to face unexpectedly with a number of private Members' Bills, and at the mercy of the Movers of these Bills. He would, however, be the last man to go against the general feeling of the House on such a matter.

MR. SPEAKER asked whether the right hon. Baronet wished to withdraw his Motion?

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE: Yes, Sir.

Question put, and negatived.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CALLAN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he thought it would be necessary for him to say a few words as to the object and scope of the Bill. A similar Bill was read a second time in 1874 by a majority of 56 on a division; but the General Election taking place just afterwards, it did not reach a further stage. In 1881 the Bill was read a second time again; but again circumstances arose which prevented it being proceeded with. Once more it came before Parliament on the present occasion. The object of the measure was to repeal an Act of Henry VIII., made perpetual by an Act of Queen Elizabeth, requiring Irish Law students to come within the Realm of England for the purpose of studying Law. At the time those Acts were passed there was no School of Law in Ireland, and no Law lectures were delivered there. But now Professorships of Law existed in Trinity College and King's Inn, Dublin, and students preparing for the Irish Bar were compelled to attend lectures, to pass an examination, and to pay fees in Ireland; and yet, after all that, they must come to London, enter one of the English Inns of Court, and make further payments of fees. That system involved an interruption of the studies of the person whom it affected, and also entailed on them a useless expenditure of time and money. Those Irish Law students had to eat and pay for six dinners at four different periods of the year in London, but they were not required to attend lectures or to pass an examination in London; and he could not, therefore, see any possible reason why such an absurd and inconvenient practice should be continued. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the senior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) had asserted on a former occasion that the old practice of requiring Irish Law students to eat a certain number of dinners in the English capital was found to work very beneficially. For himself, he could not understand how that should be so; although, if the dinners were eaten in the salubrious air of Brighton, the case might perhaps be rather different. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, he believed, was a Director of the London and North Western Railway Company, and perhaps the existing system of compelling Irish Law students to travel to and from England for the purpose of keeping their terms here promoted the interests of that Company. Perhaps that was the reason why he looked upon those half-a-dozen dinners as being so beneficial? Now, those dinners were eaten just at a time when the music halls and theatres were open, and the students were prevented attending the music hall, though probably they would prefer the higher class of entertainment which was to be found at the theatre. A Petition numerous signed by Law students in Dublin had been presented to the Benchers of the King's Inns praying that the present system might be done away with. In 1881 the Benchers unanimously decided against the Bill; and the Chief Secretary of that day (Mr. W. E. Forster) stated in the House that he could see no reason why the practice should exist of Irish Law students having to eat a certain number of dinners in London. On that occasion the Chief Secretary threw over the Solicitor General and the Benchers, and the Bill was read a second time. If the system was to be maintained, why should there not be reciprocity? Surely it was as essential that English barristers should know Ireland as that Irish barristers should know England? If English students were sent to Dublin he could promise them a kindly and hospitable reception. He begged to move that the Bill be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Callan.)

MR. GIBSON said, that the hon. Member had made his Motion with great good humour, as if he cherished pleasant memories of the good things provided for him at the King's Inns, and possibly also of the good things provided in the Inns on this side of the water. He should much have preferred seeing some Members of the Government representing Ireland in their places on that occasion, and he certainly should have liked to see the Solicitor General for Ireland present, as the hon. and learned Gentleman was a Bencher of King's Inn. He was anxious that the Benchers of King's Inn should have an opportunity of being heard on the question. He gladly admitted that the education provided for Law students in Ireland was extremely good; and it might, at first sight, appear that there was no occasion for their visiting the English Schools of Law. He feared, however, that if the measure were passed without reservation or qualification it might be regarded by some as tending to the lowering of the character of the Irish Bar. [Laughter from Irish Members below the Gangway.] He meant that with some the Irish Bar might afterwards be viewed as a Provincial Bar instead of as part of the Bar of the United Kingdom. Irish Law students had distinguished themselves greatly at the English Inns, and obtained Law studentships and many of the greatest prizes there, and their sojourn in England had often been attended with many advantages. The hon. Member had mentioned a Memorial signed by Law students in support of the Bill. Such a Memorial had, it was true, been presented to the Benchers of the King's Inns; but a counter Memorial signed by a still larger number of students had also been presented in opposition to the measure. The whole subject would have been considered by the Benchers a week ago had their meeting not been adjourned out of respect to the memory of the late eminent Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Sir Edward Sullivan. As it was, subject was being considered by them that very day. That being so, he held that it would be reasonable, before coming to a decision on the Bill, to wait for the opinion which those whose duty it was to supervise the education of Law students in Ireland would shortly announce. He, therefore, begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. WARTON said, he would second the Amendment. Personally he had derived much pleasure from the Society of Irish students in the English Inns of Court. The dinners of the Inns of Court would lose all their salt without the Irish students, and he, for one, should be very sorry to lose them. A practice which was founded on an Act of Parliament passed in the Reign of Henry VIII. should not be lightly laid aside. He thought the House would do well to wait, before agreeing to the second reading, until the Benchers of the King's Inns should have made public their views on the matter.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Gibson.)

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that this was not a question as to which Her Majesty's Government had any direct responsibility, or over which they sought to control. He confessed that he had no strong prejudices on the subject one way or another; but it would certainly appear at first sight that the burden of proof rested with those who sought to maintain the present system, which was necessarily in itself an artificial system. He was not, however, prepared to say whether it was advantageous or disadvantageous that the present system should be continued; but he thought there was great force in the observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson). As he said, it was now proposed to change a custom which had prevailed for a long period, and as to which there was a difference of opinion. The persons most interested and most entitled to form a judgment on the subject were the Benchers. They had received Memorials both for and against this change, and had met to discuss the subject; but owing to the melancholy death of the Lord Chancellor their meeting had been adjourned. As the Bill had been reached unexpectedly that afternoon and the meeting of the Benchers had been adjourned through no fault of their own, he thought it would be discourteous in the House of Commons to proceed with the Bill until it was in possession of the views of the Benchers on the subject. Under these circumstances, he should be prepared to support the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

MR. HEALY remarked that he was extremely glad that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had at last come out in his true colours. He was delighted to find him supporting the Motion for Adjournment. In 1881, in the middle of the Coercion campaign, even the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), in the teeth of the unanimous opposition of the Benchers, supported this Bill, and it was read a second time without a division. Now, four years afterwards, simply because the Benchers chose to let three months pass without coming to a decision which, when it would be come to, nobody would regard as being worth twopence, the Chief Secretary stood up there and supported a Motion to shelve this matter. The question had been before the public for some years, and everyone knew what the Benchers' opinions on the matter were. He ventured to think that this question was one not for Benchers, barristers, or students, but for the general public to pronounce an opinion upon; and it was well worthy of the present Chief Secretary that, disregarding the course taken by his Predecessor, he should stand up and support the miserable subterfuge of the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University, in order thereby to insure the defeat of this Bill. It was of importance to the people of Ireland, who were prevented by the present mediæval arrangements from going into the Profession in large numbers, that this Bill should be passed.

MR. R. T. REID said, he did not rise for the purpose of denouncing the Chief Secretary for Ireland; but he thought it was a matter very much to be regretted that he should offer any opposition to this Bill until he knew the opinion of the Benchers. He had some experience of Benchers. They were an excellent body of gentlemen, no doubt; but they were a body of men who had no more right to speak on behalf of the Bar than they had to speak on behalf of the House of Commons. This was a matter on which, in his humble opinion, the House of Commons were as competent to form an opinion as the Benchers or anybody else. If they had to wait until they had the opinion of Judges and Benchers for legal reform, they would have very little reform indeed. As regards the attitude taken up by the Chief Secretary, he would like to know what the right hon. Gentleman would say if no advocate could be called in Scotland until he came up to London to eat a certain number of dinners? Why, the Scotch would rebel against such an idea. Yet that was what now happened in the case of Ireland, and the reason for it probably was that in former days it was presumed there was no adequate legal training to be had in Ireland. That reason had disappeared, and it was admitted that there were now admirable means of legal training in Ireland. For his own part, seeing the many distinguished men who raised themselves to positions at the Bar, notwithstanding great pecuniary difficulties, he did not understand why this burden should be left upon Law students in Ireland, especially when they get nothing in return for it.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, that he happened to be a Benchers, and he was glad to see that his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. R. T. Reid) still believed that there was some excellence left in Benchers. He did not think that the regulation complained of in this instance should still be maintained; and he ventured to hope, therefore, that his right hon. and learned Friend would withdraw his Motion for the Adjournment. His hon. and learned Friend behind him (Mr. Warton) said he had not made up his mind; but he (Sir Henry Holland) had made up his mind, and he was dead against Henry VIII., in whose reign this absurd regulation was made. There was no doubt that excellent legal education was now given in Ireland, and it did seem preposterous that in this 19th century Irish barristers should be compelled to come to London to eat a certain number of dinners before they could practise their Profession in their own country.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he did not propose to go into the merits of this Bill; but he agreed with his hon. Friend who had just spoken in appealing to his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) to withdraw his Motion. The reason accepted and enforced by the Chief Secretary for the adjournment of the subject seemed to him to be against it. He understood that the Benchers of the King's Inns had met that day to express their opinion on this matter. If they decided in favour of the change, the adjournment of the debate now would render it impracticable for the Bill to be passed this Session. On the other hand, if the Benchers were against the Bill, the entire force of the two Front Benches in the House could be brought against the Bill on its third reading.

MR. ELTON said, that he, too, was dead against Henry VIII. The reasons given in support of the Motion for Adjournment were totally inadequate, and the House would not consult its dignity by upholding a Motion meant to kill a Bill which they might expect received the support of the barristers and students of Ireland. He agreed with the remarks which had been made with respect to the Benchers. They were a self-elected body, and in this country so little represented the views and interests of the Bar that they had to be assisted by a Committee elected by the Bar at large.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER remarked that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin would have been more successful in his plea for delay if he had omitted expressing any opinion on the merits of the Bill. When, however, he told the House that the Bill would tend to lower the Bar of Ireland, he showed that there were other grounds on which he opposed the Bill. He hoped, however, the result of the division would give a direct negative to the opinion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. If the Chief Secretary succeeded in getting this Bill defeated to-day, he would be bound to provide facilities for legislation later on in the Session. A great deal had been said with regard to the opinion of the Benchers. As a Member of the Middle Temple, he had had plenty of opportunity of forming an opinion as to the estimation in which the Benchers were held. No one having any knowledge of the views and wishes of the Bar would think of bending to the authority of the Benchers for a single moment on questions of reform. The Irish Benchers, he had no doubt, occupied a like position, and on a question of reform no one would think of asking the opinion of the Benchers either in England or Ireland.

MR. PLUNKET said, that this question was, no doubt, of considerable importance to those who were immediately interested in it. He could not, upon a Motion for Adjournment, enter into the merits of the proposal; but his opinion was that the advantages of the present system were very obvious. He supported the Motion for Adjournment on the ground that the question was now under the consideration of the Benchers in Dublin; and it was perfectly plain that the Bill had been brought on quite by surprise. He had the honour to be one of the Benchers of the only Inn of Court there was in Ireland—the King's Inns—and the statement that the Benchers were not a good authority to pronounce an opinion and give advice on this subject seemed to him to be one of the most extravagantly Radical propositions he had ever heard. The Benchers knew the practice and working of the Bar in Ireland, and he was quite sure that they enjoyed the confidence and represented the general opinion of the Bar. [Cries of "No!"]

MR. SEXTON: They refused to admit A. M. Sullivan to the Bar.

MR. GIBSON: He was admitted to the Bar in Ireland.

MR. CALLAN: After he was admitted to the English Bar.

MR. PLUNKET said, it appeared that a Petition had been presented by certain students who desired to have the law changed; but a Petition on the other side, rather more numerously signed, had also been presented, and he thought it would not be decent under such circumstances to pass over and take no notice of the opinions of the Judges and distinguished members of the Bar upon the subject. They were told that because the Chief Secretary supported the adjournment that he had appeared in his true colours, and that he desired to tyrannize over the Irish people. The imputation was perfectly ridiculous. It did not in the least matter to the Irish people what the opinion of the Chief Secretary on this particular subject might be. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

Hon. Members said so over and over again. He hoped the House would agree to the very reasonable proposal for adjournment, which did not decide upon the merits of the case, and that the debate would be delayed until they received the opinion of the Benchers.

MR. ONSLOW said, he entirely disagreed with the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench. He wished to point out that this question had been discussed on a previous occasion; and the Bill had not, therefore, taken them entirely by surprise. If the students could get a proper education in Ireland without coming to this country he failed to see why the Bill should not be read a second time. It appeared to him that no facts had been adduced to show that the Bar would in any way suffer by the change contemplated. This was an Irish grievance which ought to be remedied, but it was evident that the Bill could not be brought on again this Session if the House now carried the Motion for Adjournment.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he hoped the Motion for Adjournment would be withdrawn. The question was not a new one. The Bill afforded an opportunity of removing a very irritating grievance felt by the Irish people, and the House had now an opportunity of doing what was just and right. The opposition to this Bill had always been in inverse ratio to the social and legal position of those who had spoken about it. The people who felt the grievance were the students, who had to go to the expense of coming to England. The Judges and Benchers did not feel the grievance, because they had obtained rank and emoluments, and did not wish to make admission to the Bar too easy. He hoped, under these circumstances, when there was an opportunity to agree to popular wishes which were reasonable, the Chief Secretary would not support the proposal of an adjournment. If anybody proposed at this moment to impose the restriction now sought to be removed no one in the House would support it; but when there was an opportunity of removing it, distinguished legal Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench opposed it. If they were successful it would be a great disappointment to the bulk of the Irish Members.

WATERWORKS CLAUSES ACT (1847) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 7.]

(Mr. Daniel Grant, Mr. Torrens, Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Arthur Cohen, Mr. Ritchie, Mr. William Lawrence, Baron Henry De Worms.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Torrens.)

COLONEL MAKINS appealed to the hon. Member not to press the Motion at that time, as the House had been taken entirely by surprise, and many hon. Members who desired to take part in the discussion were absent. There would be other opportunities for proceeding with the measure; and he would venture to suggest to the hon. Member that if he would fix a day for taking the Committee stage those who were opposed to the Bill would be prepared to discuss it then. He might also point out that the Bill seriously affected the interests of the Water Companies. In the funds of these Companies many Trustees had invested on the faith of Acts of Parliament; and there was no precedent of such a Bill being passed in opposition to the views of the Water Companies.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that, as the House was aware, the Government supported this Bill; but, in the present circumstances, he would suggest to his hon. Friend to be content with the Motion he had made, and not to insist on taking the clauses that day, as he thought it was desirable that the House should have time to consider what Amendments should be moved.

MR. RITCHIE pointed out that private Members could only get their Bills forward when they were fortunate enough to obtain such an opportunity as the present. If hon. Members were taken by surprise they had only themselves to blame. The Bill had now been a very long time before the House, its principle had been approved, and he could not see why the right hon. Baronet should appeal to his hon. Friend to postpone the clauses.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said, he hoped that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Finsbury would comply with the appeal that had been made to him. He had blocked the Bill for some time past, as it was a Bill on which a considerable amount of discussion should take place. No fair hearing could be given to the opponents of the Bill when it was brought on as unexpectedly as it had been that day. If the hon. Member in charge of the Bill would agree to postpone this stage, and give due Notice of the day when it would be taken, he would agree to remove his block, and to use his influence with his Friends to do the same.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN hoped that the hon. Member for Finsbury would be content with getting the Speaker out of the Chair, and would then report Progress at once. That would be a step gained, and was all that the hon. Gentleman could desire under the circumstances.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, the Bill was read a first time last year, and the present Bill was identical with that, and was virtually the same Bill. The hon. Member for East Kent (Mr. Akers-Douglas) said that he had blocked the Bill with the object of obtaining for it a fair hearing; but he was under the impression that the process of blocking a Bill had exactly the contrary effect. As, however, he had been appealed to by the President of the Local Government Board and his hon. Friend the Member for Hythe, he was quite willing to yield to what appeared to be the general wish of the House, and would move to report Progress as soon as the Speaker had left the Chair.

MR. COOPE, who had given Notice that he would move, as an Amendment—

“That the Bill be referred to a Hybrid Committee:—That the said Committee do consist of Eleven Members, Six to be nominated by the House, and Five by the Committee of Selection. That all Petitions against the Bill, presented not later than three clear days before the sitting of the Committee, be referred to the Committee, and that such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, Agents, or Witnesses, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill, against such Petitions:—That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records:—That Five be the quorum of the Committee;”

said, the Bill affected property to the value of about £30,000,000, and it proposed to adopt an entirely new system of rating for water. It had been decided over and over again that the annual value of property was the only fair means of levying the rate. As hon. Members were aware, parochial rating was considerably under the real value, and it would be very unfair to adopt it in this instance. He held that it would be unjust to go into Committee on the Bill without first giving all parties interested in its provisions the opportunity of making their views known by counsel.

MR. WARTON seconded the Amendment. The Water Companies, he said, understood at the time of their establishment that they were to have the right to charge according to the value of the houses supplied with water. In the Dobbs case the Judges had laid down that the annual value of property was its net annual value. The Companies' charges must, consequently, be based on such net annual value. But it was a mistake to suppose, as the framers of the Bill appeared to do, that this meant the rateable value of houses for parochial purposes, for the net annual value of premises was almost always greater than the rateable value. It was far better that the Bill should go before a Committee, which would examine it dispassionately, than that hon. Members should be tempted to give an unjust vote in order to court popularity.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be referred to a Select Committee."—(Mr. Coope.)

COLONEL MAKINS, in supporting the Amendment, said, that he did not join in the view taken by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport, who was a little too lavish in imputing motives to Gentlemen on the other side. He believed that the House, if it did inflict an injustice, would do so from ignorance or inadvertence. His reason for supporting the Amendment was that, if the Bill passed, it would affect different Companies very differently. The method of rating was very different in various parts of the Metropolis. In some places the rateable was equal to, or even more than, the annual value; in other parts it was considerably less. Therefore, if the Bill were to pass it would not affect one Company at all, while another might be very severely handled. It would be only right that all these points should be carefully examined by a Select Committee, with the aid of gentlemen representing the different Companies of the Metropolis. He hoped the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would consider that point and accept the Amendment, which could not in any way prejudice the passing of the measure he had in hand. If it were passed after an inquiry at which the Companies were heard they would not feel that they had been ill-treated by legislation behind their backs without getting an opportunity of explaining their position.

MR. WARTON rose, and was addressing the House, when——

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE rose to Order, and said that the hon. and learned Member had exhausted his right of speech by having seconded the Amendment which had been negatived.

MR. WARTON: That does not exhaust my right.

PRIVATE LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 60.]

(Mr. William Corbet, Mr. Mayne, Mr. Dillwyn, Mr. Dawson, Mr. Richard Power.)

SECOND READING.

MR. W. J. CORBET, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the present measure dealt only with private lunatic asylums in Ireland; but a Bill had been introduced in "another place" with regard to English asylums, and had much the same scope as the present Bill. This Bill aimed at gradually getting rid of the vicious principle of keeping private lunatic asylums for pecuniary profit, which was at the root of all the evils connected with private asylums. The Earl of Shaftesbury, Chairman of the Lunacy Board, the highest living authority on the subject, stated before a Select Committee of the House in 1859 that the evils of the system could hardly be exaggerated. One could not conceive how, in the face of all that had occurred, and all the evidence recorded against them, private lunatic asylums kept by individuals for personal gain had so long been tolerated. There had recently been some very notable cases of attempts made to shut up persons who were not insane in establishments of this kind. There were three classes of lunatic asylums in Ireland—asylums for charitable purposes, the district lunatic asylums, and the private asylums. The first two were satisfactory, although he believed the rate-payers should be represented on the Board of Governors. If capital for the purpose of building asylums to be under the management of Government, in which the medical and other officers should have no pecuniary interest whatever beyond their salaries, could be introduced into the country, or procured from some public fund, such as the Church Surplus Fund, it would be a blessing to the country and to the insane.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. W. J. Corbet.)

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: said, he fully recognized the pains which the hon. Member had taken in this matter, and his earnest desire to improve the arrangements affecting the management of lunatics in Ireland; but the Government could not assent to the second reading of the Bill. In the first place, the Government had introduced a Bill into the other House for England, which indicated the general lines on which he thought legislation should proceed in this matter. That Bill did not apply to Ireland, and it would be impossible for the Government to be legislating at the same time upon one system in the other House, and upon another system in this House. The two countries, although their circumstances were different, ought to be dealt with on substantially the same lines, making allowance for the difference of their circumstances. The system in Ireland was far from perfect; there was a deficiency of inspection and control by Local Authorities; but the Bill would intensify these evils by centralizing the management of the asylums, which would be a step altogether in the wrong direction. He knew and admitted all that could be said in favour of doing away with private asylums; at the same time, to get rid of them in a summary way would raise large questions of compensation. To transfer in a summary way all the private asylums to the Central Executive Government would be an unfortunate step. He looked forward to the time when there would be in Ireland Local Authorities who could take charge of asylums. The hon. Member assumed that asylums would be self-supporting if they were erected; but money would be required to erect them. The hon. Member said he would get it from the Church Fund Surplus; but, to the best of his belief, there was nothing to be obtained from that source, and that would be a considerable obstacle to the successful operation of this Bill.

In answer to Mr. WARTON,

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, it would be impossible to put Ireland in the Bill now before the House of Lords, because the details of the two countries were so different; but that Bill indicated the general lines on which the Government thought it desirable to proceed.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHAN-

HERAT—FORCED LABOUR.

QUESTION.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to a Question he put the other day as to the road which it was reported was being made by the Russians by means of forced labour from Sarakhs through Penjdeh in the direction of Herat, Whether he had received any information on the subject?

EARL GRANVILLE: I have received no information.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH asked whether the noble Earl would make inquiries?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that a Question on the subject might be put on the Paper.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—EXPLOSION AT THE AD-MIRALTY.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Perhaps the noble Earl will allow me to ask him without Notice, Whether he has any intelligence to communicate to the House as to the explosion stated to have taken place at the Government Offices; and whether it is true that there has been serious injury sustained by Members of the Civil Service?

EARL GRANVILLE: There has been an explosion at the Admiralty, and a certain amount—not a great amount—of damage has been done to the building. But I regret to say that it has seriously wounded a much esteemed public servant, the Assistant Secretary to the Admiralty.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Is it true that there have been two explosions?

EARL GRANVILLE: I have not heard of any other. The First Lord of the Admiralty will be able to give more details of the occurrence. As far as I can understand it, the explosion at the Admiralty seems to have come from the inside of the building.

FEDERAL COUNCIL OF AUSTRALASIA
BILL.—(No. 69.)

(The Earl of Derby.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I rise to move the second reading of this Bill; and your Lordships will expect from me some explanation of its object, of its nature, and of the circumstances under which it has been brought in. Before I state what the Bill is, I may as well explain what it is not. It is not a Bill which deals in any way with that question of Imperial Federation of which we hear so much. It does not touch, except indirectly, the relations existing between the Colonies and the Mother Country. It is not even a measure for Intercolonial Federation in any complete and organized shape. It simply provides, as the title states, for the creation of a Federal Council, charged with certain duties, which are described and defined in the clauses. Further, it is not a compulsory, but an enabling Bill. No Colony is bound by it to join in the arrangement which it sanctions unless that Colony spontaneously decides so to do. The initiative must be taken by the Colony itself; all that the Imperial Legislature undertakes is to give its sanction to a scheme which would be ultra vires for the Colonial Legislatures to deal with on their own unassisted authority. Under this Bill five Colonies—Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, West Australia, and Tasmania—will be enabled, and are now prepared, to become federated for certain purposes. Two Colonies, New South Wales and New Zealand, have hitherto declined to join. Of these two Colonies so standing aloof, one, New Zealand, is so far distant and so little connected with the affairs of the Australian Continent, that its continued separation, if it should remain in the same mind as at present, would not, as I conceive, affect the working of the scheme. It will be entirely a question for New Zealanders themselves; their junction or their abstention will not interfere with the other States concerned. In the case of New South Wales, I cannot deny that a good deal turns on whether that Colony comes into the Federation or not. It is the oldest of the Australian Colonies; it holds a central position; it is the rival of Victoria in importance, having a rather smaller population; but a larger amount of trade, of revenue, and of territory. I do not deny that the continued standing out of New South Wales would be a serious, possibly a fatal, blow to the organization which we are creating. But I entertain a sanguine hope that the objections of the New South Wales Legislature will not be permanent. I believe the feeling there to be one rather of doubt than of hostility; and it is mainly in order to remove, as far as possible, any obstacle to the accession of New South Wales that I have inserted in the Bill the Proviso in Clause 31, by which any Colony which may on trial be dissatisfied with the arrangement is enabled to secede. That Proviso has been the subject of much discussion, and it would not have been inserted if complete agreement among the Colonies had been arrived at, or if this were to be considered as the final form which Intercolonial Federation is likely to assume. But the whole scheme is tentative; it is experimental, and, in a certain sense, it is provisional; and, under these circumstances, it seems expedient to leave large facilities for future change. I should be merely wasting your Lordships' time if I argued for the importance, and, indeed, the necessity, of some union such as that proposed between the various Colonies of the same group. With contiguous territories, with a homogeneous population, and as population increases having more and more intercourse with one another every year, it is obvious that they have, and must have, many interests which cannot be dealt with in a satisfactory way except by joint concerted action; and the only practical question is in what manner the means of joint action shall be provided. Now, I am dispensed from the necessity of contending that the scheme embodied in this Bill is of all schemes the best possible, because it comes before you with this special recommendation—that it is the scheme on which the Australian community has decided for itself. The history of the movement is probably familiar to many of your Lordships. In 1883 a Conference was held at Sydney on the subject, attended by Representatives of all the Colonies concerned. It sat for several weeks; it considered and discussed minutely every point of the proposed Federal arrangement. The result was a Bill differing in but few particulars from that now on the Table, and subsequently the recommendations of the Conference were referred to and were considered by the Legislatures of the various Colonies, with the result which I have already mentioned—that two Colonies dissented, and still dissent, and that five have concurred. But I ought, perhaps, to mention that in New Zealand the question was never brought to an issue, the Government of the day preferring not to submit the matter to the local Legislature. In New South Wales the measure was actually carried in one House, and in the other was lost only by a majority of one. I mention that fact as justifying my expression of a hope that the refusal would not be final. Now, I may be asked in what respects the Bill on the Table differs from the draft adopted by the Conference at Sydney. I do not notice, of course, mere verbal alterations. In Clause 5 the number of the Council is made capable of extension, but only at the desire of the Colonies themselves. As the Bill originally stood, the Council could not have consisted of more than 14 Members, even if every Colony joined. The change is all in the direction of giving more freedom to the Colonies as regards its composition. Without that change fresh Imperial legislation would probably be required within a few years. We have added Clause 15—a general power to the Council to deal with any matters not specially provided for which the Queen by Order in Council may refer to them; but this power of extension can only be exercised with the consent of each Colony interested. We had proposed a clause dealing with the question of expenditure involved in the action of the Council; but on reference to the Colonial Governments that was objected to, and it has been dropped out in deference to their objections. The result will be that no decision involving expenditure can have effect given to it without the consent of the Legislature of each Colony. That is a point on which they have laid great stress; and the omission, in fact, reduces the power of the Council in all cases where expenditure is involved to that of an advising or recommending body. The last alteration which we have made is that to which I have already referred, giving the power of secession. On that point Colonial opinion, as I said before, is divided; and I believe that the Colonists will be content, as I shall, to accept the decision of Parliament upon it. The Agents of some of the federating Colonies have sent me a statement of their reasons against it, which I promised them should be laid before Parliament. It only reached me to-day, but I will have it printed in time for the Committee. I will only observe now that since the Colonial Governments have struck out of the Bill all compulsory powers of taxing any Colony to pay for carrying into effect the decisions of the Council—which was their doing, not mine—the importance of this question is very much lessened either way; for obviously a Colony desiring to secede and not allowed to do so would decline to contribute towards the cost incurred, and so bring the whole machinery to a deadlock. Where you have no compulsory taxing power, but only voluntary contributions to rely on, the whole thing rests on a voluntary basis. I do not believe that anyone here is likely to be opposed to the principle of Federation in the abstract, and I need not, therefore, defend the Bill against attacks from that side. The criticism which I anticipate is rather on the score that this Bill gives Federation only in a very rudimentary and imperfect form. That I admit; and I agree that it would be much more satisfactory to all of us if we could deal with the question in a more effectual and conclusive manner. A federated Australia, forming, as Canada does, a single State, united for all except purely local purposes, would be a new Power in the world; and, both in regard to its relations with England and to the relations of its various component parts among themselves, the advantages and conveniences of such a complete union would be incalculable. But the thing is impossible so far as the present time is concerned. The mere difference of fiscal policy would prevent it. The Colonists themselves do not wish it, do not think themselves ripe for it. They are the best judges of their own affairs, and we must go at their pace, not at ours. It would be madness to reject a plan on which they are agreed, and to tell them to take it back and bring us a better one in its place. The probable result of that procedure would be that we should get no plan at all, and that deep and widespread irritation would be created. Details will be better discussed in Committee. I think enough has been said to induce your Lordships to agree to the second reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Derby.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, as far as the Bill is concerned, I think there will be no difference of opinion on one side or the other as to its expediency. As the Colonial Secretary has said, it is the result of Colonial action. It is the result of a Conference held at Sydney, at which the matter was discussed, and that result is a compromise. The Bill has been truly said to be of a limited nature. It provides, in the first place, for the creation of a Federal Council; but that Council is not formed on an entirely new principle. As in the case of the United States Senate, each Colony, no matter what its size may be, is to have two Representatives. I have no objection to offer to that. The difficulty is as to the powers which are comprised in the 15th clause, and which will require very careful consideration. The 31st clause is really the central point of the whole plan. That clause gives, as has been stated, the power—the singular power—to any Colony which has entered the Union to withdraw at pleasure. On the admission or omission of that clause hangs the fate of the Bill, and the whole chance of union between the Australian Colonies. It is rather difficult to discuss this question, because two of the leading Colonies are opposed with regard to it, Victoria desiring the omission of the clause, New South Wales desiring its retention. With Victoria are united in that view the Colonies of Queensland, South Australia, Tasmania, and the Crown Colony of Western Australia. They object to the presence of this clause on the not unreasonable ground that to allow one Colony to withdraw once it is admitted is making preparation for the breaking up of the Confederation. Those who hold that view say that there was no such provision to be found in the Act for the Federation of the Dominion of Canada, nor in the measure which I had the honour of carrying through this House in 1877 for the contingent Federation of the South African Colonies. It is perfectly true that there was no such provision in that measure; and if Confederation were a real and complete Confederation, such a clause would be inadmissible. But anyone who studies the subject will see that the powers given to the proposed union of the South African Colonies were much fuller and larger in every sense than those contained in this Bill, which is of a much more limited and tentative character. If this clause is allowed to stand part of the Bill, Victoria, and the other Colonies which dissent from it, may be no party to this proposed Confederation, and may withdraw altogether, and so the scheme may come to nothing. It is perfectly possible that that may be the result. It lies in the hands of Victoria and her sister Colonies. I trust that, upon consideration, they will not accept the view of their more energetic advisers and counsellors. I honour and admire the two great Colonies, Victoria and New South Wales, too much to suppose that either of them, when this present controversy is over, will show itself in the slightest degree unreasonable. But just as Victoria, and the sister Colonies who agree with her, have the power to destroy this Union, so New South Wales has equally the power to destroy it. I have stated very briefly indeed the Victorian argument in this matter. Let me state more briefly still what I understand to be the position of New South Wales—it is that she may possibly be outvoted by Colonies whose interests are not altogether identical with her own. There is a greater community of present interests among Victoria and the Colonies which agree with her than between them and New South Wales. There is a clause which assigns the powers to be given to the Council, and the first power comprises all the relations between the Continent of Australia and the Islands of the Pacific. Now, this is an enormous power. Your Lordships should bear in mind that the great bulk of the shipping is owned by New South Wales and New Zealand—the greater proportion, I believe, by New South Wales. If, therefore, the control of that shipping is to be vested in the Council, at which these two Colonies may be outvoted, there is some reasonable ground for

The Earl of Carnarvon

New South Wales holding her hand before entering into a union in which she would be irrevocably tied. The fact is, that New South Wales and New Zealand in this matter really hold a position from which they cannot practically be dislodged. I think it is absolutely necessary that any scheme of this sort for Australian Federation should be one which invites, and not compels. I do not attempt to decide which is right in this question, New South Wales or Victoria; I do not think you must look upon it as a matter of rights, but as a question of facts. It has been said that if we were to allow this Council to be formed, with the power of withdrawal to the Colonies represented on it, the threat of withdrawal would so paralyze the action of the Council that there would be no wholesome or satisfactory legislation. I do not doubt, however, that the Members of the Council will act as reasonable men; and I do not anticipate that the business of the Council will be carried on by threats and menace. When men representing these great Colonies are brought face to face round a table they will, I think, feel that upon their union depends the success of their legislation. It is both disagreeable and painful for anyone who has the progress of these Colonies at heart to vote or speak against the wish of any single one of them; and if I do so to-night in supporting this 31st clause, it is in the simple and single belief that the clause is, upon the whole, for the general interests of the Colonies. If you were to strike that clause out, you would entirely postpone for many years to come, and possibly defeat altogether, the Federation of the Australian Colonies. I believe that the union of these Colonies grows closer every year. The postal system, the railway system, the telegraph system, the coasting steamers, and last, but by no means least, those important Conferences which have been held for several years past on subjects essential, and almost vital, to the interests of the Australian Colonies, such as the question of defence—these, with many other steps, are leading—and very quickly leading—to a union, not only among themselves, but also a closer union to this country. I value that union greatly, even in the form in which it comes before us; I value it for its own sake, but still more as a steppingstone towards much better relations with this country. I believe it is a true policy to go rather slowly than hastily in this matter. In politics it takes a long time to achieve large results. I think no stone should be left unturned to achieve a union closer than that which the Bill represents; but I am inclined to accept it as an instalment, and I look forward to the results with great satisfaction. I believe that every effort made to promote this union will be seconded by this country with a hearty and cordial feeling of affection and sympathy.

LORD NORTON said, he had no fear that this measure would fail; indeed, he thought it had every prospect of bringing about a growing union between all the Colonies and the Mother Country. The questions alluded to by the noble Earl who had just spoken were questions which might well be raised in Committee, and would, no doubt, be brought forward when the Bill reached that stage. The secret of the success of this measure was that it was the Bill of the Colonists themselves, and under a sense of their own necessity. A dread of Foreign Powers annexing adjacent lands, and the sending of some of their worst criminals into their neighbourhood, gave them a sense of a common danger and common interest, and from that sprung the present Bill, which had been drawn up by the Colonists themselves. Queensland attempted to annex part of New Guinea to Her Majesty's Dominions without consulting Her Majesty herself. This the Colonial Minister rightly refused to sanction; but he said, at the same time, that he hoped soon the Australian Colonies would combine together and provide the cost to carry out such measures of annexation as Her Majesty might think it expedient to adopt. Then came the Conference at Sydney, when this Bill was drafted. The intervening Correspondence between the Colonial Minister and the Agents General of the Colonies illustrated exactly the kind of Imperial consultation and co-action which alone was practicable and effective. This subject, which was of Imperial concern, and in the interest of the United Empire, was first discussed in the local Parliaments. The proposal was communicated to the Home Government by the Queen's local Representatives, the Governors.

The plan was then discussed between the Colonial Agents and the Secretary of State. Legislation first emanated from a local Convention, and came to the Imperial Parliament for final approval. The Federal Council, resulting from this complete Imperial discussion for dealing with matters of common Australasian interest, was itself valuable as setting in practical contrast Colonial Federation with vague talk about Imperial Federation. The Federal Council would probably lead to complete Inter-colonial Federation for Australasia, such as had been effected in Canada. This would not only strengthen the Empire at large, but increase the power of the Colonies for their own defence, removing the internal jealousies and rivalries which impeded the development of their strength and prosperity. It would be a poor compliment to such revived loyalty to treat it as something new, forgetting the same fellow-enlistment against French Armies in America. It would affront the Australians to accept them as allies. They wished to form part of the Imperial Army. He hoped the next practical result of this Federal Council would be the formation of an Australian Squadron under Her Majesty's Flag. It might be said that Colonial Squadrons could act only in local seas; but even that meant that there would be, in the aggregate, an Imperial Navy in all parts of the world. We were now witnessing how local Land Forces would combine for any common Imperial necessity. He would reserve for Committee some comments on points of detail, and would only add that, as a whole, the measure seemed a matter of congratulation on the part of the nation at large, happily coinciding with other circumstances at this moment in the promise of revived Imperial strength.

VISCOUNT BURY said, that the Bill was a step in the right direction; but it was rather a leap in the dark until we knew what New South Wales would do in the matter. A Federation without New South Wales and New Zealand would be like the play of Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark. He could not help thinking that the clause which had been the subject of so much comment on the part of his noble Friends (Clause 31) was a very necessary one; indeed, he thought it did not go far enough. As New South Wales and

New Zealand were pre-eminently shipping Colonies, and their Mercantile Marine might be affected by the action of the Federal Council, it was not only right that they should have the power of secession provided for, but that they should have the power of claiming indemnity if their interests were prejudicially affected by the action of the Council. He could not disguise the fact that opinion in the Colonies had been unanimous when such important omissions had to be allowed for; and he could only hope that the operation of the Bill might be more satisfactory than he was able to anticipate it would be. He congratulated the noble Earl at the head of the Colonies upon the opportunity of making such a proposal, and he hoped that the Bill would be successful and useful.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY REDISTRIBUTION BILL.—(No. 75.)

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that under the existing law the Lord Lieutenant had the power to distribute the force every five years. It was desirable that he should have the power at once of making a supplementary redistribution, which would have the effect of relieving some localities of extra charge and increasing in them the quota of the free force.

EGYPTIAN LOAN BILL.—(No. 74.)

(The Earl Granville.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL GRANVILLE, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said: Your Lordships may remember that in 1882 the English and French Controllers in Egypt were of opinion that the financial state of Egypt was such as to require a suspension of the Law of Liquidation, and that at the beginning of last year a Conference met in London to consider the subject. This Conference arrived at certain conclusions—the necessity of raising £8,000,000 to restore the finances of Egypt, the expediency of suspending the Sinking Fund, and the urgency of certain administrative expenditure; but there was a difference of opinion as to the amount of Revenue which could properly be raised. The Conference was brought to an end by an ultimatum proposed by the French Government, which, unfortunately, it was not possible for Her Majesty's Government to accept. Last Autumn Lord Northbrook went out to Egypt, and made most valuable and exhaustive Reports, and negotiations were renewed among the Powers, which lasted nearly five months. The result was that the Powers agreed again as to the normal administrative Expenditure of Egypt, including £200,000 for the cost of the Army of Occupation; and they agreed to the sum to be raised being extended from £8,000,000 to £9,000,000, this loan being raised on a joint and several Guarantee of the Powers. This Guarantee is of a sum of £315,000 per annum until the whole loan is repaid, and is to be the first charge on the Revenues assigned to the Debt, and received by the Caisse. The difference between the interest in each year on the Debt outstanding and the £315,000 is to be carried to a Sinking Fund only applicable to the present loan. This Sinking Fund may be increased by 1 per cent out of the future surplus of the general Revenue Fund. This Agreement has been embodied in a Convention which forms the Schedule of the present Bill. The first Article of the Convention enables the Egyptian Government to raise a loan of £9,000,000 at a rate not exceeding 3½ per cent, and provides that the Khedive shall by a Decree fix the rate, the conditions, and the dates of issue. The remainder of the Convention carries out the provisions which I have already mentioned, with the necessary technical details. Your Lordships will have observed that this Agreement, carried out after much discussion, contains concessions on both sides. Those made to us are considerable. In the first place, the

Viscount Bury

Powers have accepted as a basis our figures of the Revenue of Egypt instead of the French. Secondly, they have agreed to a reduction of interest to the bondholders, though to a less extent than we had originally proposed; and, thirdly, they have agreed to the taxation of foreigners in Egypt. They have agreed that there shall be no inquiry for two years, and that the contribution to the Army should be £200,000 instead of £120,000. These are five concessions over the proposals made by France, and adopted by several of the Powers at the Conference of last year. The only concession, if it can be so called, is that the Guarantee of the £9,000,000 Loan should be a joint and several Guarantee by the Powers. If the same objections are urged such as have been already stated against this Joint Guarantee, it will be the duty of one of my Colleagues or myself to repeat the replies which have already been made on this subject.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl Granville.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, the course which this House ought to adopt with respect to a Bill of this character is one of some considerable difficulty, because the consequences of our acts would go far beyond the immediate effect on Egyptian finance, and would touch the interests of this country and its relations to Foreign Powers at a time when those relations are the subject of considerable anxiety. My Lords, I confess that the further opportunity I have had of studying this Bill the less satisfied am I with the view which Her Majesty's Government have taken, and with the considerations which they have obtained for concessions which the noble Earl himself describes as trivial, but of which my principal complaint is that they are doubtful and ambiguous, and may entail consequences of the most vital character. The advantage gained by this arrangement is of a very small and unimportant kind. There is a power to tax the coupon 5 per cent; there is a power to tax the foreign bondholders. I quite agree that the foreign bondholder might be taxed, and I quite agree with the noble Earl in wishing to tax him more. But the advantage gained by submitting him to taxation is one of a purely pecuniary character, and will probably not be much felt by the Egyptian finances at a future time at no great distance. Another advantage is that the foreigner himself may be taxed, and there is no doubt that the inability of the Egyptian Government to tax foreigners residing in their domains was a great abuse. I do not believe that the claim to exemption from taxation was a just claim. There is no doubt that the exemption has grown up as a matter of custom, and it is a matter of very serious reproach that it has been allowed to last so long, or that foreigners who reside in Egypt and get all the advantages of governments should be exempt from contributing to the burdens of the country. It is really a reproach to the Christian nations that they have insisted upon forcing such a concession upon a Mahomedan Power. These are the only two advantages, as far as I can see, which the noble Earl tells us that the Government have obtained. When the noble Earl said that there was to be no inquiry for two years, I could not see what concession there was in that. What right have the Powers to any inquiry at all? Inquiry is entirely a matter for Her Majesty's Government. They are not bound to admit it now—they will not be bound to admit it two years hence, unless the circumstances then should be very different from those which prevail now. I earnestly hope that nothing like an International inquiry is understood to be one of the results of the passing of this Bill. Difficult as our present position is, I should not feel it consistent with my duty to vote in favour of the Bill if I thought it involved, as a necessary consequence, that in two years we should hand over Egypt practically to be governed by an International Commission. But the real cause which forced this financial operation on the Government was that most imprudent admission of the liability of Egypt to make good the results of the operations at Alexandria which the Government fell into two years ago. It was entirely the consequence of a verbal subtlety on the part of the Prime Minister. Usually his verbal subtleties have no further effect than to minister to the amusement and entertainment of Her Majesty's subjects. But in this case, because he chose to lay down that the operations we were engaged in were not war, but only "military operations," the consequence was that what took place at Alexandria was not treated as the result of war, and the Egyptian Government has had to do what is never done as the result of warlike operations—namely, to make good to private individuals the losses and injuries which they have sustained. I do not mean to say that, as a matter of compassion and humanity, those who have suffered from the Alexandria bombardment and consequent fire should not have some relief. But the burden which has been placed upon the unfortunate taxpayers of Egypt has been exceedingly heavy, and it has been the necessity of finding so much money which has thrown the Egyptian finances into that state of confusion which has forced the noble Earl to have recourse to this measure. The loan has been obtained. It was necessary chiefly because of the Alexandrian Indemnities, but not solely on that account. The loan, however, might have been obtained with equal facility by the Guarantee of this country, and could have been raised at quite as easy a rate of interest. What is it that has induced Foreign Powers to step in and say that this country should not undertake itself, as apparently the noble Earl originally wished, to use its credit for the purpose of assisting the Egyptian Government, but that it should obtain the assistance of the credit of all the other European Governments? That is a point to which the noble Earl did not allude. He tells us that was hardly a concession. He admits that it is the one thing for which the Foreign Powers pressed, though in the Papers the noble Earl has laid before us there is no trace of that pressure, there is no indication of the demand to which the Government have yielded. If it was a small concession, why was it pressed with so much energy by Foreign Governments? What is the advantage of not making the Guarantee alone? Is there something in itself so exceedingly attractive in being allowed to incur a portion of a debt that all our dear friends on the Continent should have crowded together and said—"Our generosity will not allow you to bear the burden alone, and we insist on contributing the advantage of our valuable and unquestionable credit." The noble Earl has never attempted to explain what is the real meaning of this outburst of generosity. There is nothing to account for it, except the attribution to various Foreign Governments of sentiments of a most high and almost impracticable character; and it is wonderful that the suspicions of the noble Earl should not have been excited. I envy the noble Earl the childlike generosity and simplicity of his disposition. He evidently thinks it was nothing but emotions of this exalted character which induced the dear Allies to rush in with their assistance in order to relieve English finance from the burden. I suppose it must have crossed the noble Earl's mind that possibly there was another motive. It must have crossed his mind that there was a desire on the part of some of the Foreign Powers to make this offer of a Joint Guarantee the ground of a claim for subsequent interference. And how is the noble Earl disposed to deal with such a claim? Will he give us an absolute denial that any such claim exists? Will he put on record a positive statement that there is no claim whatever arising from which any of the Foreign Powers can take advantage on account of the Guarantee which they have given to this loan for being formally permitted to interfere in the conduct of the affairs of Egypt? I should like to hear such a statement from the noble Earl; and I hope that, before the debate closes, something of that kind may fall from his lips. I confess that I should be glad to have something more formal still. If matters had been as they were when this Bill was in the House of Commons, I should have been disposed to ask your Lordships to record, on passing this Bill through its formal stages, that, in giving your assent to it, you did not recognise the acquisition of any power of interference in consequence of the Guarantee that is given. At the same time, I confess that it is not a good thing for a Legislative Assembly as a rule to interfere in diplomatic proceedings; and there is no doubt that, at the present moment, the noble Earl has negotiations of considerable difficulty on hand which deal with this very question. If any Foreign Government should wish to interfere in Egypt, I earnestly hope that the noble Earl will maintain the rights of the Egyptian Government and of this country intact, and that he will not give way to any unreasonable proposals. But while entertaining that hope, we are bound to do nothing that might make the noble Earl's task more difficult;

and if we took any formal action in that respect—although it might be desirable to have a decision of that kind—it is possible that his hands might be in some degree embarrassed, and that we should not be consulting the true interests of the Public Service. Although, therefore, I feel strongly the imprudence of this measure, and although it is impossible to conceal from one's self that at some future date what we are doing now may add to the difficulties of the Foreign Minister of the time, yet, on the whole, as a balance of considerations, I think it is better that we should pass this Bill without any qualifying vote as it stands, and should leave to Her Majesty's Government the responsibility which naturally belongs to the Executive Government for any consequences with which we ourselves, as a Legislative Body, cannot deal. But, in doing so, I must earnestly impress upon your Lordships that we are parting with the means of extracting from the Government some statement of their policy with respect to Egypt. I earnestly hope, however, that we may persuade them, in spite of that generosity on our part, to treat us with a little more frankness and a little more candour than they have hitherto done with respect to the intentions they entertain as regards the duration of their position in Egypt and the policy they intend to pursue there. They have reserved to themselves an absolute freedom; they have refused to indicate clearly whether they intend to stay in, or whether they intend to go from the Soudan; they have refused to give any security for any lengthened continuance of the power of this country in Egypt; and in doing all these things they have infinitely multiplied the difficulties with which England has to contend in that country. They have refused to give any assurance as to the duration of their stay in Egypt, and of their intentions with respect to the Soudan. Now, to do as they have done, leaving these things in ambiguity, to hide under a veil of doubtful and equivocal language the policy on which they have resolved, is really to announce to every tribe and to every officer in Egypt that, as a matter of safety, they cannot venture to be friends or supporters of England. They are announcing to all the tribes of the Desert, who look to us to know whether, with a due consideration for their own future security, it is possible for them to range themselves under our banner, that they can give them no assurance, and that there is a fair and very probable prospect that if those who are the least fanatical among them should help us, and make easy for us our military operations, or our civilizing mission, the results to them will be an early abandonment of our position, and their exposure to all the vengeance of the fanatical co-religionists and co-nationalists whom they will be accused of betraying. I believe that there is no duty that is more incumbent on the Government at this moment than to give those who are watching to see what our intentions are in Egypt a clear indication of their policy. This measure is only one among the chain of uncertain and ambiguous indications which has already covered their path with so much difficulty. I entreat the noble Earl, if he will not do it to-night, at all events before this measure leaves this House, and before the opportunity is gone, to make it the occasion of a clear indication of his intentions, and that he will remove the veil that conceals from the world, and from our possible allies in Egypt, the intentions which the British Government entertain.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, the Government had pursued their usual course of simply announcing foregone conclusions, and of refraining from stating the policy they intended to pursue. The Convention was a foregone conclusion, and it would be impossible for that House to make any Motion which would neutralize what had been done in "another place." He maintained, however, that there was no necessity whatever to make that Convention, except to extricate Her Majesty's Government from difficulties which they had themselves created; and he would urge on the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs the enormous importance, if the Convention was to be accepted, of a distinct declaration on the part of the Government of the policy they intended to pursue with respect to the Soudan. They knew from the declarations of the Prime Minister himself that for two years Her Majesty's Government trusted to frightening the Powers in reference to the Law of Liquidation; and this view of the matter was confirmed by Sir Evelyn Baring's Report. The Government would not see that this law was the greatest guarantee of peace that we possessed. Her Majesty's Government had never shown that it was really necessary to alter the Law of Liquidation. For his own part, he was disposed to adopt the doctrine that the value of Egyptian securities was a test of the prosperity of that country; and there was ample evidence to show that under the Dual Control they had doubled in value, and the Egyptian Government, from being in a state of insolvency, became able to borrow on reasonable terms. He was justified in saying that under a good Administration the Revenue of Egypt was a highly elastic one, and that the taxation upon the Privileged land would produce a considerable augmentation of that Revenue. Had Her Majesty's Government sought to have administered Egypt properly, they should have made themselves responsible, either directly or indirectly, for the acts of the Khedive and his Ministry; secondly, they should have appointed a Resident Minister of position, who would have commanded the respect of Foreign Powers and of the Egyptians themselves; thirdly, they should have preserved a friendly co-operation with the French; fourthly, they should have developed the resources of Egypt by improving the irrigation; and, fifthly—and he looked upon this point as almost the most important of all—they should have taken in hand the superintendence of taxation in the country, and should have pushed on the Cadastral Survey. But Her Majesty's Government had done none of these things. Why had not Her Majesty's Government initiated in Egypt such a policy as Lord Dufferin would have attempted to carry out by increasing the agricultural resources of the country, by improving irrigation, by equalizing the Land Tax, by completing the Cadastral Survey, and by supervising the collection of the Revenue? None of these matters were going to receive the attention of Her Majesty's Government except the question of irrigation. Until Her Majesty's Government had given a clear pronouncement of the policy they meant to pursue they had no right to come before the House and the country and make such a proposal. What he wanted to know was, on what principle the Government had spent nearly £15,000,000 in Egypt, and also sacrificed many of the lives of their fellow-countrymen? If he was to be a Liberal, why was he to be told that it was wrong for the late Administration to spend £20,000,000 in Afghanistan, and that it was not wrong for the present Administration to spend £20,000,000 in Egypt? The second point he wished to bring before the House was whether Her Majesty's Government would, in face of the sacrifices they had called upon the country to make, in men, money, and prestige, even now, at the eleventh hour, give any rational explanation of the policy they intended to pursue in Egypt? Would the Government put the despatches of Lord Wolseley before the House, and would they say whether they were prepared to follow his advice? Did Lord Wolseley approve of the scuttle from the Soudan, and had he not given to Her Majesty's Government some indication of the consequences likely to ensue if they retired from the Soudan? Lord Wolseley had, he believed, expressed a strong opinion on that subject; and he thought it was monstrous that the country should not be in possession of the views of Lord Wolseley. He was quite sure of one thing, and that was that the Tory Party must be extremely glad that they had no part or share in these matters. What was really wanted now from Her Majesty's Government was some announcement that what he called the Penal Clause of the Convention might not be put in force—the Penal Clause with regard to the meeting of the Conference at the end of two years. He hoped that Her Majesty's Government would inaugurate such a financial policy in Egypt as would show that they were determined Egypt should remain solvent, and that at the end of two years, instead of there being a return to International Control, Egypt would be in a thoroughly prosperous and satisfactory condition.

LORD WENTWORTH said, he should oppose with his voice or vote any British Guarantee of an Egyptian Loan which was intended to pay claims which were unjust in their nature and enormous in their amount. He doubted whether any unsalaried Member of either House of Parliament thought the Arrangement then in question was anything but a great Treaty of partition and appropriation among the European Shylocks of the fortunes of Egypt and England alike.

The Duke of Marlborough

EARL GRANVILLE: I cannot allow the debate to close without saying one or two words. First, I am quite ready to acknowledge the tone of the noble Marquess in the observations he has made; and I also give him full credit for his sincerity in giving, as one of his reasons for not doing anything touching this Bill, the due regard which he felt for the critical circumstances in which the foreign affairs of this country are now placed. I must say that beyond that I am exceedingly glad he did not give effect to the threat he shadowed forth some weeks ago, because I think a Motion of that sort would not only have tended to embarrass us with Foreign Powers, but would have been a sort of acknowledgment that this Guarantee gave the Powers of Europe a right of control which they do not now possess. There is no doubt whatever that there are a great many International engagements of all sorts in regard to Egypt. The noble Duke says—Why not settle this matter without any infringement whatever of the Liquidation Law? The noble Marquess took a different view. He said that it was not in the least necessary to do this, because we might guarantee the loan; but you cannot guarantee that any loan shall be raised under the existing Liquidation Law except with the consent of the other Powers. My Colleagues and I have been reflecting on this subject. I have read the speeches made on the Opposition side, and I have never yet seen what the practical view was, and how it was to be carried out—namely, that against and without any consent from the European Powers we were to extricate Egypt from the difficult financial position in which she was placed. The noble Marquess spoke about the indemnities. I agree with him that these indemnities have been a serious addition to the burdens of Egypt; but I do not agree with him when he said that these indemnities arose from a subtle distinction by Mr. Gladstone as to whether we were engaged simply in hostilities or were actually at war. I never heard Mr. Gladstone make any defence of these indemnities on these grounds. I do not say there was an absolute claim. There was a very great pressure, and a justified pressure, on Egypt; but it was not the burning of Alexandria, it was not any act of hostility, it was after the rebels had been defeated in the fortifications that the Egyptians, whom the Government of Egypt was not sufficiently strong to control, destroyed in the most wanton way the town of Alexandria. Does the noble Marquess say that we ought to have taken the Guarantee upon ourselves? Surely he knows that we could not have done that without interfering with the Law of Liquidation? We might have occupied Egypt, and allowed her to become completely bankrupt; but that would not have been creditable. We might, contrary to the past policy of the Government, and of noble Lords opposite also, have taken absolute and permanent possession of Egypt, and applied our financial resources to the purpose of clearing off the whole Egyptian Debt, taking it upon ourselves. We might, in short, have placed ourselves in opposition—illegal opposition—to the whole of Europe by contravening what was established by International Law. The noble Marquess laid great stress on the Government not giving an explanation of their policy in Egypt and the Soudan. I can only say that nothing has been more consistent than the policy of the Government in regard to Egypt. It has been called vacillating; but we have been persistent in the one policy which we have declared. With regard to the Soudan—though it is a very plausible argument used against us that the Government are reticent—I do appeal to the noble Marquess whether, on calmly reflecting, and without any wish to embarrass the Government, he thinks that this is a particular moment in which it would be wise and expedient, and in the public interest, for us exactly to specify and define the course which we propose to take in the Soudan? I trust that we shall soon be able to give further explanations than we have hitherto given; and, judging from the spirit in which the noble Marquess speaks himself, there seems to be considerable reticence on the part of the Opposition with regard to pressing us to make statements which might prove prejudicial to the interests of the nation.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I wish to make one observation upon the remark of the noble Earl that this is an inopportune time to make further announcements in regard to the policy of the Government in connection with the Sou-

dan. We have taken upon ourselves in the Soudan responsibilities which involve our honour and credit as a nation. For example, we have taken upon ourselves responsibilities towards the Mudir of Dongola and the troops whom he has employed, and towards the friendly tribes who have assisted us in the neighbourhood of Suakin. I think we are bound, whether we retire from the country or not, to give an undertaking to these men who have implicitly trusted to our honour that we are not going to betray and desert them.

LORD STRATHNAIRN said, that he did not suppose that so unpatriotic and unstatesmanlike a Bill, or one so humiliating to England and dangerous to the peace of Europe, had ever been presented to their Lordships' House for approval. What could be more mortifying to the country and to the Army than that the vast outlay of money and the great loss of gallant and good officers and soldiers should be so little valued by Her Majesty's Government that the destinies of Egypt, and of British arms and policy, should now be taken from under British rule and confided to a hexagon Government of which England only formed a sixth part, all the Governments concerned being of different policy, religion, and interests? The gift of the control of the government of Egypt, which had been so freely made in full confidence in the trustworthiness and disinterestedness of England, had been summarily taken away by the Bill before the House, in remedy of the most ill-executed, hurried, and vacillating policy that had ever stained the annals of diplomacy. To prove the distinction and the vast importance of the position held by England in Egypt—the most legitimate that could be conceived, for it was voluntarily given her by the five Powers—he would quote Lord Granville's despatch of the 4th of January, 1884, which said—

"It should be made clear to the Egyptian Ministers and Governors of provinces that the responsibility which for the time rests on England obliges Her Majesty's Government to insist on the adoption of the policy which they recommend, and that it will be necessary that those Ministers and Governors who do not follow this course should cease to hold their offices. Her Majesty's Government feel confident that, in the event of a change of Ministry being necessary, Egyptians will be found, either among those who have already held the rank of Minister, or in less prominent positions, who will be ready to execute the orders which the Khedive, acting on the advice of Her Majesty's Government, may give them."—[Egypt. No. 1 (1884), p. 176.]

Now there had come the end of that legitimate position. Would any noble Lord say that the fall was not a most humiliating and undeserved one? England, after all her sacrifices, was only to be the sixth fraction of the collective six guaranteeing Powers. He would endeavour to describe the situation as affected by this collective, financial, and at any moment possibly administrative, Guarantee. Supposing that any circumstance, such as an irruption from our rather doubtful Ally, King John of Abyssinia, were to occur, or the re-appearance on the scene of Osman Digna or the Mahdi, availing themselves of any European complications, what might not happen? The English and the French might propose the fitting out of a Military and Naval Expedition. Italy might hesitate, and Russia and Germany, who had already made official demands to be represented officially on the Caisse, might stop the Expedition altogether. Egypt might, in fact, be a scene of universal complications, caused by the fact that the country was governed by six Powers whose interests were opposed. He proposed to mention a few historical facts which bore out the grave charges which he had made more than once against Her Majesty's Government. On the 13th of November, 1882, Mr. Gladstone stated in debate that "it was no part of the duty of Her Majesty's Government to restore order in the Soudan." Those brief words published to the world the Premier's ignorance of the diplomatic history of Egypt and of the facts of the case. Far from there being only disorder in the Soudan, the rising was a formal and well-planned rebellion of the Mahdi, a religious fanatic, with immense power in Kordofan, and of Arabi Pasha, at the head of his mutinous Army. The plan was that the Mahdi, appealing to the fanaticism and bigotry of the Musulman Soudanese Tribes, was to call to arms some 40,000 of these warlike races, while Arabi Pasha fought against the British troops who were present in the interest of peace and order in Lower Egypt. Here appeared on the scene one of the Premier's dangerous sentimentalities, which drew upon himself a reprisal in Parliament which, to use a French expression, he could only reply to by taciturnity. Mr. Gladstone had dignified that monster in human form, who witnessed with delight the massacre that he had ordered in cold blood of a helpless foe, "a patriot fighting for the liberties of his country."

"Then," replied a talented Member of the other House, "if he is such a William Tell, what can justify the Premier in sending thousands of Her Majesty's soldiers to kill as many thousands of the followers of this patriot?"

The only reply that was made to this serious charge—and that certainly was the safest one—was taciturnity. Now as to the Soudan. Egyptian history showed that the Soudanese Tribes, numbering some 40,000 or 50,000 fighting men, the most warlike and the bravest race in the East, had always coveted the riches of Lower Egypt and hung over her like an avalanche, ready to fall upon her at any moment, defended, as she was, only by a very industrious and useful but very unwarlike population, admirable agriculturists and irrigators, but no soldiers. It had, therefore, been the policy of every Governor of Egypt to subdue these warlike tribes. They had done so temporarily by a free use of the golden key, the divide et impera system, and the mixture of Ethiopian with the Egyptian troops; but eventually Mehemet Ali, Viceroy of Egypt, certainly the greatest and most successful soldier and politician in the East, brought over from his own country, Albania, several regiments of warlike and excellent troops; and, aided by the Ethiopian and selected European troops and talented French Engineers in two campaigns, he completely brought to order the Soudan, effecting a permanent hold of the Soudan Provinces by numerous strategically constructed forts and fortified places, of which Khartoum was the key—a position four miles in extent, and protected by ditches which could be inundated by the White and Blue Niles. Thus he completely subdued and brought into order these dangerous neighbours. But what was the first step of Mr. Gladstone and his Cabinet in direct opposition to Mehemet Ali's military policy? He publicly ordered the evacuation by the Egyptian troops of these fortresses, letting loose, of course, all the elements of war, revolt, and disorder, and fearful massacres ensued. Then, instead of withdrawing the garrisons from the front, and thus protecting the retreat by the successive withdrawal of the six or seven lines of defence, so that they could have made an impregnable defence, with their right flank on Khartoum and their left on Berber, both on the Blue Nile, he withdrew them exactly in a contrary sense from the rear lines. Hence they came back in isolated bodies, and were attacked and forced to surrender from want of food, in all cases the soldiers being massacred and the women and children led into slavery. Unwarned by these terrible defeats and barbarities, the Premier committed the same error when General Graham had completely and successfully conquered Osman Digna and his numerous and gallant tribes, who were completely dismayed and disorganized by their fearful losses from British scientific arms, amounting at the last fight, at Tamai, to no less than 6,200 men—a fearful and for ever deplorable sacrifice of human life, for which the responsibility must rest on those who caused it. British patrols sent out in every direction reported the total distribution and disorganization of the rebel force, and that not an enemy could be seen between the Blue and White Niles. Most unfortunately, as he held, these successes were rendered barren by the action of the Cabinet, and the result was that we were now engaged in a fresh Expedition.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, that he wished to elicit some information upon one point. He was glad to hear that the Government would persistently maintain their power in Egypt; but he was sorry to hear from the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) that he would not press the Government as to what they would do in the Soudan. It would not be reasonable or patriotic to ask for exact details, or at what time it would be advisable to push forward again to Khartoum; but as the noble Earl's statement indicated a distinct difference between their policy in Egypt and their policy in the Soudan, he thought they might fairly ask this one question, Where they drew the line between Egypt and the Soudan? He asked this question principally because he wished to know whether, in the view of Her Majesty's Government, Dongola was in Egypt or the Soudan? We could not forget the noble manner in which we had been assisted by the Mudir of Dongola; and the statement that Her Majesty's Government held themselves entirely free as to their policy in the Soudan must have a most unfortunate effect, for it must make the tribes who had assisted us consider themselves deserted. There could not, at this moment, be a greater folly than to give up the prosecution of the railway from Suakin to Berber. It was no answer to say that some of the troops in the Soudan might be wanted by-and-bye to go to some other part of the world. It was the greatest mistake to keep troops out there without occupation, as nothing would be more likely to breed disease. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would make it understood that they would not abandon the Soudan, and that they would give a proof of their resolution by continuing the construction of the railway for which they had contracted, and for which, in any case, they would have to pay.

On Question? resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—EXPLOSION AT THE ADMIRALTY—QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: Can the noble Earl the First Lord of the Admiralty give the House any information about the explosion at the Admiralty? I understood from the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in the early part of the evening, that the noble Earl would do so before the rising of the House.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: The information I can give to your Lordships is satisfactory as to the condition of Mr. Swainson, the Assistant Secretary, who has been very seriously injured by the abominable attempt which has been made. His medical attendant assures me that in all human probability he will recover. He has had a concussion of the brain and other injuries of the head; but he has regained consciousness, and the doctor has every reason to believe that the accident will not terminate fatally. I have no information as to the precise character of the instrument or shell that was used—because Colonel Majendie has not yet made the investigations necessary in order to arrive at a conclusion. Of this there is no doubt—that the explosive charge, of whatever it may have been composed, was inside the room, and either in or upon a bookshelf or cupboard between the windows. How it arrived there has not yet been discovered, and inquiries are being made. The explosion itself was not of the same serious character as those which have previously taken place, the charge containing probably not more than 2 lbs. of explosive matter, and the damage which it has produced is not very grave, with the exception of the unfortunate injury to Mr. Swainson. The room in which the explosion took place is wrecked. A certain amount of glass has been broken in the office; but no serious damage has been done excepting in the room itself.

PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (POOR LAW) (No. 4) BILL.

(Mr. George Russell, Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

[BILL 116.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, he was given to understand that some opposition would be offered to the Bill by a right hon. Gentleman opposite. He would formally move the second reading, and give the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity of stating his objection.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. George Russell.)

MR. RAIKES said, in the absence of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Bulwer), whom he understood would have been there to state the objection felt in the town of Cambridge to that part of the Bill that related to a parish in that town, he (Mr. Raikes) wished to make an appeal to the hon. Gentleman opposite to postpone the second reading for a week. The question was one which, although it had some historical and local interest, was, perhaps, not a very easy one to debate in the House; and he should have thought that possibly the Local Government Board, taking into account all the local circumstances, might have made some other proposal. Practically, the point upon which the opposition was based had reference to the parish of St. Benedict in the town of Cambridge, a parish which had had a separate civil and ecclesiastical existence of 1,000 years; and that parish it was proposed in the Bill to extinguish by dividing it between two adjoining parishes, in spite of the unanimous wish of the inhabitants of the parish, or, if not unanimous, almost so. The ratepayers held a meeting protesting against the Order, and their Petition to the Local Government Board made it impossible that the Order should become final without having recourse to the judgment of the House; and, in consequence, the matter was included in the Bill with other parishes. He thought the right hon. Baronet at the head of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), who had shown so great an affection for ancient names and historical associations in connection with another subject in which he had interested himself in the House, would be unwilling to act in opposition to the strong feeling which was entertained. He did not know what feeling might exist on the point in other parishes in Cambridge; but, at least, he did know the feeling in the parish of St. Benedict; the inhabitants were strongly desirous that at least their case should be taken out of the Bill and referred to a Select Committee. After what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman opposite, he would be disposed to accept the proposal to allow time for further consideration; and he now moved that the debate be adjourned to that day week.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be adjourned till Thursday next."—(Mr. Raikes.)

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman he should not oppose the Motion. Local feeling was divided in the borough of Cambridge. A Memorial from the inhabitants of St. Benedict had been presented against the Order, and the Local Government Board would like to have the opportunity of consultation before proceeding further. Any arrangement by which the ancient and archæological associations of a place might be preserved would have his sympathy, and he would be glad to see a way out of the position in which the Board were placed. He had great pleasure in acceding to the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday next.

EXPLOSIVES ACTS.

PETITION PRESENTED.

THE O'GORMAN MAHON: I have to present a Petition of rather an unusual character with regard to explosives. There are Acts requiring the Guardians in particular districts in which they exist to take precautions against these explosives. And this is a Petition praying that at the same time certain Acts heretofore in existence should be repealed. The Acts mentioned are the 38 & 39 Vict. It further prays that magistrates shall henceforth be deprived of the power of appointing individuals to look after these explosives, as there now ceases to be any necessity for doing so, since the Authorities have confided the matter to the police. The Petition is signed by one of the most respectable men in my county, whose only fault happens to be that he is a Conservative. The Board of Guardians with which he is connected are Liberal in the extreme, and this matter shows their feeling as regards Conservative gentlemen; for, although opposed to both Whigs and Tories, they will tolerate such men as that.

Petition to lie on the Table.

QUESTIONS.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY — REPRODUCTION OF THE PICTURES BY PHOTOGRAPHY.

MR. TOMLINSON asked the honourable Member for East Cumberland, as one of the Trustees of the National Gallery, Whether he can state what were the conditions on which Messrs. Braun and Co. of Germany, and Messrs. Goupil and Co. of Paris, were respectively allowed to photograph the pictures in the National Gallery; whether any facilities were accorded to them, or either of them, which have been or would be refused to other photographers; whether amongst such facilities were comprised those of being allowed to remove the glass from some of the pictures, or to have them taken from the wall; whether the permission to erect a temporary structure outside the National Gallery was accorded exclusively to Messrs. Braun and Co. or whether a similar privilege would be given to any English photographers; whether any stipulations were made with the favoured photographers as to the price at which copies of the photographs were to be allowed to be sold, or as to providing copies gratis or at a reduced price to any public institution; whether any consideration was given by the favoured firms, or either of them, for the privileges accorded to them; whether any English photographers would be allowed any similar privileges to those given to the Foreign firms; and, if so, under what conditions; whether any special arrangements will be made for photographing the Ansdei Raphael; and, whether any Papers relating to the subject will be laid upon the Table?

MR. GEORGE HOWARD, in reply, said that Messrs. Braun had made photographic reproductions from most of the picture galleries of Europe, and in the case of the National Gallery no special conditions were laid down. They had made reproductions of 320 pictures, and they were not allowed to remove all the pictures during the progress of the work.

MR. TOMLINSON: Were there any written conditions?

MR. GEORGE HOWARD: No, Sir.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES ACT), 1883.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked Mr. Attorney General, If he will be good enough to inform the House whether the allowance to any person in the employ of another of the necessary time to enable him to record his vote at an election, in his proper district, without deduction from his salary or wages in respect of the time so occupied, is a corrupt practice within the meaning of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883, unless the same be done with a corrupt motive, and with a view to influencing the vote of such person?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, that it seemed to him it would be dangerous to attempt to give a definition of what would or would not be a corrupt practice in such a case. Each case would have, as it arose, to be determined on its merits.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked, whether, considering the risk which every Liberal or Conservative employer would incur in this matter, the hon. and learned Gentleman would be prepared to introduce an Amendment of the Corrupt Practices Act?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, the Act made no change in this matter; but he was willing to consider the subject.

SOUTH AFRICA—AFFAIRS OF BECHUANALAND.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can give the House any information as to the present position of affairs in Bechuanaland, and the relations between the High Commissioner and Sir Charles Warren; and, whether the proposals of Sir Charles Warren for the settlement of the Country are receiving the sanction and support of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I am not yet able to add anything of importance to the information given in previous answers in this House and in "another place." Indeed, we have had no telegraphic communication since the 9th of this month. The long interval which has passed without any reference to the relations which exist between the High Commissioner and Sir Charles Warren makes me hope and believe that they have continued cordial and satisfactory. We have not yet received from Sir Charles Warren any Report detailing what he has done up to the present time. Up to the end of March he seems to have been busily engaged in defining the frontier. We are also awaiting his proposals for the settlement of Bechuanaland; and I need hardly assure the right hon. Gentleman that when they do arrive they will receive that consideration which Sir Charles Warren's position and services entitle them to.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—MARKETHILL PETTY SESSIONS—SERGEANT EAKINS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Sergeant Eakins brought before the magistrates privately, at last Petty Sessions held on the 30th March last at Markethill, a placard, posted some time since in that town, reflecting on the conduct of a local publican; whether he proposed to swear it was the handwriting of a respectable young man; whether the magistrates told him that it was not this party's writing, and refused to take his oath; whether he had the authority of his superior officer for doing so; whether this is the same officer who arrested a Catholic priest and a magistrate at Mohill some years ago; and, whether, after him swearing both were drunk, the magistrates there dismissed both cases; and what action he proposes now to take?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Sergeant Eakins brought before the magistrates a placard reflecting on the conduct of a local policeman—not a publican. He did not propose to swear it was in the handwriting of a respectable young man. The magistrates gave no opinion or directions in the case. The sergeant had the authority of his superior officer for the course he pursued. He was never stationed in Mohill, and never arrested either a Catholic priest or a magistrate.

IRELAND—A ROYAL RESIDENCE.

MR. GABBETT asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If Her Majesty's Government have now come to the conclusion that the time has arrived when, in the interests of Ireland and Great Britain, a Royal residence in Ireland for frequent occupation ought to be provided; and, whether the Government would consider the expediency of abolishing the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland and of establishing a government for Ireland in the person of a member of the Royal Family?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The only reply which I can make to the hon. Member is that I am not prepared to make any announcement on either of the subjects mentioned.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE CORONER'S COURT—JURYMEN'S OATH.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been called to an inquest held last Saturday at the Britannia Tavern, Latimer Road, Notting Hill, by Dr. Diplock, at which a gentleman who had been summoned as a juror, and who was stated by the coroner to be disqualified from serving, because he did not believe in the binding power of an oath, was not allowed to leave the court, until the conclusion of the inquest; and, whether his retention was in accordance with the Law; and, if so, with what Law?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, that the power of the Coroner in such a case would be similar to that of a Judge, and therefore he would be in his right in retaining the jurymen. He had communicated with Dr. Diplock, and he found that on a recent occasion, when the question was mooted as to the obligation of jurymen when summoned, there was an objection raised by a jurymen to serve on account of his want of religious belief. The Coroner yielded to the objection on this occasion; but shortly afterwards, when holding an inquest in the same neighbourhood, he found that out of the jurymen summoned there was scarcely anyone who had not doubts as to his religious belief. In these circumstances, and in order to prevent such an objection being raised, the jurymen had been retained, so that they should bear the same burden of attendance as those who had no difficulties in regard to religious belief.

RAILWAYS (INDIA)—THE QUETTA RAILWAY.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If, having regard to the fact that all the money expended up to 1880 upon the construction of the Quetta Railway has been charged to the account of the War in Afghanistan, he can now state under what head of account the expenditure now being incurred for the completion of the Railway will be charged?

MR. ONSLOW asked whether the hon. Gentleman could state the present contract per mile of this railway, and the price per mile before the railway was broken up in 1880?

MR. J. K. CROSS: There was no contract previously for the railway, and there is none now; in fact, there is no estimate formed at all. The hon. Gentleman speaks of "all the money expended up to 1880 on the construction of the Quetta Railway" as having been "charged to the account of the War in Afghanistan." I may point out that this may lead to some misapprehension. The total amount spent to the end of 1880-1 on proposed lines from the Indus to Candahar was £1,713,946, of which £595,987 was transferred in 1881-2 to the account of war in Afghanistan. It is intended to place the present expenditure to the frontier railways account. But a considerable portion of the cost of the system of frontier railways now proposed—which system is described in Papers, No. 113, lately presented to Parliament—will necessarily be defrayed from borrowed money. The heading under which this portion of the expenditure will appear in the accounts has not been finally decided.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)—THE COMMISSARIAT—SUPPLY OF HAY.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office, Whether he is aware that, last week, two tenders for delivery of hay during the ensuing six months at Woolwich and Aldershot were accepted at the respective prices of 94s. and 93s. per ton, and that, at the same time, a tender for hay at Woolwich for the troops in Egypt was accepted at the price of 120s. per ton; and, if he can state why hay supplied for horses and camels in Egypt should cost more than that supplied for horses in England?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: The prices stated in the Question are practically accurate. Hay for use at home is bought for early consumption at the places where it is delivered. For abroad it has to be compressed, and may be required to keep for some time. For such a purpose extreme care is required in accepting any hay but the very first quality. Hence the difference in price.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND)—IMPORTED RAGS.

DR. FARQUHARSON asked the Secretary to the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been directed to a statement in The Aberdeen Free Press of April 15th, to the effect that two cases of small-pox have recently occurred among workers in the Woodside rag works; whether he is aware that previous epidemics of small-pox have been traced to the same source ; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will direct that these depôts of foreign rags, which have been proved to disseminate disease, shall be subjected to very strict disinfection ?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I have communicated with the Board of Supervision in regard to this matter, and I am informed that the attention of the Board has been directed to the fact that small-pox has on more than one occasion occurred among the workers in the works referred to, and others. There can be no doubt that in some of these cases the infection has been traced to rags imported from abroad, as well as to the rags collected in this country. The Board's Medical Officer has made inquiries at the instance of the Board ; but as it appeared very doubtful whether, under the Public Health Act, the Board could compel the paper makers to disinfect the bundles of rags before being used, the Board have mainly directed the attention of the Local Authority to the importance of making provision for the isolation and treatment of the infected persons, so as to prevent the spread of the disease. The action of the Local Authority of Woodside, where the works are situated, has been, on the whole, very successful in preventing the disease at any time from assuming an epidemic form.

POOR RATES—3 & 4 WILL. IV. c. 30—EXEMPTION OF CHAPELS, &c. IN ENGLAND AND WALES.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he will direct a Return to be made giving the number, denomination, and locality of the chapels, meeting houses, and premises (other than those of the Church of England) in England and Wales, which are exempted by the 3 and 4 Will. 4, c. 30, from assessment to poor rates, on the ground that they—

“Are exclusively appropriated to public religious worship, and are duly certified for the performance of such religious worship according to the provision of any Act or Acts now in force ?”

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The particulars required for a Return, such as that proposed, could only be furnished by the overseers of the poor of the several parishes in England and Wales. This would involve the obtaining of about 15,000 Returns. The difficulty, trouble, and expense attending the obtaining and compilation of the Returns, irrespective of the cost of printing, would be so considerable that we are not prepared to direct that a Return shall be made as suggested.

PARLIAMENT—PALACE OF WEST-MINSTER—VENTILATION OF THIS HOUSE.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE asked the junior Member for Leeds, Whether he can inform the House when it is probable that the windows in the House and the Lobbies, which formerly could be opened, but, having been broken by the explosion, have since been temporarily closed, will be in a condition to be again opened, and allow fresh air to enter the House ?

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: The metal work of the casements has been repaired, and the stained glass, which is in progress, will be finished by Whitsuntide. If the outside temperature renders it necessary, the temporary windows can, at a small cost, be made to open. But I must point out to the hon. Member that fresh air is continually being introduced through the floor of the House, and that the officers in charge have a great objection to the opening of the windows, particularly at this early season of the year, as tending to interfere seriously with the general system of ventilation, which, on the whole, thanks to their unceasing care, answers extremely well.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — THE CLERK OF MULLAGHROE PETTY SESSIONS, CO. SLIGO.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the clerk of Petty Sessions at Mullaghroe (county Sligo), lives in the town of Boyle, in another Petty Sessions district, and in another county ; whether many residents in the Mullaghroe district, having business with the clerk, have to make a journey of over twenty miles in order to transact their business ; whether the clerk of Mullaghroe is also clerk of three other Petty Sessions districts ; whether the Government regard this arrangement as one that can properly be continued; and, whether they will take steps to cause the appointment as clerk for Mullaghroe of a person resident in the district, and having time to devote to the due performance of the duties of the office?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Clerk of Mullaghroe Petty Sessions resides at Boyle, which is 6½ miles from Mullaghroe. He was elected by the magistrates in 1879, when the question of his being also clerk of other districts was raised; but the Lord Lieutenant decided not to interfere with the choice of the magistrates. No complaint has since been made of inconvenience to the public; but if such inconvenience can be shown to have arisen, the expediency of continuing the arrangement can be inquired into.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if it is not a fact that the Petty Sessions Clerk is required to visit his office at certain hours every day; and if it is possible for it to be done in this case?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: If any inconvenience can be shown, the matter will be inquired into.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. AVERELL LLOYD, J.P.

MR. DEASY (for MR. SMALL) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. Averell Lloyd, a magistrate residing at Tamnamore, county Tyrone, was fined, at the Armagh Quarter Sessions, on an appeal from the magistrates, for assaulting Thomas Harbison; and, what course the Government intend to take in the matter?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I find this matter was under the consideration of the late Lord Chancellor, who came to the conclusion that, although an assault of a trivial character had undoubtedly taken place, yet, as it was committed in the supposed exercise of a legal right, it did not appear to be a case for further notice.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—DRUMFIN DIVISION, COUNTY SLIGO.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with regard to the recent election of a Poor Law guardian for the Drumfin Division (Sligo), Whether, after the returning officer had returned Mr. Thomas Patterson as elected by a majority of one, the Board, on investigation, found that six votes had been recorded for Mr. Patterson which should not have been allowed, and that the said votes were lost, because the paper on which they were entered had not been returned to the police and taken up by them in the manner prescribed by Law; whether this decision of the Board left the other candidate, Mr. Martin Judge, in a majority of five upon the poll; whether, nevertheless, the Board have declined to declare Mr. Judge elected, and have declined upon the ground that the provisions of the Poor Law Acts do not allow them to declare a candidate elected unless he has been so returned by the returning officer; what provisions in the Acts in question are relied on to support this view; and, whether, the Board having already informed the returning officer that the candidate declared by him to have been returned had been so returned because the returning officer had unduly allowed "lost votes," the Board will now be instructed that it is their duty to declare the candidate returned who obtained the majority of valid votes in the election?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Question correctly represents the facts of the case. The Local Government Board can only decide whether the person returned has a right to act or not. They have no power to declare another person elected, or to return or appoint another Guardian themselves.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to answer the last paragraph but one of the Question. If he cannot answer that, I would ask whether it is a fact that the Local Government Board, although they have admitted that the election was illegal, are debarred by this improper action on the part of this officer from declaring the candidate returned who has obtained the majority of votes?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I have no knowledge of any particular provisions provided which could be relied upon; but I believe that this has been the practice for the past 20 or 30 years.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to give Notice that upon the Estimates for the Local Government Board I shall call attention to the necessity for an amendment in the law in this respect.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—DONEGAL BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the action of the Donegal Board of Guardians in refusing, by a resolution passed at their meeting on the 18th instant, to direct the clerk of the Union to serve the notices required by the ninth section of the Representation of the People Act, pending the receipt of instructions referred to in his letter of the 7th instant to the Board; whether these instructions have any connection with the service of the notices; whether the action of the Board, by postponing to serve the notices referred to, is calculated to disfranchise a large section of the householders of the Union; and, whether the Local Government Board will take immediate action to prevent further delay by the Donegal Guardians in having the notices duly served?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The facts are as stated, and the Local Government Board have told the Clerk that the Guardians had no power to make such an order, and that he is bound to proceed with his duty of serving these notices without unnecessary delay.

MR. HEALY: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will direct the Local Government Board to send down an Inspector in order to see that this shall be done immediately?

[Reply inaudible.]

MR. HEALY: Will he telegraph to the Local Government Board to ask whether the voters should be disfranchised or not?

[No reply.]

ARMY—THE RIFLE BRIGADE—NUMBERS.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Secretary of State for War, How many recruits are now at the depôt of the Rifle Brigade, and what number is the 2nd battalion which is at home in excess of its establishment; and, how it is proposed to feed the three battalions abroad from one battalion at home, and a depôt under its establishment, according to the last monthly Return?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: On Saturday last there were 15 recruits at drill at the depôt of the Rifle Brigade, and the 2nd Battalion had on the same day 62 rank and file in excess of its establishment. The three battalions abroad are at present above their establishment; and should more men be required to feed them than may be available with the battalion at home at the depot, there are a large number of men belonging to this regiment in the Army Reserve.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE FEES OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to page 25 of the Finance Accounts, What are the fees formerly payable to the Attorney General for Ireland, and amounting to £109 11s. 8d. which are credited to the Chief Secretary's Office; what they are for, and by whom they are paid?

MR. HIBBERT: These fees are payable upon the grant of Letters Patent, Charters, &c. They were formerly retained by the Attorney General, but had since 1878 been paid into the Exchequer, as the holders of them have received a commuted allowance in lieu. These payments are extra receipts on the Vote for Law Charges (Ireland), which are accounted for by the Chief Secretary's Office.

INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT—EXCISE COLLECTION.

MR. KENNY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that, since 1882, by the re-arrangement of the Inland Revenue business throughout the United Kingdom, a large saving has been effected in the annual expenditure in that Department; and, whether some of the money so saved will be devoted to increasing the salaries of the supervisors and officers of the Excise branch, who for years are complaining of inadequate salaries?

MR. HIBBERT: The Board of Inland Revenue have in the last few years succeeded in reducing by about 130 the number of the staff employed in the collection of the Excise revenue; but the saving which would have resulted from this reform has been neutralized by improvements which have been and are being made in the pay, emoluments, and holidays of the staff. These changes are set forth in Papers before the House, or which will be so in a few days.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES) — SCHOOL EXAMINATIONS — THE PORTSMOUTH DISTRICT.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether complaints have been received at any time respecting the high standard of examination adopted by Her Majesty's Inspector in the Portsmouth district; and what steps have been taken by the Education Department in reference thereto; and, whether information can be given as to the per-centage of schools in the above district assessed as "Fair," "Good," "Excellent," as compared with the adjoining districts inspected by Messrs. Koe and Virtue respectively?

MR. MUNDELLA: I am not aware that any complaints have reached the Education Department as to the standard of examination in the Portsmouth district.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked for an answer as to the second paragraph of the Question.

MR. MUNDELLA: I regret that the hon. Member should put this Question. This kind of comparison of Inspectors acts as a discouragement to them to do their duty.

PARLIAMENT—THE OATH OF ALLEGIANCE.

MR. M'COAN asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether any, and what, penalty attaches to breach of the Oath of Allegiance taken by Members of this House; whether his attention has been called to The United Ireland and to The Freeman's Journal, both of the 18th inst., containing reports of speeches delivered on the occasion of the Prince of Wales's visit to Ireland by, amongst others, Mr. W. O'Brien, M.P., at Kanturck, on the 12th inst., when he is reported to have said—

"England is entering upon a gigantic struggle with Russia (enthusiastic cheering). It seems to me to be just the moment for the Irish people to proclaim to the world, and to warn England, that in the hour of her peril she will have to deal with an Irish nation, which she has oppressed, impoverished, ruined, and plundered (prolonged cheering). a nation which burns and longs for the opportunity of putting an end for ever to English misgovernment in Ireland by peaceable means and by friendly alliance, if that be possible, but if not by any means that God's providence may send to close our long struggle for national independence (prolonged cheering);"

also of a speech delivered by Mr. W. Redmond, M.P., at Dundalk, on the 12th inst., in which—

"He rejoiced that in their resolutions they first declared their unalterable determination to be satisfied with nothing that England could give so long as Englishmen ruled them (cheers), and so long as the English flag took the place where the green only ought to float (cheers). There could be no time when it would be more appropriate or effective for them to pronounce in favour of Home Rule, because the old saying was as true now as in the days when Wolfe Tone died, that 'England's difficulty, under the providence of God, was Ireland's opportunity.' In the Soudan the English had got 20,000 of their picked troops trying to 'smash the Mahdi' (cheers and laughter). In the Soudan the English had already got from the brave Arabs a touch of what his fellow-countrymen gave them in the blessed days of '98 (prolonged cheering). He thought the day was coming when the Irish people will place the immortal green for ever over and above the red (cheers);"

also of a speech made at the Rotunda, Dublin, on the 17th instant, by Mr. W. Redmond, M.P., in which he said—

"He (the Prince of Wales) had prayed that God might protect and bless Ireland (renewed groaning). Such a thing from a man whose Country had trampled upon them, disgraced them, and ruined them, was insulting to the Irish race (applause). The Irish people wanted no praise from an English Prince for their salvation. If the great majority of the Irish people believed that they could not get salvation except through the mediation of the English Prince, they would rather go down willingly to perdition (applause). . . . If they were persecuted too much by Orangemen and Freemasons, if they had too much princely visit slung in their teeth by the English Times, they would be compelled to fall in shoulder to shoulder, and to march along, if not to liberty in this Country, at least to die with their face to their foe, with the green standard of their fathers flying above them (loud cheers);"

also of a further speech delivered by Mr. W. O'Brien, M.P., at the fortnightly meeting of the Irish National League held in Dublin on the 21st inst. at which he is reported by The Times of yesterday to have said—

"There was no loyalty in Ireland to England or an English Prince, and wherever the Prince would go throughout the country there would not be wanting evidence to remind him that the sincere and earnest prayer of the Irish people was that the British Empire would be sent for twenty-four hours under the sea (loud cheers);”

and, whether such speeches constitute a legal offence, and whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any action in regard to them, or to permit the continued deliverance of similar speeches with impunity in the future?

MR. BIGGAR: Before the hon. and learned Gentleman answers that Question, may I be permitted to ask him whether there is any fee allowed to a common informer in such cases as this?

MR. SPEAKER: Order!

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I do not know that any offence can be charged against anyone, or that any penalty can be inflicted upon anyone, for breaking the Oath of Allegiance. Of course, if any persons commit any acts either of high treason or of sedition which show him to be wanting in the fulfilment of that Oath, he will be guilty, by law, for having committed those acts; but no charge can be preferred in that name for not having fulfilled the Oath and promise of allegiance. Then the hon. Member asks me whether such speeches as are quoted in the Question constitute a legal offence? If I were to answer that Question, I should be taking upon myself the fulfilment of the duties both of Judge and jury. I, therefore, respectfully ask the House to permit me not to be the judge of any man, be he a Member of this House or not, or to say whether he has or has not been guilty of an offence. As to the third Question, whatever course it is thought right to take, either in the affirmative or in the negative, the matter rests entirely with the Irish Executive.

MR. M'COAN: Then, as regards the Oath of Allegiance taken in this House, are we to understand that it is, as the junior Member for Northampton describes it to be for himself, an idle form, or a legal reality imposing an obligation?

[No reply.]

Afterwards,

MR. M'COAN said: As the Attorney General has stated, in answer to the final portion of my Question, that it would be more properly addressed to the Irish Executive, I beg to give Notice that, on a future day, I shall ask that part of the Question of the Solicitor General or Chief Secretary for Ireland, whichever is the more competent to answer it.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—THE RIVER BANN.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will state the present intentions of the Government as to the Bann Navigation question, and is he aware that while the works are most injurious to drainage and ruinous to riverside farmers, the navigation which they were constructed to facilitate is practically non-existent, and that an existing railway amply provides for freight and carriage in the district?

MR. HIBBERT: The Government has given a great deal of attention to this question, and are fully alive to the grievances of the riparian occupiers. I recently stated, in reply to my hon. Friend the senior Member for the county of Derry (Sir Thomas M'Clure), that we are considering what can be done to meet the case, and I hope we shall shortly be able to arrive at a conclusion. But it is right to say that the Government have no power to remove the navigation works, however useless they may think them, without legislation.

MR. HEALY: May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether, in view of the fact that the Solicitor General for Ireland represents the county in question, steps will be taken to improve the drainage of these districts before the next General Election?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I should like to put the same Question with respect to the Shannon and Barrow.

MR. HIBBERT: The matter is being inquired into.

INTERMEDIATE AND HIGHER EDUCATION (WALES)—THE WELSH COLLEGES.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether, having regard to the fact that the number of students at the University College of Wales at Aberystwith has largely increased since the establishment of the Colleges at Cardiff and Bangor, he will consider the advisability of increasing the Grant to the College at Aberystwith, so as to place it in the same position as the other Colleges?

MR. MUNDELLA: The recent success of the Aberystwith College, and, indeed, of all three of the Welsh Colleges, is highly gratifying, and justifies the encouragement which the Government has extended to higher education in Wales. Having regard, however, to the fact that the grant to Aberystwith was settled only about nine months ago, in strict conformity with the wants and wishes of the Governing Body of that College, it is premature to re-open the question until we have had some further experience of its progress and success. We shall not lose sight of the matter to which the hon. Member has called attention.

ADMIRALTY—OFFICE OF THE ACCOUNTANT GENERAL OF THE NAVY.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, On what grounds the term of Mr. Willis's appointment as Accountant General of the Navy was limited to three years; whether he would place upon the Table a Return of the several officers who have held the position of Accountant General of the Navy, showing their previous service, the length of time they held the office, their age on retirement, and the cause of their retirement, i.e., whether the same was voluntary or not; and, whether he would grant a Return of the Members constituting the Board of Admiralty since 1st January 1865, showing their tenure of office and cause of leaving?

MR. CAINE: The Office of Accountant General of the Navy became vacant in 1882 by the promotion of Mr. (now Sir) Robert Hamilton. Mr. Willis was at that time the Deputy Accountant General, and was approaching his 60th year, when, under ordinary circumstances, he would have been retired. But the re-organization of the Department had only recently been completed, and it was deemed advisable to retain Mr. Willis's services for a limited period in the position vacated by Mr. Hamilton. The period was fixed at three years, because that period was necessary to enable Mr. Willis, on retirement, to receive his full pension. No object would be gained by presenting the Return asked for relating to the tenure of office by previous officers holding the position of Accountant General; but, if desired, the information could be given. With regard to the last sentence of the Question, I do not see why the officials of the Admiralty should be taken away from more important work to make a Return which the hon. Member can make for himself in half-an-hour from The Navy Lists in the Library. The chief causes why Members of the Board have left their respective offices have been promotions and changes of Government.

CYPRUS (FINANCE, &c.)—REPORTED REVENUE FRAUDS.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Chief Inspector of Revenue in Cyprus has resigned his office; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will withhold their acceptance of his resignation until further inquiry into the recent revenue frauds has taken place?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in reply, said, the Government had telegraphed to Cyprus regarding this Question; but a reply had not yet been received.

MR. GORST said, he would call attention to the subject in Supply, and move a reduction of the Vote.

ARMY (CONTRACTS)—TINNED MEAT FOR FIELD SERVICE.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (for Mr. Digby) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether offers have been invited for the supply of tinned meat for British troops in the field from such firms in the Australasian and other British Colonies as are prepared to tender; and, if so, what was the relative price, as compared with the prices charged by American firms, who hold the contracts at present?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: The bulk of the Australian tinned meat comes to this country in tins of a shape not suited for field service. When the meat is in suitable tins, and of approved brands, it is always taken if the conditions are equal, and the price not higher than that of American meat.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked whether any preference was shown for Colonial beef?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, that if the price was equal the Australian meat was taken in preference.

DUBLIN METROPOLITAN POLICE—
POSTING OF PLACARDS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If police notices issued by the Commissioner of the Dublin Metropolitan Police have been posted within the last few days on the pedestal of the Grattan statue in College Green, Dublin; and, if the Commissioner has any legal right to cause the public monuments of the city to be so defaced?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: A police notice for the regulation of traffic was posted on the pedestal of the Grattan Statue, but not by the police or any of their agents. When the police saw it, they had it removed.

MR. SEXTON: Who posted the notices?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That I do not know.

MR. HEALY: Is it a fact that public attention had been called in this House previously to the defacement of public monuments in Ireland by the police?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: What I understand happened in this case was that a number of these notices were issued to persons supposed to have been affected by them, and they may have posted them on the statue.

MR. HEALY: The police would not have posted them on King William's Statue?

MR. SEXTON: Is it usual for the Police Commissioner, having to issue notices to people, to get them posted for him?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir.

ARMY (THE MILITARY EXPEDITION TO EGYPT)—THE VOTE FOR CHARGES.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can inform the House of the precise amount of the £4,000,000 which the House is asked to vote for the charges in the Soudan and Upper Egypt under the head of "Army," that has already been expended, and the amount that is to be expended on the completion of the Wady Halfa Railroad; and, whether this Railroad when completed will be the property of Her Majesty's Government?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I will answer the hon. Member for my right hon. Friend. I am unable to state the amount expended to the present time; but I presume that the hon. Member means the amount of liability which has been incurred. It is not possible to state this with accuracy. Expenditure is being incurred in India and in Egypt, for which the accounts have not been received, and cannot be received for some time. The actual liabilities may be estimated to amount to £2,500,000. It must not be supposed, however, that, under any circumstances, the Soudan expenditure could be reduced to this amount. Provision has to be made for maintenance of adequate garrisons in Suakin and in Upper Egypt; and the expenditure in excess of what is required for these services will depend on the rate at which it may be found possible to effect the intended concentration of the troops. The estimated cost of the Nile Railway is £400,000; but communications are now being made with Sir Evelyn Baring and Lord Wolseley as to the extent to which it should be completed.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION—EXPENDITURE.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the statement in The Weekly Dispatch that the following quantity of spirituous liquors accompanied Sir Peter Lumsden's Mission:—300 dozen of champagne, 150 dozen of claret, 100 dozen of other wines, 100 dozen of brandy, 150 dozen of whiskey, and 400 dozen of beer; and, if so, whether these spirituous liquors were intended for the consumption of Sir Peter Lumsden and his Staff, or to be consumed by Afghans and Turcomans; and, whether Sir Peter Lumsden is receiving, in addition to his pay and allowances as a General, a salary at the rate of £50,000 per annum, as stated in The Weekly Dispatch?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he would have any objection to lay upon the Table a statement with reference to Sir Peter Lumsden's mission, showing—(1.) The amount of estimated expenditure for the pay and allowances of (a) Sir Peter Lumsden himself; (b) for the rest of the mission; (2.) The amount of the estimated incidental expenditure?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The pay and allowances of Sir Peter Lumsden during his Mission, including his pay and allowances as Major General in the Army, are £3,112 10s. a-year, besides which he continues to draw £1,200 a-year as Member of the Indian Council. The other officers of the Mission received an addition of one-fifth to their Indian pay and allowances. The total cost of the Mission entered in the revised Estimates for 1884-5 is £120,000. In the Budget for 1885-6 further provision is made for £60,000. With regard to the extracts from The Weekly Dispatch, quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, the only information on the subject that we have is that there was to be sent from India for the use of the Mission 15 dozen of champagne and six dozen of brandy.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—PROCESSION OF BANDS IN DUBLIN.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that the Chief Commissioner of Police in Dublin issued a notice on Monday last to the effect that any of the citizens' bands playing in the streets of that city on the nights of Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday would be dispersed by force; whether he caused copies of that notice to be served by the police on the masters of several of those bands; and, whether the Chief Commissioner of Police has power to fix the occasions on which popular bands will be allowed to perform in Dublin, or to prescribe the tunes which they are to play?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It having been publicly stated that the amateur bands of the city had been invited to parade the streets on the evenings referred to, and that the object of the parade was to express dissent from those who had decorated their houses or otherwise manifested their loyalty towards His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, the police, knowing that such a procession of bands in such circumstances was likely to result in outrages on property and disturbance of the public peace, communicated verbally with the leaders of the bands, and warned them that the parade would not be allowed. In taking this course the police not only acted within their powers, but they would have failed in their duty if they had not done so.

Mr. J. K. Cross

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—RANK OF OFFICERS.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD asked the Secretary of State for India, If it is a fact that the rank of Major is granted to Officers of the Militia and Volunteer Battalions of a Territorial Regiment after 20 years' service, and the rank of Lieut.-Colonel after 25 years' service; and, if he will consider the advisability, now that the Militia and Volunteer Officers are doing duty with the regular battalions, of granting similar rank to the officers of those battalions with the same length of service?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The rank referred to as granted in the Auxiliary Forces is entirely honorary, and affords the holder neither precedence nor military command over officers of the Army. There is no necessity for extending the system to Army officers.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION—COMMUNICATION.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, How long it takes now to send messages by telegraph to and receive messages from Sir P. Lumsden?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The House is already in possession of this information. The last telegram received from Sir Peter Lumsden (see Central Asia, No. 1, 1885) is dated Tirpul, April 17, and was received in London at 8.30 a.m. on the 21st. It may be assumed that telegrams from the Foreign Office will take about an equal amount of time to reach Sir Peter Lumsden.

MR. ONSLOW: Does the noble Lord not know that telegrams have been received from Tirpul in much less time than four days?

[No reply.]

CENTRAL ASIA—ARREST OF AYOOB KHAN.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can communicate any further intelligence regarding the arrest of Ayob Khan?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No further intelligence regarding Ayob Khan has been received at the Foreign Office since my last reply in the House.

POST OFFICE—THE COMMITTEE ON POSTAGE STAMPS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Postmaster General, Whether the Post Office Committee on Stamps have yet returned from visiting the various Government Stamp Factories on the Continent; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House any Report they may have made in connection with that visit, as well as upon any departmental and other evidence they may have taken?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, the inquiries of the Committee had been completed, but he had not yet received their Report.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHAN-ISTAN—PRODUCTION OF PAPERS—
THE VOTE OF CREDIT.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will lay upon the Table any more Papers connected with the proceedings on the Afghan frontier, before he asks for the Vote of Credit; and, whether he can state what is the exact point at issue between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Russia?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have given the consideration which I promised to give to the subject of the telegrams preceding that important telegram—the detailed telegram—of Sir Peter Lumsden, which has been laid upon the Table, and the result is this, that we have not found that we could convey valuable information by the dispersed statements, contained in former telegrams, and which are mixed with a good deal of extraneous matter. It is not, therefore, our intention to lay further Papers on the Table connected with the proceedings on the Afghan Frontier before we ask for the Vote of Credit. I have given careful consideration to the second part of this Question, and have consulted Lord Granville and others of my Colleagues, and although we should gladly, if we could, lay open precisely what is going forward, the fact is that we are engaged in a Correspondence of extreme gravity, and to make a complete statement of its nature and particulars would be impossible, while no partial statement could be given without great risk of creating misapprehension. Consequently, though with some reluctance, we have arrived at the conclusion that we cannot undertake to give any further statement to the House as to the nature and particulars of the Correspondence with the Russian Government at the present time.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Will the right hon. Gentleman make any statement on Monday?

MR. GLADSTONE: Well, I could not undertake to do so. It may be that between this time and Monday information may reach us of a character which may be communicated to the House; but I cannot enter into any covenants on the subject.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Does the right hon. Gentleman think that the House will, immediately after the first statement, proceed to pass the Vote? I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that in 1878, when we proposed a Vote of Credit, the stages were that the amount was mentioned on Friday, and on Monday a statement was made by the Government of the circumstances which led to the Vote. The Opposition of the day thought it unreasonable at once to proceed to the discussion, and the matter was put off till the following Thursday.

MR. GLADSTONE: It will be in the power of the House, if they think fit, to contend that more time is required. I have very grave doubts as to whether that contention will be made on the facts before us. We have been careful to make statements to the House of the precise character of the Vote and all that is connected with the Vote itself. With respect to the justification for proposing the Vote, that we shall state on Monday; but I am not aware that it is my duty to state to the House anything that, so far as I know, will require prolonged consideration. Should the House see cause to demand further time for consideration, it will be in the power of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, or of any other Member of the House, to urge their views to that effect. But certainly in a case of this kind—Votes of Credit differ from one another in character—where the general grounds of the Vote are patent to the world, and where their extreme importance and the manner in which they are associated with the national interests and dignity are universally recognized, our impression is that it will be the disposition of the House to proceed at once with the Vote.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked whether the despatch of M. de Giers, published in the newspapers that morning, had been received by Her Majesty's Government?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have not seen the despatch in the papers this morning.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that no Papers relating to Sir Peter Lumsden's Mission and the Afghan Frontier have been given to Parliament for a long time—none at all, I am informed, except the one despatch from Sir Peter Lumsden?

MR. GLADSTONE: I believe that is so.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: And yet the right hon. Gentleman wishes the House to understand that no information with regard to this question will be laid before the House before Monday, when the Vote is to be discussed?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Vote of Credit has no reference to Sir Peter Lumsden's Mission.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: The Afghan Frontier?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir Peter Lumsden's Mission does not require a Vote of Credit. It is the unfortunate and deplorable incidents that have arisen in the course of it, but which are quite distinguishable and separate in themselves.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Is it not the case that the attack on the Afghan position at Penjdeh is closely connected with Sir Peter Lumsden's Mission and the correspondence which took place with regard to the escort which accompanied Sir Peter Lumsden? We wish to know whether the House can come to any definite conclusion respecting the negotiations with regard to the Afghan Frontier without more information than it at present possesses?

MR. GLADSTONE: We do not ask the House to come to any definite conclusion on the negotiations generally. The necessity for the Vote of Credit does not arise out of the course of these negotiations, but it has been precipitated by special circumstances quite separate from the negotiations. We conceive that the telegrams laid before the House from Sir Peter Lumsden will enable the House to fully understand the nature of the requisitions made upon them.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: After the answer which the right hon. Gentleman has given, I should wish to ask are any of the facts connected with the departure of Sir Peter Lumsden from Gulran and the circumstances by which that departure was accompanied stated in any of the telegrams from Sir Peter Lumsden which had not been communicated to the House; and, if so, will the right hon. Gentleman allow the House to be in possession of those telegrams referring to the reason why Sir Peter Lumsden quitted Gulran and the circumstances attending that departure?

MR. GLADSTONE: I must ask the noble Lord to put a Question of this kind on the Paper, as it taxes my memory with regard to particulars.

MR. O'KELLY: Will the right hon. Gentleman take into consideration the desirability of postponing the Vote of Credit until the Government are in a position to lay before the House full information with reference to the transaction at Penjdeh?

MR. GLADSTONE: My opinion is that such a course would be extremely prejudicial to the public interest and very adverse to the general feeling of the House.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is within his recollection that one of the most formidable articles in his indictment against Lord Beaconsfield's Government was that it withheld information from Parliament while expecting a debate to be carried on? I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is going to follow that bad example?

[No reply.]

SIR WALTER B. BARTHELOT: I should like to know whether the Vote of Credit can be put in two distinct sums, one of £6,500,000 for special preparations, and the other of £4,500,000 for the Soudan Expedition?

MR. GLADSTONE: My impression is that it will be open to anyone as a matter of form to move to reduce the Vote of Credit; but, undoubtedly, as the matter stands, it will be put in one sum.

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT: In reference to the answer which was given to the noble Lord by the Prime Minister, I would ask whether it is the fact that the Russian Government, in their reply to Her Majesty's Government, have asserted that the deplorable incident at Penjeh, or whatever it may be called, was due to the presence of Sir Peter Lumsden's Mission on the Afghan Frontier with a large escort? [Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

MR. SPEAKER: That Question does not at all fairly grow out of the answer to the noble Lord.

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT: I rise to a point of Order. [Cries of "Oh, oh!" "Name!" and "Order!"] I have not quite finished the Question. I ask you, Sir, to recall the Question of the noble Lord. The noble Lord asked whether Sir Peter Lumsden's Mission had any connection with the unfortunate affair at Penjeh? The Prime Minister said "None;" and he therefore declined to produce Sir Peter Lumsden's despatches. I wish to ask upon this question what is the exact point of issue between Her Majesty's Government and the Russian Government? Is it not a fact that the Government of Russia have ventured to assert that the cause of the deplorable incident at Penjeh was the presence of Sir Peter Lumsden on the frontier with an armed escort? Ought we not, therefore, to have Sir Peter Lumsden's despatches, in order to be able to estimate the truth of this Russian allegation? Does that not arise out of the Question put by the noble Lord?

MR. SPEAKER: I do not see that it at all arises out of that Question.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I also wish to ask a Question on a point of Order. The Prime Minister has stated that the Vote of Credit would be put in one sum. I have given Notice of Motion for Monday next to the effect that the question of expenditure in the Soudan ought to be considered by the Committee separately from that of expenditure elsewhere. I wish to ask whether it will be competent for any hon. Member to move an Amendment on the Motion "That the Speaker do leave the Chair" for the Vote of Credit to be brought forward? Can I on that occasion make the Motion of which I have given Notice?

MR. SPEAKER: I should first require to see the Motion which the hon. Member wishes to move.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that his Motion was to the effect that it was expedient that the Vote of Credit in connection with the Soudan Expedition should be considered separately from the Vote of Credit for military expenditure elsewhere.

MR. SPEAKER: I shall be prepared to answer that Question when I am acquainted with the full circumstances of the case.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: May I ask the Prime Minister whether that part of the Vote of Credit in respect of the Soudan will be voted on Monday under the same conditions of reticence as the part relating to the special preparations in regard to the Afghan Frontier?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir. What I have stated in answer to the right hon. Gentleman undoubtedly had reference to the Vote for special preparations, and not to the Vote for the Soudan, which in many respects comes under very different conditions.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— WHITE SLAVES AT KHARTOUM.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the statements in The Daily News of the 22nd, made by one of General Gordon's Egyptian soldiers, and especially to the following passages:—

"There were several white women when I left, daughters of Europeans by Abyssinian wives. There were two or three ladies at the Austrian Consul's. Gordon always said, 'The English are coming;'

* * * * *

"All the white and all the black women are now made slaves. My poor wife, I shall never see her again. When I say white I mean also those whose mothers were Abyssinian and fathers European, and there were some Turkish ladies who wore the achmet, wives of officers; all will now be slaves;'" and, whether, before leaving the Soudan, he will directly authorise the General now in command at Dongola to try to ransom these unfortunate victims?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: My right hon. Friend has asked me to answer the Question of the hon. Gentleman. My attention has been called to the statement, and I have telegraphed to Lord Wolseley inquiring whether by reference to the soldier referred to or by any other means he can obtain any further information as to the statements quoted, and whether if there appears to be any foundation for them it would be in his opinion possible immediately to effect the release of these women either by ransom or otherwise.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—EXPLOSION AT THE ADMIRALTY.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I wish to ask the Secretary for the Home Department a Question of which I have given him private Notice—namely, Whether he can give the House any particulars as to the explosion which took place at the Admiralty this forenoon; and, also, whether he can state if there is any truth in the rumour that another explosion had taken place at a later period of the day?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: An explosion took place in one of the lower official rooms at the Admiralty at 11 o'clock this morning. It is too early yet to form a definite opinion on the subject; but it seems to be quite clear that the explosive, whatever it was, was placed inside the room. The quantity must have been small, as the structural damage to the room was very slight. It also appears that the explosive must have been placed on the top of some piece of furniture in the room against the wall. I regret to state that the Assistant Under Secretary of the Admiralty, Mr. Swainson, who was at work at a desk close to where the explosion took place, was seriously injured; but the most recent accounts—within the last half-hour—from the hospital give a favourable account of his progress. He has recovered consciousness, and I am informed has taken some natural sleep. I have heard nothing of any other explosion, and I believe it is not the fact.

RAILWAY REGULATION ACTS—PREFERENTIAL RATES.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether having reference to his recent statement that the subject of preferential Railway rates on Foreign goods was "ripe for legislation," he will be good enough to inform the House if he is prepared to introduce a Bill dealing with the subject; and, whether, in view of the urgency of the question, he will make an early statement on the matter, and place the House in possession of the principles of his proposed measure?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I will endeavour to give the hon. Member the explanation and further information as to the intentions of the Government for which he asks. In the first place, I have to say that we consider that the evidence taken by the Committee on Railway Rates and Fares in 1883 furnishes sufficient information as to the nature of the complaints which have been made of preferential rates both on foreign goods and also on home products. We are further of opinion that the Report of this Committee, and the Reports of previous Committees and Commissions on the subject, show conclusively that no general law of universal application can be laid down. The establishment, for instance, of equal mileage rates which has sometimes been proposed would be most injurious to trade since it would deprive freighters of any advantage from competition; it would also cause a revolution in the movement of traffic, and would involve the ruin of very large interests which have been created on the faith of existing arrangements. On the other hand, there is good reason to believe that under the present system preferences have been created which cannot be justified in law or equity. In the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, there is a clause dealing with undue preference, which appears to be sufficient for the purpose, and all that is necessary is that all cases of complaint should be dealt with as they arise by a competent tribunal. Such a tribunal the Government believe already exists in the Railway Commissioners; but further legislation is required in order to put this tribunal on a permanent basis, with somewhat extended powers, and at the same time to facilitate the resort to it by giving a locus standi to public bodies and associations which may be expected to seek a decision in all disputed cases of any importance, where, however, the interests of private traders and individuals may not be sufficient to induce them to undertake the burden of litigation. These views found expression in the Railway Regulation Acts Amendment Bill introduced by me last Session, but withdrawn owing to the pressure of Business. I am afraid that the present state of Public Business does not leave room for hope that the Bill could be re-introduced with any advantage in the present Session.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked whether he was right in understanding that the only legislation which the right hon. Gentleman proposed was the permanency of the Railway Commissioners, and to give a locus standi to certain bodies before it?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he thought his previous reply was very full. It was proposed to put the Railway Commission on a permanent basis, somewhat to extend its functions, and to give a locus standi to other bodies, so as to facilitate their access to its decisions?

MR. TOMLINSON asked whether, in the opinion of the President of the Board of Trade, the Railway Commissioners had jurisdiction now to entertain questions of undue preference as between foreign goods and English goods?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, Sir; that is my opinion.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. RITCHIE asked the President of the Local Government Board when he expected the Amendments of the Government to the Redistribution Bill to be distributed?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that some were ready and some were not, and as it was desirable to put them down together he proposed to put them all on the Paper to-morrow.

MR. LEWIS inquired when the Government proposed to take the Irish Registration Bill?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: To-morrow, Sir.

MR. PARNELL asked the President of the Local Government Board who was responsible for placing the Scotch Registration Bill second in that night's Paper, and the Irish Registration Bill 17th?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the Irish Registration Bill would be the first Order to-morrow. There was no intention to take it that night.

MR. PARNELL asked whether this Bill would be proceeded with throughout the Sitting to-morrow?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, Sir.

MR. HEALY suggested that one stage should be taken to-night, as the Bill was not blocked. They might get the Speaker out of the Chair, and then to-morrow proceed with the Amendments.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he had no objection.

MR. GIBSON said, he would like to know whether there was to be any definiteness in the proposals of the Government? They were just told that the Irish Bill would be taken to-morrow, and now they were told that it would be taken to-night. Was anything to be done to-night, or was there to be merely a pretence of doing something?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the original intention was to do nothing until to-morrow; but then came the suggestion of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) that they should get the Speaker out of the Chair to-night after the Scotch Bill, and proceed with the clauses to-morrow. The Government had no objection to that; but they were, of course, entirely in the hands of the House.

MR. GIBSON: If getting the Speaker out of the Chair is a mere benevolent sham to amuse people, and if it remains that the clauses of the Bill will be taken to-morrow, I do not care in the least what amusement goes on to-night.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £195,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, in aid of the Cost of Maintenance of Disturnpiked and Main Roads in England and Wales during the year ending on the 25th day of March 1886."

MR. WARTON asked what was the reason that Vote 4 of the Civil Service Estimates had been passed over?

MR. HIBBERT said, that Vote 4 had been postponed on account of the proceedings of the Committee, who were now sitting upon the restoration of Westminster Hall. That Committee had not yet reported.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had on two previous occasions opposed this Vote. Upon both occasions he had opposed it on principle, and he regretted to find that he should be compelled to vote against it now. It was a Vote in aid of local taxation in England, and the next Vote was a Vote of a similar nature to relieve the burden of local taxation in Scotland. As had been urged over and over again, if there was one portion of the United Kingdom which required that the burdens of local taxation should be lightened, it was not England, but Ireland. The people of this country could bear with comparative ease the pressure of local taxation; and even the debt of something like £159,000,000 incurred by the Local Authorities in this country, was of slight pressure upon the enormous valuation of the country, no practical inconvenience being occasioned by it. But in Ireland, with a valuation of only some £13,000,000, the existence of local taxation was very grievous indeed. The unfortunate people of Ireland, in addition to paying a cess which pressed most heavily upon them, were called upon to contribute towards the payment of local taxes both in England and Scotland; and notwithstanding that the general taxation of the country pressed so heavily upon them they got no relief of this description provided for them. But, even as it was, the Vote was not applied in the way which Parliament intended to appropriate it. It was intended to relieve those districts where certain turnpike roads had been disturnpiked, and where, in consequence, the pressure of local taxation at one time existed. But, as a matter of fact, it would be found that even in districts where no such taxation had been imposed locally, and where no rates had been issued from time out of mind, for turnpike purposes, the local rates had been supplemented by a portion of this Vote. In the year ending 31st March, 1884, an extraordinary Circular signed by the Home Secretary was issued with regard to the grant in aid of those turnpike roads, and it was to this effect—that certain counties, districts, and boroughs having last year been precluded from participating in the grant in consequence of their never having had turnpike roads, a Minute regulating the matter had been adopted, which brought such counties, districts, and boroughs under a new provision made by the Secretary of State with the approval of the Treasury, and presented to Parliament. That Minute provided that, subject to any modification to meet exceptional cases, the Government were to grant to counties, districts, and boroughs containing roads which had been disturnpiked since 1859, an allowance to the extent of one-fourth of the cost of materials and labour employed in the repair of such roads. The second paragraph in that Minute was the one to which he wished to draw more particular attention. It set forth that in such counties, districts, and boroughs in which there had never been turnpike roads—and in which, therefore, there could not be a disturnpiked road—a sum bearing the same proportion to the total cost of the maintenance of such roads should be granted as under head No. 1. The charge upon the Public Exchequer for the purpose of relieving the local taxation in this respect amounted to nearly £250,000 in England and Scotland, and a portion of that grant went to very extensive districts which never had turnpike roads, which, therefore, never had a road disturnpiked, and had consequently never experienced inconvenience in regard to local taxation in connection with the roads at all. An Estimate was made of the amount of extra taxation which had been thrown upon the local taxpayers in consequence of disturnpiking the roads, and upon that Estimate the original Vote was passed; but that Estimate did not take into consideration any county districts or boroughs in which there were no disturnpiked roads. Under this Minute of the Home Secretary, issued with the assent of the Treasury, a sum of money was voted in aid of local rates both in England and Scotland which, he maintained, was never intended by Parliament. He objected to the whole system under which the Treasury had been disbursing the money voted by Parliament, and he took the objection as a matter of principle. He said nothing of Scotland as distinguished from Ireland; but he found that the original Vote had been gradually extended by grants which had never been explained to Parliament, and which Parliament could never have expected.

at the time it was asked upon to vote this money in the year 1884, the amount granted for England for disturnpiked roads was £100,000, and the expenditure was only £95,000—which was to say, that the money voted in Committee of Supply and passed by the House was more than sufficient to meet the service. In spite of that fact, there was an increase in the Vote up to £215,000 last year—that was to say, that whereas the Treasury had been called upon to repay to the Exchequer a sum of £5,000 which was not wanted for the service, they came before the House in the following year, and asked not only for the same sum, but for £115,000 more than was deemed necessary in 1884. They were also asking this year for £215,000, which was proved could not really be required. He should object to this Vote as at present framed on that ground, if not on any other—namely, that it was perfectly clear that the whole of this money was not required. The ground of objection, however, which he preferred to take was a larger one—namely, that this was a Vote of a very considerable and substantial sum in relief of local taxation in England and Scotland, which relief was entirely withheld from Ireland, where the people were much more seriously pressed by local taxation than in this country. The question whether the grant should be continued in places where there were no turnpike roads of any kind, as was the case in Scotland, would perhaps be dealt with more properly when the Committee came to the next Vote. He did not propose to move the reduction of the Vote, because he objected to it altogether, and he would content himself with expressing his determination to divide against it.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he did not think the Vote should be allowed to pass without a protest from the Irish Members. They were constantly told that they were treated on equal terms and that they had equal laws with the United Kingdom; but when it came to question of whether Parliament should vote money for repairing and keeping up the roads in the three countries, it was most unfair that the people of Ireland should be obliged to contribute heavily to the maintenance of their own roads, and then, in addition, have to contribute something like £30,000 towards maintaining the roads in England and Scotland. The case of Scotland did not come under this Vote; but that the Irish people should be required to contribute to the maintenance of the English roads at all really appeared to be very hard upon so poor a country. England was a much richer country, and yet she received a grant in aid. They were frequently told that Ireland received benefit from her connection with England; but at present she contributed £8,000,000 in the shape of taxation to the Imperial Exchequer, and only got back about £3,000,000 in return. The present case formed a good illustration of the totally different system which was adopted in granting money to the English and Irish countries. If the Government would come forward they might be able to confer substantial benefit upon the country if, instead of keeping up the roads, they would construct railways in such districts as Connemara and the county of Kerry. Railways would be of advantage in opening up markets for the produce of the country; but hitherto it had been found that the existing roads afforded no substantial benefit, and the Irish people were not likely to expend large sums of money upon them. Certainly they got no benefit at all equivalent to the large sum of £250,000 voted for England and Scotland; and he did not see why the Irish Members should go on, year after year, voting that money, without making a very strong protest against it unless they were placed on a footing of equality. He might also point out how much worse off they were in Ireland in regard to the manner in which the roads were kept up. The sums necessary for maintaining them were voted by the Grand Juries, and paid by the cesspayers; but the Government took upon themselves the duty of appointing the County Surveyor. In this country that course was not followed; but in Ireland the Government took the patronage upon themselves. In England the patronage was enjoyed by the Local Authorities and by those who paid the rates. Therefore it would appear that in every way Ireland was placed in a most inferior position. Next week they would be asked to vote £1,000,000 for the construction of a railroad in the Soudan, as well as other railroads in Egypt; and they were asked, further, to keep up the roads of England and Scotland, while they had to pay for their own roads out of their own pockets, and yet the Government insisted on having the distribution of the money which was levied for that purpose. It was not merely in the case of the County Surveyor, but in that of other appointments in Ireland, that the distribution of local taxation paid for out of the county rates was also made by the Government. Then, again, money which was supposed to be primarily contributed for the maintenance of roads was collected by the Government and used by them for other works. Upon all of those grounds it seemed to him that a case was established to show that very unequal justice was meted out as between Ireland and the United Kingdom, and he thought the Government might hold out some promise that in the future a grant in aid similar to that which was allowed to England and Scotland should be given to Ireland.

MR. HIBBERT said, he did not rise to complain of the way in which either of the hon. Members who had brought forward this question had discussed it. At first sight it would seem that there was some justification for the complaint they had made; but he did not desire to go closely into the question whether Ireland had an advantage over England, or whether England had an advantage over Ireland, in the matter of taxation, and expenditure out of money raised by taxation, although he believed that if the question were inquired into it would be found that Ireland really had the best of it. [Colonel NOLAN: No.] This appeared, as regarded expenditure, from a Return moved for by the hon. and gallant Member himself. He could also refer to several taxes which were imposed in this country and not in Ireland—such as the House Tax, for instance, and various others. But, as he had stated, he did not wish to discuss the question upon that ground. He would prefer to see questions of this kind treated in a liberal and generous spirit. That had been the case in the past, and he hoped it would continue to be so in the future. This question of turnpike roads was not the only one in regard to the Vote, which was not to be considered of a permanent character. It was merely proposed as a temporary measure until the whole question of Local Government and Local Taxation could be dealt with. It was hoped that those questions would be dealt with early in the next Parliament, and then, he trusted, the question would be settled, and would be heard of no more either as it affected Ireland or England and Scotland. He thought Ireland had been very happy in not having possessed a similar system of turnpike roads to that which existed in this country.

COLONEL NOLAN remarked, that there were turnpike roads in Ireland.

MR. HIBBERT said, he had always understood that there were not.

COLONEL NOLAN said, the hon. Gentleman was altogether mistaken.

MR. HIBBERT said, that as to the question of the money to be given to Ireland for that purpose, he could only say that it was one which must await the consideration of the whole question of local taxation. In the first place, assuming that it was agreed to give money in aid of an Irish Vote, in the same way as it was now given to England and Scotland, who were the authorities they would have to pay? There were certainly no authorities in Ireland like those which existed in England and Scotland; and as the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) had pointed out, even the County Surveyor was appointed by the State. He should be very sorry if the matter stood in the same position in this country, and he hoped it would not long be left to the Local Authorities to maintain the turnpike roads in Ireland. As to the question whether money was to be given to Ireland, he could only repeat that that was a question which must be dealt with when the whole subject of Local Taxation and Local Government came to be considered in the next Parliament.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the answer of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was fair as far as it went; but he thought it ought to be observed, in reply to the complaint of Gentlemen representing Irish constituencies, that this Vote did not arise out of feelings of benevolence towards the payers of local rates, but was rather a recognition, on the part of the State, of an injustice inflicted upon the ratepayers through the lapse of Parliamentary authority to charge tolls in respect of roads which had been disturnpiked. That was a subject which could hardly be said to arise out of any benevolent inon the part of the State to contribute towards the local rates. But injury had arisen by the action of the Government itself, and this was a Vote in order to enable the Local Authorities to have that which had been previously borne over by those who used the roads. It was a state of things which did not exist in Ireland, and the grievance, therefore, which was one, in Ireland was not at all of a similar character. Consequently, the Government would not be justified in making the same arrangement for Ireland as that which was made for the United Kingdom.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, it was not necessary that he should enter into any question of disagreement or difference regarding the local taxation of England and Ireland. Hitherto the English Members had constantly discussed the necessity of introducing large reforms in the system of levying local taxation. The question of local taxation had not been allowed to remain almost entirely in the hands of the English Members, and had not been taken up by Members from Scotland or Ireland. There was nothing that would more rejoice the heart of a local taxation reformer than to find that he was obtaining new assistance in his endeavour to remove the burden of this taxation. If this question were to arise in the shape of a proposition to give a grant towards the maintenance of the Irish roads, he would be directly ready to consider that question on its merits. But in this particular case he was now asked to record a vote, "aye" or "no," in favour of a grant which was given towards the Irish roads. Although he had not the slightest objection to consider the question whether a similar Vote should be given to Ireland, he had a very strong objection to take away the grant proposed for England. It had been voted out by the right hon. Member for North Hampshire (Mr. Sclater-Booth) that in abolishing turnpike roads the additional burdens had been thrown on the ratepayers. Those burdens had been distinctly pointed out by his brave and gallant Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel Harcourt), who he all regretted not to have been able to see in his place for some time; but it was on the distinct recognition of the additional burden thrown on the ratepayers by the withdrawal of the sub-vention hitherto made upon the travelling public to keep up these roads, that the State had consented to make this grant in aid. Therefore, the money which the Committee were now asked to vote was not given entirely in that free and liberal spirit which hon. Gentlemen from Ireland seemed desirous of claiming; but, at any rate, it was given, according to a decision and a deliberate vote of the House, upon a principle which he and others had constantly advocated.

MR. SEXTON said, he failed to see any force in the argument of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sclater-Booth) as far as it was directed against the representation of his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor). The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that because tolls were formerly paid on the English roads by the travelling public, that there should be a subvention now by the House of Commons. The Irish Members were not contending now that the tolls ought to be paid by the travelling public on the high roads, or that the discontinuance of a tax of that kind afforded any claim for a subvention. He presumed that those who used the roads were those who lived in the locality, and it could not be said that it was on account of an incursion of foreigners from other localities that the tolls which had been paid hitherto out of local resources should not be still supplied from local resources. What his hon. Friend said was that there were formerly turnpike roads in Ireland, that those turnpike roads had been abolished, and no one had ever got up in that House to say that the Local Authorities, on whom the support of the roads was in consequence thrown, ought to be compensated. The main argument upon which he and his hon. Friends relied in opposing this taxation was that, no matter how the money had been formerly obtained, it was not fair that they should ask the people of Ireland, who paid for their own roads, to contribute £40,000 out of £215,000 to pay for the roads in England. That was what it came to. The Irish people contributed to the Imperial funds, and the House of Commons proposed to dip their hands into the Imperial purse and take out £215,000, towards which the Irish people, who paid every penny of the cost of supporting their own roads, contributed largely. That was a gross injustice, and no ingenuity could give it any other complexion. He had no objection to the tone of the speech of the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Vote. As a matter of fact, there was never anything to be said in condemnation of the tone of the hon. Gentleman; but the substance of the hon. Gentleman's speech was decidedly unsatisfactory. The hon. Gentleman bade them look forward with hope to the next Parliament. Well, he believed the next Parliament would do a great many things which this Parliament, notwithstanding its pretensions, had been unable to accomplish. But he objected always to be fed upon hope. It was not a substantial fare. The statement of the hon. Gentleman was coupled with another—that they must wait until a general measure of Local Taxation and Local Government could be passed. That was precisely the excuse Earl Spencer had been putting forward in Ireland for the last five years for neglecting to proceed with important measures. Earl Spencer told them that the Government were meditating some general scheme; but what it was had never yet left the mind of that noble Earl. The Irish Members had waited with hope—it had now diminished to a vanishing point—for the appearance of this great scheme, which they had so long been told was to bring them financial relief in Ireland. They were now told that they were to live in the hope of finding a higher moral capacity or better intentions in a new Parliament. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury took credit for his forbearance in not looking too closely into the question of taxation in the Three Kingdoms. He told the hon. Gentleman to enter into that question as closely as he liked, and the Irish Members were quite ready to follow him. If he wished it to be understood that Ireland was in any way receiving advantage, or even fair play, from the Imperial purse, in the shape of grants in aid of local burdens, he would tell the hon. Gentleman that that was not the case. It was altogether remote from the fact, and quite contrary to it. Let him compare the grants in aid of local taxation in England, Ireland, and Scotland; and what was the result? First of all, if any relief were made in any country, it should be the poor country, whose capacity was the least, that should receive it, and not the rich country. If the Imperial purse, which was contributed to by the Three Kingdoms, was to be dipped into for the benefit of either of the three, the recipient of the relief ought to be Ireland, and not England, which was the wealthiest country in the world. In the last decade the valuation of England for purposes of this kind had increased by 30 per cent—an increase unparalleled in the civilized world. In the same period, that for Ireland had increased by 4 per cent. Thus, in the same period, while the Return of incomes in Ireland remained almost stationary, the capacity to pay taxation in England had increased by leaps and bounds; and in the same decade in Ireland the number of persons in the receipt of relief had doubled. Large numbers had been compelled to give up the means of earning a living, and the population itself had very largely diminished. Therefore, it was plain that it would not only be unjust, but cruel, to add anything to the local burdens of Ireland. Grants in aid of local taxation from the Imperial purse in England amounted to £3,500,000; in Scotland to over £500,000; and in Ireland, although the sum was nominally much greater, if they took out the Irish Constabulary and the Dublin Police, which were just as much military forces as the Army and Navy, officered under the control of the Lord Lieutenant, and maintained altogether independent of the will of the people, and, in fact, contrary to it—taking out those sums, it would be found that Ireland received very little in aid of grants for local purposes; while Scotland, with a population only three-fourths of that of Ireland, received £500,000, and England £3,500,000. That proved that no fair play was given to Ireland, but that very great hardship was inflicted upon her in this matter. Who were the people who had paid for the maintenance of roads in Ireland? He did not blame the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury for being unacquainted with the details, because he had only lately come into his present Office; but he appeared to have founded something on the question of the Highway Authority. Now, in Ireland the Highway Authority was the Grand Jury, and the sum was levied in every county by means of county cess. Among the pur-

which county cess was given maintenance of the high roads. The hon. Gentleman had any benevolence towards Ireland in reference to those roads, he would place the charge upon the Imperial purse, no objection would be entertained on the other side of the House. The people paid taxes in Ireland—poor rate and county cess—were the poor occupied. He asked the hon. Gentleman to have in mind this extraordinary fact, whereas 20 years ago the rate only amounted to 10d. in the pound, they were now nearly 2s., having more than doubled. All those taxes fell upon the occupiers, and the burden was more than equal to the burden of the taxation 20 years ago. The rate did not pay 1d. of county cess, the whole of it fell upon the rating occupier, who was only in a degree removed from the condition of a pauper. The injustice of the taxation in Ireland was manifest. In the case of the valuation was increasing, the people were well-to-do, the taxes fell heavily upon them, and were hardly borne by the bulk of the community; but the poor persons only one degree above the condition of paupers contributed money for the maintenance of the roads. Notwithstanding that fact, they were required to pay £40,000 a-year from their narrow means in aid of the maintenance of roads in England and Ireland.

CLARE READ said, he was glad that the hon. Members from Ireland were becoming convinced of the pressure of taxation in that country, and he was glad to do anything he could to lighten the burden so far as Ireland was concerned. He would most heartily support any proposition that would give Ireland a share of the burden of maintaining the roads in Ireland. Casual visits to the country led him to the conclusion that the high roads there were superior to those they had in England. He did not see why a grant should not be given to the Irish Grand Jurors as well as to the Courts of Quarter Sessions or the Local Authorities in England. But, as a matter of fact, the fair comparison would be by the amount of Imperial taxation in Ireland or by England, there were one or two little matters in Ireland which the Irish people had an advantage over the ratepayers in England.

Take the Dog Tax; it was an Imperial tax in this country and a local tax in Ireland, and he should be glad to see some day or other that it was made a local tax for Great Britain as well as for Ireland. In the matter of turnpike tolls, he believed that, although they were unpopular, they were strictly just. Those who used the roads paid for them; and now the arrangement was that those who used the roads least paid the most. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) referred to the fact that England had increased very much in wealth. That was certainly not the case with regard to the occupiers of land. Their prosperity had not increased very much in the last few years; but, on the contrary, the owners and occupiers of land had considerably diminished in wealth and prosperity, although they paid almost the whole of the rates of the country. He maintained that any sort of contribution which the general wealth of the country could afford ought to be made towards the relief of local taxation, not only in Ireland, but throughout the United Kingdom.

MR. W. J. CORBET wished to correct a false impression which might be produced by the statement of the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) in reference to the Dog Tax. The tax amounted to something like £30,000 a-year in Ireland, but it was almost entirely absorbed in the payment of officials connected with the Office of the Registrar of Dublin Castle. A very small amount, indeed, went in aid of local taxation.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he thought he had heard the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. George Russell) cheer some of the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken below the Gangway (Mr. Clare Read). He took it that that cheer meant that in England there was good cause for the grant towards the maintenance of those roads. Now, what were the purposes for which many of the main roads were made in this country? They were made for the purpose of connecting the large towns—for instance, London with Edinburgh, London with Liverpool and Manchester, and even London with Holyhead—and many of the Irish roads were made for a ther information as to the statements quoted, and whether if there appears to be any foundation for them it would be in his opinion possible immediately to effect the release of these women either by ransom or otherwise.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—EXPLOSION AT THE ADMIRALTY.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I wish to ask the Secretary for the Home Department a Question of which I have given him private Notice—namely, Whether he can give the House any particulars as to the explosion which took place at the Admiralty this forenoon; and, also, whether he can state if there is any truth in the rumour that another explosion had taken place at a later period of the day?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: An explosion took place in one of the lower official rooms at the Admiralty at 11 o'clock this morning. It is too early yet to form a definite opinion on the subject; but it seems to be quite clear that the explosive, whatever it was, was placed inside the room. The quantity must have been small, as the structural damage to the room was very slight. It also appears that the explosive must have been placed on the top of some piece of furniture in the room against the wall. I regret to state that the Assistant Under Secretary of the Admiralty, Mr. Swainson, who was at work at a desk close to where the explosion took place, was seriously injured; but the most recent accounts—within the last half-hour—from the hospital give a favourable account of his progress. He has recovered consciousness, and I am informed has taken some natural sleep. I have heard nothing of any other explosion, and I believe it is not the fact.

PREFERENTIAL RATES.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, having reference to his recent statement, that the subject of preferential Railway rates on Foreign goods was "ripe for legislation," he will be good enough to inform the House if he is prepared to introduce a Bill dealing with the subject; and, whether, in view of the urgency of the question, he will make an early statement on the matter, and place the House in possession of the principles of his proposed measure?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I will endeavour to give the hon. Member the explanation and further information as to the intentions of the Government for which he asks. In the first place, I have to say that we consider that the evidence taken by the Committee on Railway Rates and Fares in 1883 furnishes sufficient information as to the nature of the complaints which have been made of preferential rates both on foreign goods and also on home products. We are further of opinion that the Report of this Committee, and the Reports of previous Committees and Commissions on the subject, show conclusively that no general law of universal application can be laid down. The establishment, for instance, of equal mileage rates which has sometimes been proposed would be most injurious to trade since it would deprive freighters of any advantage from competition; it would also cause a revolution in the movement of traffic, and would involve the ruin of very large interests which have been created on the faith of existing arrangements. On the other hand, there is good reason to believe that under the present system preferences have been created which cannot be justified in law or equity. In the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, there is a clause dealing with undue preference, which appears to be sufficient for the purpose, and all that is necessary is that all cases of complaint should be dealt with as they arise by a competent tribunal. Such a tribunal the Government believe already exists in the Railway Commissioners; but further legislation is required in order to put this tribunal on a permanent basis, with somewhat extended powers, and at the same time to facilitate the resort to it by giving a locus standi to public bodies and associations which may be expected to seek a decision in all disputed cases of any importance, where, however, the interests of private traders and individuals may not be sufficient to induce them to undertake the burden of litigation. These views found expression in the Railway Regulation Acts Amendment Bill introduced by me last Session, but withdrawn owing to the pressure of Business. I am afraid that the present state of Public Business does not leave room for hope that the Bill could be re-introduced with any advantage in the present Session.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked whether he was right in understanding that the only legislation which the right hon. Gentleman proposed was the permanency of the Railway Commissioners, and to give a locus standi to certain bodies before it?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he thought his previous reply was very full. It was proposed to put the Railway Commission on a permanent basis, somewhat to extend its functions, and to give a locus standi to other bodies, so as to facilitate their access to its decisions?

MR. TOMLINSON asked whether, in the opinion of the President of the Board of Trade, the Railway Commissioners had jurisdiction now to entertain questions of undue preference as between foreign goods and English goods?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, Sir; that is my opinion.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. RITCHIE asked the President of the Local Government Board when he expected the Amendments of the Government to the Redistribution Bill to be distributed?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that some were ready and some were not, and as it was desirable to put them down together he proposed to put them all on the Paper to-morrow.

MR. LEWIS inquired when the Government proposed to take the Irish Registration Bill?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: To-morrow, Sir.

MR. PARNELL asked the President of the Local Government Board who was responsible for placing the Scotch Registration Bill second in that night's Paper, and the Irish Registration Bill 17th?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the Irish Registration Bill would be the first Order to-morrow. There was no intention to take it that night.

MR. PARNELL asked whether this Bill would be proceeded with throughout the Sitting to-morrow?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, Sir.

MR. HEALY suggested that one stage should be taken to-night, as the Bill was not blocked. They might get the Speaker out of the Chair, and then to-morrow proceed with the Amendments.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he had no objection.

MR. GIBSON said, he would like to know whether there was to be any definiteness in the proposals of the Government? They were just told that the Irish Bill would be taken to-morrow, and now they were told that it would be taken to-night. Was anything to be done to-night, or was there to be merely a pretence of doing something?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the original intention was to do nothing until to-morrow; but then came the suggestion of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) that they should get the Speaker out of the Chair to-night after the Scotch Bill, and proceed with the clauses to-morrow. The Government had no objection to that; but they were, of course, entirely in the hands of the House.

MR. GIBSON: If getting the Speaker out of the Chair is a mere benevolent sham to amuse people, and if it remains that the clauses of the Bill will be taken to-morrow, I do not care in the least what amusement goes on to-night.

MR. WARTON asked what was the reason that Vote 4 of the Civil Service Estimates had been passed over?

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £195,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, in aid of the Cost of Maintenance of Disturnpiked and Main Roads in England and Wales during the year ending on the 25th day of March 1886."

MR. WARTON asked what was the reason that Vote 4 of the Civil Service Estimates had been passed over?

MR. HIBBERT said, that Vote 4 had been postponed on account of the proceedings of the Committee, who were

and Scotland, while they had to pay for their own roads out of their own pockets, and yet the Government insisted on having the distribution of the money which was levied for that purpose. It was not merely in the case of the County Surveyor, but in that of other appointments in Ireland, that the distribution of local taxation paid for out of the county rates was also made by the Government. Then, again, money which was supposed to be primarily contributed for the maintenance of roads was collected by the Government and used by them for other works. Upon all of those grounds it seemed to him that a case was established to show that very unequal justice was meted out as between Ireland and the United Kingdom, and he thought the Government might hold out some promise that in the future a grant in aid similar to that which was allowed to England and Scotland should be given to Ireland.

MR. HIBBERT said, he did not rise to complain of the way in which either of the hon. Members who had brought forward this question had discussed it. At first sight it would seem that there was some justification for the complaint they had made; but he did not desire to go closely into the question whether Ireland had an advantage over England, or whether England had an advantage over Ireland, in the matter of taxation, and expenditure out of money raised by taxation, although he believed that if the question were inquired into it would be found that Ireland really had the best of it. [Colonel NOLAN: No.] This appeared, as regarded expenditure, from a Return moved for by the hon. and gallant Member himself. He could also refer to several taxes which were imposed in this country and not in Ireland—such as the House Tax, for instance, and various others. But, as he had stated, he did not wish to discuss the question upon that ground. He would prefer to see questions of this kind treated in a liberal and generous spirit. That had been the case in the past, and he hoped it would continue to be so in the future. This question of turnpike roads was not the only one in regard to the Vote, which was not to be considered of a permanent character. It was merely proposed as a temporary measure until the whole question of Local Government and Local Taxation could be dealt with. It was hoped that those questions would be dealt with early in the next Parliament, and then, he trusted, the question would be settled, and would be heard of no more either as it affected Ireland or England and Scotland. He thought Ireland had been very happy in not having possessed a similar system of turnpike roads to that which existed in this country.

COLONEL NOLAN remarked, that there were turnpike roads in Ireland.

MR. HIBBERT said, he had always understood that there were not.

COLONEL NOLAN said, the hon. Gentleman was altogether mistaken.

MR. HIBBERT said, that as to the question of the money to be given to Ireland for that purpose, he could only say that it was one which must await the consideration of the whole question of local taxation. In the first place, assuming that it was agreed to give money in aid of an Irish Vote, in the same way as it was now given to England and Scotland, who were the authorities they would have to pay? There were certainly no authorities in Ireland like those which existed in England and Scotland; and as the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) had pointed out, even the County Surveyor was appointed by the State. He should be very sorry if the matter stood in the same position in this country, and he hoped it would not long be left to the Local Authorities to maintain the turnpike roads in Ireland. As to the question whether money was to be given to Ireland, he could only repeat that that was a question which must be dealt with when the whole subject of Local Taxation and Local Government came to be considered in the next Parliament.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the answer of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was fair as far as it went; but he thought it ought to be observed, in reply to the complaint of Gentlemen representing Irish constituencies, that this Vote did not arise out of feelings of benevolence towards the payers of local rates, but was rather a recognition, on the part of the State, of an injustice inflicted upon the ratepayers through the lapse of Parliamentary authority to charge tolls in respect of roads which had been disturnpiked. That was a subject which could hardly be said to arise out of any benevolent in-

At the time it was asked upon to vote this money in the year 1884, the amount granted for England for disturnpiked roads was £100,000, and the expenditure was only £95,000—which was to say, that the money voted in Committee of Supply and passed by the House was more than sufficient to meet the service. In spite of that fact, there was an increase in the Vote up to £215,000 last year—that was to say, that whereas the Treasury had been called upon to repay to the Exchequer a sum of £5,000 which was not wanted for the service, they came before the House in the following year, and asked not only for the same sum, but for £115,000 more than was deemed necessary in 1884. They were also asking this year for £215,000, which it was proved could not really be required. He should object to this Vote as at present framed on that ground, if not on any other—namely, that it was perfectly clear that the whole of this money was not required. The ground of objection, however, which he preferred to take was a larger one—namely, that this was a Vote of a very considerable and substantial sum in relief of local taxation in England and Scotland, which relief was entirely withheld from Ireland, where the people were much more seriously pressed by local taxation than in this country. The question whether the grant should be continued in places where there were no turnpike roads of any kind, as was the case in Scotland, would perhaps be dealt with more properly when the Committee came to the next Vote. He did not propose to move the reduction of the Vote, because he objected to it altogether, and he would content himself with expressing his determination to divide against it.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he did not think the Vote should be allowed to pass without a protest from the Irish Members. They were constantly told that they were treated on equal terms and that they had equal laws with the United Kingdom; but when it came to a question of whether Parliament should vote money for repairing and keeping up the roads in the three countries, it was most unfair that the people of Ireland should be obliged to contribute heavily to the maintenance of their own roads, and then, in addition, have to contribute something like £30,000 towards maintaining the roads in England and Scotland. The case of Scotland did not come under this Vote; but that the Irish people should be required to contribute to the maintenance of the English roads at all really appeared to be very hard upon so poor a country. England was a much richer country, and yet she received a grant in aid. They were frequently told that Ireland received benefit from her connection with England; but at present she contributed £8,000,000 in the shape of taxation to the Imperial Exchequer, and only got back about £3,000,000 in return. The present case formed a good illustration of the totally different system which was adopted in granting money to the English and Irish countries. If the Government would come forward they might be able to confer substantial benefit upon the country if, instead of keeping up the roads, they would construct railways in such districts as Connemara and the county of Kerry. Railways would be of advantage in opening up markets for the produce of the country; but hitherto it had been found that the existing roads afforded no substantial benefit, and the Irish people were not likely to expend large sums of money upon them. Certainly they got no benefit at all equivalent to the large sum of £250,000 voted for England and Scotland; and he did not see why the Irish Members should go on, year after year, voting that money, without making a very strong protest against it unless they were placed on a footing of equality. He might also point out how much worse off they were in Ireland in regard to the manner in which the roads were kept up. The sums necessary for maintaining them were voted by the Grand Juries, and paid by the cesspayers; but the Government took upon themselves the duty of appointing the County Surveyor. In this country that course was not followed; but in Ireland the Government took the patronage upon themselves. In England the patronage was enjoyed by the Local Authorities and by those who paid the rates. Therefore it would appear that in every way Ireland was placed in a most inferior position. Next week they would be asked to vote £1,000,000 for the construction of a railroad in the Soudan, as well as other railroads in Egypt; and they were asked, further, to keep up the roads of England and Scotland, while they had to pay for their own roads out of their own pockets, and yet the Government insisted on having the distribution of the money which was levied for that purpose. It was not merely in the case of the County Surveyor, but in that of other appointments in Ireland, that the distribution of local taxation paid for out of the county rates was also made by the Government. Then, again, money which was supposed to be primarily contributed for the maintenance of roads was collected by the Government and used by them for other works. Upon all of those grounds it seemed to him that a case was established to show that very unequal justice was meted out as between Ireland and the United Kingdom, and he thought the Government might hold out some promise that in the future a grant in aid similar to that which was allowed to England and Scotland should be given to Ireland.

MR. HIBBERT said, he did not rise to complain of the way in which either of the hon. Members who had brought forward this question had discussed it. At first sight it would seem that there was some justification for the complaint they had made; but he did not desire to go closely into the question whether Ireland had an advantage over England, or whether England had an advantage over Ireland, in the matter of taxation, and expenditure out of money raised by taxation, although he believed that if the question were inquired into it would be found that Ireland really had the best of it. [Colonel NOLAN: No.] This appeared, as regarded expenditure, from a Return moved for by the hon. and gallant Member himself. He could also refer to several taxes which were imposed in this country and not in Ireland—such as the House Tax, for instance, and various others. But, as he had stated, he did not wish to discuss the question upon that ground. He would prefer to see questions of this kind treated in a liberal and generous spirit. That had been the case in the past, and he hoped it would continue to be so in the future. This question of turnpike roads was not the only one in regard to the Vote, which was not to be considered of a permanent character. It was merely proposed as a temporary measure until the whole question of Local Government and Local Taxation could be dealt with. It was hoped that those questions would be dealt with early in the next Parliament, and then, he trusted, the question would be settled, and would be heard of no more either as it affected Ireland or England and Scotland. He thought Ireland had been very happy in not having possessed a similar system of turnpike roads to that which existed in this country.

COLONEL NOLAN remarked, that there were turnpike roads in Ireland.

MR. HIBBERT said, he had always understood that there were not.

COLONEL NOLAN said, the hon. Gentleman was altogether mistaken.

MR. HIBBERT said, that as to the question of the money to be given to Ireland for that purpose, he could only say that it was one which must await the consideration of the whole question of local taxation. In the first place, assuming that it was agreed to give money in aid of an Irish Vote, in the same way as it was now given to England and Scotland, who were the authorities they would have to pay? There were certainly no authorities in Ireland like those which existed in England and Scotland; and as the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) had pointed out, even the County Surveyor was appointed by the State. He should be very sorry if the matter stood in the same position in this country, and he hoped it would not long be left to the Local Authorities to maintain the turnpike roads in Ireland. As to the question whether money was to be given to Ireland, he could only repeat that that was a question which must be dealt with when the whole subject of Local Taxation and Local Government came to be considered in the next Parliament.

MR. SCLATER-BOTH said, the answer of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was fair as far as it went; but he thought it ought to be observed, in reply to the complaint of Gentlemen representing Irish constituencies, that this Vote did not arise out of feelings of benevolence towards the payers of local rates, but was rather a recognition, on the part of the State, of an injustice inflicted upon the ratepayers through the lapse of Parliamentary authority to charge tolls in respect of roads which had been disturbed. That was a subject which could hardly be said to arise out of any benevolent intention on the part of the State to contribute towards the local rates. But the injury had arisen by the action of Parliament itself, and this was a Vote in aid to enable the Local Authorities to provide that which had been previously paid over by those who used the roads. That was a state of things which did not exist in Ireland, and the grievance, if there were one, in Ireland was not at all of a similar character. Consequently, Parliament would not be justified in making the same arrangement for Ireland as that which was made for the United Kingdom.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, it was not necessary that he should enter into any question of disagreement or difference in regard to the local taxation of England and Ireland. Hitherto the English Members had constantly discussed the necessity of introducing large reforms in the system of levying local taxation. But the question of local taxation had been allowed to remain almost entirely in the hands of the English Members, and had not been taken up by Members either from Scotland or Ireland. There was nothing that would more rejoice the heart of a local taxation reformer than to find that he was obtaining new allies in his endeavour to remove the injustice of this taxation. If this question were to arise in the shape of a proposal to give a grant towards the maintenance of the Irish roads, he would be perfectly ready to consider that question on its merits. But in this particular case he was now asked to record his vote, "aye" or "no," in favour of the grant which was given towards the English roads. Although he had not the slightest objection to consider the question whether a similar Vote should be given to Ireland, he had a very strong objection to take away the grant now proposed for England. It had been pointed out by the right hon. Member for North Hampshire (Mr. Sclater-Booth) that in abolishing turnpike roads additional burdens had been thrown upon the ratepayers. Those burdens had been distinctly pointed out by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel Harcourt), who they all regretted not to have been able to see in his place for some time; but it was on the distinct recognition of the additional burden thrown on the ratepayers by the withdrawal of the sub-vention hitherto made upon the travelling public to keep up these roads, that the State had consented to make this grant in aid. Therefore, the money the Committee were now asked to vote was not given entirely in that free and liberal spirit which hon. Gentlemen from Ireland seemed desirous of claiming; but, at any rate, it was given, according to a decision and a deliberate vote of the House, upon a principle which he and others had constantly advocated.

MR. SEXTON said, he failed to see any force in the argument of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sclater-Booth) as far as it was directed against the representation of his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor). The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that because tolls were formerly paid on the English roads by the travelling public, that there should be a subvention now by the House of Commons. The Irish Members were not contending now that the tolls ought to be paid by the travelling public on the high roads, or that the discontinuance of a tax of that kind afforded any claim for a subvention. He presumed that those who used the roads were those who lived in the locality, and it could not be said that it was on account of an incursion of foreigners from other localities that the tolls which had been paid hitherto out of local resources should not be still supplied from local resources. What his hon. Friend said was that there were formerly turnpike roads in Ireland, that those turnpike roads had been abolished, and no one had ever got up in that House to say that the Local Authorities, on whom the support of the roads was in consequence thrown, ought to be compensated. The main argument upon which he and his hon. Friends relied in opposing this taxation was that, no matter how the money had been formerly obtained, it was not fair that they should ask the people of Ireland, who paid for their own roads, to contribute £40,000 out of £215,000 to pay for the roads in England. That was what it came to. The Irish people contributed to the Imperial funds, and the House of Commons proposed to dip their hands into the Imperial purse and take out £215,000, towards which the Irish people, who paid every penny of the cost of supporting their own roads, contributed largely. That was a gross injustice, and no ingenuity could give it any other complexion. He had no objection to the tone of the speech of the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Vote. As a matter of fact, there was never anything to be said in condemnation of the tone of the hon. Gentleman; but the substance of the hon. Gentleman's speech was decidedly unsatisfactory. The hon. Gentleman bade them look forward with hope to the next Parliament. Well, he believed the next Parliament would do a great many things which this Parliament, notwithstanding its pretensions, had been unable to accomplish. But he objected always to be fed upon hope. It was not a substantial fare. The statement of the hon. Gentleman was coupled with another—that they must wait until a general measure of Local Taxation and Local Government could be passed. That was precisely the excuse Earl Spencer had been putting forward in Ireland for the last five years for neglecting to proceed with important measures. Earl Spencer told them that the Government were meditating some general scheme; but what it was had never yet left the mind of that noble Earl. The Irish Members had waited with hope—it had now diminished to a vanishing point—for the appearance of this great scheme, which they had so long been told was to bring them financial relief in Ireland. They were now told that they were to live in the hope of finding a higher moral capacity or better intentions in a new Parliament. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury took credit for his forbearance in not looking too closely into the question of taxation in the Three Kingdoms. He told the hon. Gentleman to enter into that question as closely as he liked, and the Irish Members were quite ready to follow him. If he wished it to be understood that Ireland was in any way receiving advantage, or even fair play, from the Imperial purse, in the shape of grants in aid of local burdens, he would tell the hon. Gentleman that that was not the case. It was altogether remote from the fact, and quite contrary to it. Let him compare the grants in aid of local taxation in England, Ireland, and Scotland; and what was the result? First of all, if any relief were made in any country, it should be the poor country, whose capacity was the least, that should receive it, and not the rich country. If the Imperial purse, which was contributed to by the Three Kingdoms, was to be dipped into for the benefit of either of the three, the recipient of the relief ought to be Ireland, and not England, which was the wealthiest country in the world. In the last decade the valuation of England for purposes of this kind had increased by 30 per cent—an increase unparalleled in the civilized world. In the same period, that for Ireland had increased by 4 per cent. Thus, in the same period, while the Return of incomes in Ireland remained almost stationary, the capacity to pay taxation in England had increased by leaps and bounds; and in the same decade in Ireland the number of persons in the receipt of relief had doubled. Large numbers had been compelled to give up the means of earning a living, and the population itself had very largely diminished. Therefore, it was plain that it would not only be unjust, but cruel, to add anything to the local burdens of Ireland. Grants in aid of local taxation from the Imperial purse in England amounted to £3,500,000; in Scotland to over £500,000; and in Ireland, although the sum was nominally much greater, if they took out the Irish Constabulary and the Dublin Police, which were just as much military forces as the Army and Navy, officered under the control of the Lord Lieutenant, and maintained altogether independent of the will of the people, and, in fact, contrary to it—taking out those sums, it would be found that Ireland received very little in aid of grants for local purposes; while Scotland, with a population only three-fourths of that of Ireland, received £500,000, and England £3,500,000. That proved that no fair play was given to Ireland, but that very great hardship was inflicted upon her in this matter. Who were the people who had paid for the maintenance of roads in Ireland? He did not blame the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury for being unacquainted with the details, because he had only lately come into his present Office; but he appeared to have founded something on the question of the Highway Authority. Now, in Ireland the Highway Authority was the Grand Jury, and the sum was levied in every county by means of county cess. Among the par-

poses for which county cess was given was the maintenance of the high roads. If the hon. Gentleman had any benevolent intentions towards Ireland in reference to those roads, he would place the charge upon the Imperial purse, and no objection would be entertained on that side of the House. The people who paid taxes in Ireland—poor rate and county cess—were the poor occupiers; and he asked the hon. Gentleman to bear in mind this extraordinary fact—that, whereas 20 years ago the rates only amounted to 10*d.* in the pound, they were now nearly 2*s.*, having been more than doubled. All those taxes fell upon the occupiers, and the increase was more than equal to the whole of the taxation 20 years ago. The landlord did not pay 1*d.* of county cess, but the whole of it fell upon the struggling occupier, who was only in one degree removed from the condition of a pauper. The injustice of the tax in the case of Ireland was manifest. In England the valuation was increasing, the people were well-to-do, the taxes fell lightly upon them, and were hardly felt by the bulk of the community; but in Ireland persons only one degree above the condition of paupers contributed every penny for the maintenance of the high roads. Notwithstanding that fact, they were required to pay £40,000 a-year out of their narrow means in aid of the maintenance of roads in England and Scotland.

MR. CLARE READ said, he was glad to find that hon. Members from Ireland were becoming convinced of the pressure of local taxation in that country, and he would be glad to do anything he could to alleviate the burden so far as Ireland was concerned. He would most heartily support any proposition that would give relief from the burden of maintaining arterial roads in Ireland. Casual visits to that country led him to the conclusion that the high roads there were much superior to those they had in England. He did not see why a grant should not be given to the Irish Grand Juries, as well as to the Courts of Quarter Sessions or the Local Authorities in England. But, as a matter of fact, whatever might be the comparison between the amount of Imperial taxation paid by Ireland or by England, there were one or two little matters in Ireland in which the Irish people had an advantage over the ratepayers in England. Take the Dog Tax; it was an Imperial tax in this country and a local tax in Ireland, and he should be glad to see some day or other that it was made a local tax for Great Britain as well as for Ireland. In the matter of turnpike tolls, he believed that, although they were unpopular, they were strictly just. Those who used the roads paid for them; and now the arrangement was that those who used the roads least paid the most. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) referred to the fact that England had increased very much in wealth. That was certainly not the case with regard to the occupiers of land. Their prosperity had not increased very much in the last few years; but, on the contrary, the owners and occupiers of land had considerably diminished in wealth and prosperity, although they paid almost the whole of the rates of the country. He maintained that any sort of contribution which the general wealth of the country could afford ought to be made towards the relief of local taxation, not only in Ireland, but throughout the United Kingdom.

MR. W. J. CORBET wished to correct a false impression which might be produced by the statement of the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) in reference to the Dog Tax. The tax amounted to something like £30,000 a-year in Ireland, but it was almost entirely absorbed in the payment of officials connected with the Office of the Registrar of Dublin Castle. A very small amount, indeed, went in aid of local taxation.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he thought he had heard the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. George Russell) cheer some of the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken below the Gangway (Mr. Clare Read). He took it that that cheer meant that in England there was good cause for the grant towards the maintenance of those roads. Now, what were the purposes for which many of the main roads were made in this country? They were made for the purpose of connecting the large towns—for instance, London with Edinburgh, London with Liverpool and Manchester, and even London with Holyhead—and many of the Irish roads were made for a similar purpose; and he could not see why the ratepayers in Ireland should not receive the same grant in respect of the main roads of that country as was allowed to the ratepayers of this country. He had always felt and believed that the turnpikes should be maintained, and that the cost of maintaining the roads should be paid by those who made use of them; and it was well known that many of the main roads were of comparatively little use to the local inhabitants. It was not they who travelled by them, but the general public who made use of them; but, notwithstanding that fact, the farmers and residents of the poorer localities had to pay for them. He should like to hear one word from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board to intimate that the Government would recognize, in this case, the claim of the Irish people to some relief.

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, the hon. and gallant Baronet was very insidious in the advances he had made. He (Mr. Russell) had greeted with a cheer certain sentiments which fell from hon. Members from Ireland, simply intending to indicate that they received his sympathy. It was not, of course, for him to lay down any general rule as to the taxation to be applied to the different parts of the United Kingdom; but granting that the principle of subventions from the Imperial Treasury, in relief of local taxation, was a sound one, it was very difficult to deny that Ireland had an equal right to such subventions with England and Scotland.

MR. BIGGAR said, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had said that he did not know how the money raised for the maintenance of roads in Ireland was disposed of. Now, the Grand Juries in Ireland were the persons who were responsible for keeping the roads in repair, and, of course, they were the persons who determined what the contribution of the locality should be. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman did not know that there were two areas of taxation upon which the Grand Juries imposed the rate in connection with roads. One was a charge on the county at large. In charging the county at large the amount went in relief of the local rates for the maintenance of the main roads of the country—for instance, the mail coach roads. But in places where no turnpike roads existed the charge was thrown upon the local baronies, and they were purely local rates in which the area for which the rate was required was specified. Originally, the cost of those roads was borne by the county in which the roads existed. In the county of Antrim, with which he was well acquainted, there was a main road from Belfast to Coleraine, and thence on to Londonderry, and there were three or four turnpikes on that road. It was a road of an arterial nature, and had to be kept in repair by the Grand Juries. There was another mail coach road in the county of Antrim, between Belfast and Dublin, upon which several tolls were levied; and there were tolls also upon the road from Belfast to Carrickfergus. There were no charges for tolls on those roads for Government purposes, or upon persons who made use of them for the purpose of going to church on Sunday. In those respects the roads were free. But tolls were very strictly levied in regard to any other use of the roads. Those tolls had now been entirely abolished; but the main roads were still required to be kept up at the expense of the ratepayers, and he considered the principle to be most unjust, because in many counties—take, for instance, the county of Down—the old main roads were very much better and wider than were required for purely local traffic, but, nevertheless, they were still kept up at the expense of the local ratepayers. He quite agreed with the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Water B. Barttelot), that the maintenance of the main and leading roads should be provided for by Parliament. In the case of purely local roads they could hardly expect a grant in aid from Parliament; but in regard to the main roads, they were certainly entitled to a contribution towards the expense of maintenance. In the county of Waterford, the road between Waterford and Cork was a leading road, which certainly ought to be supported by a public grant, seeing that it was never used at all for the convenience of the locality, but merely for the through traffic. As these grants were given to England and Scotland, he failed to see why the Government should not hold out to the Irish Members the expectation that, if not immediately, they would, in the future, give a vote of this sort to Ireland. He believed the amount contributed by Ireland to the two countries which formed the United Kingdom, amounted to £60,000 a-year, and he thought something ought to be done to put Ireland on a footing of equality with England and Scotland, even if it became necessary to propose a Supplementary Vote in the present year. It was as clear as noonday that Ireland was treated unfairly, and that the Government had full power, if they chose to exercise it, of doing justice.

Sir Walter B. Barttelot

Mr. DEASY supported the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), that the Government should bring in a Supplementary Estimate. If they did not wish to do that, they might make a subvention of £40,000 towards the maintenance of the Irish roads. He did not think that anything more unjust towards the Irish people could be imagined than the principle upon which the Three Kingdoms were dealt with in this matter. What the Irish people had to do with the roads in England was more than he could see, nor could he understand why they should be asked to pay £40,000 a-year for the relief of the English taxpayers. Certain roads in the neighbourhood of Cork were made for the convenience of the barracks, and they were mainly, at the present moment, used by the military. They included one of the most expensive roads perhaps in Ireland, and yet the people of the county of Cork were not aided to the extent of a single 1d. from the Imperial funds towards the maintenance of that road. The Government had passed a Land Act which had had the effect of reducing rents in Ireland; but the unfortunate people in whose favour the rents had been reduced had still to contribute their full share towards county cess, whereas the very rich population of England received a contribution from the Imperial Exchequer towards the maintenance of the highways of the country. He thought that was a most outrageous injustice, and he trusted that his hon. Friends would, on every possible occasion, strongly protest against it. It was all very well for hon. Gentlemen opposite to express sympathy with the views which had been uttered by the Irish Members; but he failed to see of what value that sympathy was if nothing resulted from it. They were quite accustomed to see

hon. Members rise and admit that the Irish claims were just and reasonable; but his complaint was that no notice was taken of those claims when these Votes came on in Committee of Supply. He did not believe, in spite of the observations of hon. Gentleman opposite, that the Government, unless they were compelled to do so, would be disposed to give £40,000 in aid of the Irish roads, instead of compelling the Irish people to contribute that sum, as they did at present, towards the maintenance of the English and Scotch roads. During the last 10 years the number of paupers in Ireland had increased from 280,000 to 590,000, while during the same time the amount of pauperism in England had decreased. That fact alone ought to induce the Government to take time to consider before they called upon such a poor country as Ireland to contribute towards the maintenance of roads, or anything else, in such a rich country as England. £215,000 was now asked for as a contribution for keeping up the English roads, while not a single 1s. was proposed to be given to Ireland. Not only was that the case, but many of the roads which were kept up in that country were not necessary at all for the purposes of developing the resources of the country, having been made principally at the public expense for the convenience of the landlords. If that were not the case in Ireland, the county cess would be very much lower than it was. In some places it amounted to from 3s. to 4s. in the pound, and the poor rate was also very high. Ten years ago the poor rate in the Cork Union was 1s. 6d. in the pound, and now it amounted to 3s. 6d. or 4s. He believed there were very few places in England where the poor rate was as high as that; and even if it were higher than in Ireland, the people of England were able to pay it, while those of Ireland were not. He could entirely confirm the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Wicklow (Mr. Corbet) in reference to the Dog Tax. The total sum realized in Ireland from the Dog Tax amounted to £32,000, while the cost of collecting it amounted to £28,000; so that out of £32,000 the only sum contributed towards the relief of taxation was £4,000, and the unfortunate people who had to pay county cess were compelled to pay for sheep and other dogs on which no tax was levied in England. He trusted that the Government, even now, would see the justice of bringing in a Supplementary Estimate in order to give a grant in aid to Ireland.

MR. P. J. POWER said, the only desire of his hon. Friends in this matter was to place the people of Ireland upon a par with the people of England and Scotland. He asked the Committee to bear in mind that in Ireland, owing to the scarcity of railways in many districts, the roads were still very much used for the conveyance of Her Majesty's mails. To his mind, that was another reason why the Treasury should contribute towards the maintenance of the Irish roads. Certainly that was the case in the county he had the honour to represent (Waterford). A considerable number of mails were conveyed daily by four-horse cars along the main roads; and his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had alluded to some of the routes upon which, within his own knowledge, mail coaches now ran. It could not be denied that the people of Ireland contributed their fair proportion towards the Imperial taxation. In fact, if the figures were properly gone into, it would be found that they paid more than their fair proportion. Another reason why the Government should make this grant, and place the Irish people on a par with those of England and Scotland, was this—that, owing to the Government not keeping their promises, the Grand Jury system still continued in Ireland. Her Majesty's Ministers had made repeated promises to deal with that subject; but they had never yet seen fit to keep them, but had directed attention to other and far less important questions. So far as Ireland was concerned, that was one of the most vital questions that could be brought on for consideration. The county he represented paid, at that moment, a tax of £14,000 a-year to the shareholders of a Railway Company; and it was contended that if the Grand Jury system were reformed, and the counties governed on some representative system, a considerable portion of that local taxation would be got rid of. He hoped the Government would accede to the demand which had been made by his hon. Friends, which, to every fair-minded man, must appear to be of a most reasonable character.

Mr. Drury

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he would be very sorry not to take part in any measure of justice to Ireland; but hon. Members seemed to have forgotten that in Ireland there was no Carriage Tax.

AN hon. MEMBER: There are no carriages, except those belonging to the landlords, on which it could be levied.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, hon. Members opposite had enumerated the advantages enjoyed by the two countries; but that was putting the question upon a false issue. As far as he remembered, the Vote now under the consideration of the Committee was founded upon an arrangement made by the Prime Minister in consequence of what occurred on the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel Harcourt) in reference to the Carriage Tax. That Vote was given to England, and subsequently to Scotland, and he supposed it was not given to Ireland owing to the fact that there was no Carriage Tax in that country. He was quite of opinion that Ireland had a claim for consideration in the matter; but he hoped that the grants from Imperial Taxation in aid of local taxation would not be increased, and that the time was not far distant when this Vote would disappear altogether from the Estimates. He should support the Vote, although he admitted that a Vote for England and Scotland, and none for Ireland, presented a somewhat anomalous appearance.

MR. SEXTON said, he could not admit that there was any connection between the argument of the hon. Gentleman opposite and the claim put forward by the Irish Members. The hon. Gentleman had cited the case of the Carriage Tax; but the people of Ireland who had carriages were not the people who maintained the roads. Those who kept their carriages in Ireland were not numerous compared with those in England; but whoever they were, they did not pay 1d. for keeping up the roads. It was the occupier, and not the landlord, who paid for them. He was glad to see the Prime Minister present, because it was desirable that his attention should be called to the fact that every 1d. of county cess in Ireland was paid by the occupier, and not by the landlord; and, therefore, there was no connection between the Carriage Tax and the demand made by the Irish Members in reference to the support of the roads. If the Prime Minister would allow him, in a few words he would convey to the right hon. Gentleman's mind the merits of the case. The Committee were now asked to grant £215,000 to England, and, in the next Vote, £35,000 to Scotland, as grants in aid of local taxation in connection with the maintenance of roads; and in the case of Scotland it was paid, although there had been no roads disturnpiked at all. In Ireland they were called upon to contribute 40 or 50 per cent towards this subvention in aid of the local roads in England and Scotland, whereas in Ireland itself every 1*d.* of the same expenditure for keeping up the roads came out of the pockets of the occupiers of land, who were the poorest class of people. That state of things occurred when, as the right hon. Gentleman well knew, the capacity of England to bear taxation had been increased by 30 per cent during the last 10 years; whereas, on the contrary, the capacity of Ireland had diminished, and pauperism, instead of prosperity, was increasing. Every circumstance pointed to the equity and justice of some relief being given to Ireland, instead of that country being asked to contribute towards a subvention for England and Scotland. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman would see that the existing system was not one that ought to be continued; and it would give great satisfaction to the Irish Members if he would say a word in the same spirit as the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, or hold out any hope that the matter would be considered between this year and next, with the object of placing the taxation of the Three Kingdoms upon a more equitable basis.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that when Parliament—not the present Parliament, but the new Parliament—came, at the very earliest period, as he thought it ought to come, and must come, to a comprehensive consideration of the question of Local and Imperial Taxation, and the relations of Local and Imperial Taxation in the Three Kingdoms, undoubtedly this would be a point which would have to be put down more or less to the credit of Ireland on her side of the account. That was the admission he was prepared to make; but the question evidently formed part of a large subject to which a comprehensive consideration would have to be given. More than that he could not undertake to say. He stated that, because he thought that justice required it; and no doubt, when Parliament came to consider the whole matter, a fair and equitable view would be taken by those who represented the Three Kingdoms.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the observations of the Prime Minister were just and equitable; but the right hon. Gentleman talked of a prospective amelioration of the present position, whereas, unfortunately, the grievance was a present one, and the Irish ratepayers who were taxed now and had to pay their own cess were also called upon to contribute to a Vote in aid of the English ratepayers, with no immediate prospect of an improvement in their local administration or of their financial arrangements. No change hereafter in local administration or in local financial arrangements would give relief to those who would be necessarily taxed now if this Vote were passed in favour of the English and Scotch ratepayers. The hon. Member the Secretary to the Treasury was evidently unacquainted with the exceedingly unfair incidence of local taxation in respect of roads in Ireland. He might inform the hon. Gentleman that the highway rate in this country only formed one-twentieth part of the local revenue, and represented a little more than £1,000,000 out of a revenue of £20,000,000, whereas in Ireland, out of a revenue of £3,300,000 raised for local purposes, no less than £333,000 was paid for the maintenance of roads. Therefore, while in Ireland one-tenth of the local revenue went towards the maintenance of roads, in England the amount was only one-twentieth. Therefore, the pressure upon the Irish people was double as heavy as in England, and yet, while in England a substantial relief was afforded, in Ireland no relief at all was given. He was grateful to the Prime Minister for the equitable language he had used; but it did not remove the fundamental objection he took to a proposal of this kind. Therefore, unless he obtained from the Government some undertaking that they would make a similar contribution for the maintenance of turnpike or disturnpiked roads in Ireland as that which was made for England and Scotland, or, at any rate, that they would give to Ireland something in aid of local taxation more than they did now to enable the people to pay the local taxes, he should feel it necessary to take a division against the Vote. There were many ways in which the Government might make up to Ireland for what she had sacrificed in this particular instance. There were many things in that country which rightly called for some Government action, and some of the Votes which had hitherto been taken for Ireland were now at an end. For instance, there was the Vote for the Shannon improvements, and if the Government would continue the £10,000 or £20,000 spent heretofore on the Shannon for similar works in other parts of Ireland, where drainage was badly required, Ireland would not feel the injustice of this Vote so much. But unless they were promised the advantage of a Government subvention on something like the same terms as England and Scotland, they must show their objection to the present Vote in the only way that was open to them.

MR. HICKS said, he had listened to the debate with considerable attention, and it appeared to him that a great deal of irrelevant matter had been introduced into it which was not altogether consistent with the real facts of the case. The question before the Committee was whether Ireland was entitled to relief from local taxation or not. That was a grave question, and he was certainly of opinion that she was entitled to it. He thought it a great pity that the question had been mixed up with the Carriage Tax and the Dog Tax, and other extraneous matters. Nor would it alter the question whether there had been an increase of assessment in England or not. But with regard to there having been an increase of assessment, if that subject were inquired into in the rural districts of England, he believed it would be found that the assessment had been materially reduced. The rents had been reduced, and, sooner or later, a reduction of assessment was bound to follow. Then, as to the statement of his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) as to the proportion of the burden of maintaining the roads which fell upon England and upon Ireland, he understood the hon. Member to say that in one case it amounted to one-tenth, and in the other to one-twentieth. He thought the hon. Member was mistaken, and he did not know that that was the case anywhere.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had referred to the highway rates.

MR. HICKS said, that it was a very great mistake to suppose that the proportion amounted to one-twentieth part. In talking of English local taxation people very often mixed up a number of things with the actual local taxation that had nothing whatever to do with it. For instance, they included water rates and gas rates—things that had nothing to do with the poor rate and nothing to do with the highway rate. If they took the highway rate and that which really constituted the local revenues—the poor rate—and the things which were properly included in them, it would be found that, instead of one-twentieth, the proportion of highway rates to poor rates was nearly one fourth—at any rate, in the rural districts. In his own district the poor rate was 2s. 6d. in the pound, and the highway rate would be 8d. But those points, he thought, were entirely outside the discussion on this Vote, the question raised being as to why, if relief were to be afforded in the matter of roads in England and Scotland, it should not also be afforded in the case of Ireland, and be considered it should.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, that Members from Ireland would be grateful to the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down for placing the question in a proper light. Certainly, no argument had been adduced to prove that this allowance should not be made; and he could not but think that the argument drawn from the poor rate was somewhat beside the question, which was as to whether they in Ireland were not entitled to the same relief in respect of the maintenance of roads as was given in the case of the roads in England and Scotland. He quite agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor), who raised this question. He thought that every county should have its share of the money, and he hoped that the intimation of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would be carried out, and that next year a Vote equal in amount to that of the Vote now before the Committee would be put into the Estimates for the maintenance of the roads in Ireland.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

The Committee divided:—Ayes 144; Noes 23: Majority 121.—(Div. List, No. 124.)

MR. SEXTON said, he had already recorded his opinion that while England received the entire advantage in comparison with Ireland in the matter of these subventions, Scotland was the spoilt child of the Estimates. He had pointed out that the amount of the grants in aid of local taxation in Ireland was only about £500,000 a-year; whereas in the case of Scotland, with a much smaller population, it amounted to £525,000. Then there was another singular fact admitted in connection with this matter—namely, that some of the counties of Scotland relieved by this grant had no disturnpiked roads at all. The heading of the Vote in the Appropriation Act was simply “Disturnpiked Roads.” In England some of the grant was for main roads besides disturnpiked roads; but in Scotland it was given for some roads which were not disturnpiked. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had pleaded on behalf of these grants that before the roads were disturnpiked the cost of maintaining them was paid out of the tolls charged on those who used the roads, and he gave that as the reason why the localities should be relieved; but that could not be pleaded on behalf of the grants made for the maintenance of roads which were never disturnpiked; and therefore he said that the same claim on the Imperial purse did not exist as was alleged by the right hon. Gentleman in regard to England. He thought this transaction on the part of the right hon. Gentleman and the Treasury was a most grave and questionable one, inasmuch as in addition to its unfairness it tended to withdraw from the cognizance of Parliament the expenditure of the public money. The meaning of the Government regulations with respect to these grants was, that while in England only the localities were relieved which had disturnpiked roads, in Scotland, whether the roads were disturnpiked or not, the localities should receive the same relief as if they had disturnpiked roads.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he could not admit that there was any justice in the observation of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that Scotland was the spoilt child of the Estimates. He would not go into the larger question, but could do so if necessary, and he did not think there would be any difficulty in showing that the contributions in aid of local taxation in Ireland were far in excess of any given to Scotland. In the case of the Police, for instance, the whole cost of maintenance was contributed by the Imperial Exchequer. [“No, no!”] There were also other contributions which he would not dwell upon. As regarded the particular question before the Committee, he was afraid that the hon. Member had not adverted to the heading of the Vote, because it was “Disturnpiked and other Roads.” He would remind the Committee of the history of the matter. [Mr. SEXTON: Why is the heading different in the Appropriation Account?] He thought it was “Disturnpiked and other Roads,” but perhaps the word “other” had been admitted by mistake; at all events, the word “other” occurred in the Estimate, which he proposed to deal with. The Committee would recollect that £250,000 was agreed to be granted as a contribution in aid of the maintenance of roads, and as had been stated by the hon. Member it was made in terms applicable to disturnpiked and main roads. It was true that the words “main roads” was an incorrect term—it was an error, and had been rectified since. Well, during the first year that the Vote was given, the only contribution was to counties, the roads of which had been disturnpiked since 1860. It was felt and represented in that House—and he believed that the representation was considered by the House generally to be a just one—that by going back to 1860 an injustice was done to those counties of Scotland which had anticipated the legislation which subsequently took place and which culminated in the Act of 1878. There were various instances in which roads were disturnpiked by County Acts between 1850 and 1860, and accordingly it was felt that the representation made that the counties concerned should participate was a reasonable one, and it was determined to carry back the period to 1850. He did not gather from the remarks of the hon. Member that he would complain of the practice with regard to those roads having come into operation somewhat earlier in Scotland than in England. The gravamen of the hon. Member's charge related to those counties where there were no disturnpiked roads. That question had been brought before the House very prominently by the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay), and the result was a prevalent or unanimous assent, so far as one could gather, to the view that those counties which never had received a contribution in aid, because they had maintained their own roads, had just as great a claim to a share of the general grant as those which had for some time received a contribution by reason of their having disturnpiked roads. The proportion given to Scotland was very nearly on the basis of population between the two countries, making a little allowance in consequence of the greater lines of roads in Scotland, and that was the allocation which appeared on the Votes. He did not suppose that hon. Members would care to pursue the matter very narrowly, seeing that Scotland only got a fair proportion of the grant, and that the domestic arrangement, as he might call it, of allocating the grant between the various counties was such as had received the prevalent assent of the House, and had the great merit of being just in itself.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he was glad the Committee had had the advantage of listening to a speech from the Lord Advocate, because it appeared to him to be entirely in favour of the view taken of this matter by Irish Members. As a matter of fact, the Scotch case was exactly the same as the Irish case. The Scotch people had had a very able advocate, however, and got their share of the money. But the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department was that the grant in aid was by way of compensation for the tolls that had been given up. The only argument against the claim of Irish Members had been upset by the Lord Advocate. It was practically admitted that Ireland was in the same position as that in which Scotland formerly stood. He would only point out the great disparity which existed between the two countries in this respect—namely, that whereas the Scotch people had got the money, the unfortunate Irish tenants who bore the bulk of the cost of maintaining the Irish roads were without relief. He trusted the Government would attend to the argument of the Lord Advocate.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he objected in principle to grants in aid of local rates; but the practice had been adopted of giving to England and Scotland money, and, in his opinion, it ought in that case to be distributed all round. He should vote for the grant in aid to Scotland only because England had already received it. If hon. Members from Ireland were to bring forward a Motion to give a grant to Ireland under similar circumstances, he should vote with them. In the case of Scotland there was no difference between the disturnpiked roads and others—they had all been taken over by the County Boards. He did not now see any difference between the case of Ireland and that of Scotland; and, as he had already stated, he was ready to vote for a Motion, if it were brought forward, to place the two countries in a similar position in respect of the maintenance of roads.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he hoped the Irish Members would be a little more consistent than the hon. Member (Mr. Barclay). The hon. Gentleman wished to have fair play all round; he had voted against the subvention for England, but he was not prepared to vote against that for Scotland. There was no subvention proposed in relief of local taxation in Ireland, and, therefore, the Irish Members objected alike to the Votes for England and Scotland. He hoped they were sufficiently consistent, having voted against the privilege extended to England, to vote against the privilege being extended to Scotland. The Irish Representatives objected to the system of subventions from the Imperial Exchequer in aid of local taxation. ["No, no!"] It seemed they were not unanimous. He, however, was of opinion that there ought to be no subventions from the Imperial Exchequer in aid of local taxation. Every local area ought to bear its own local burdens, and the Imperial Exchequer ought only to bear burdens which were essentially Imperial. At any rate, if there was to be any departure from that principle, the departure ought to apply to every portion of the Kingdom. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate had referred to a Scotch Member who, two years ago, made a stand against the proposed Vote for England, on the ground that Scotland was not allowed to participate in the same proportion as England in the scramble. The hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. Ramsay) divided the House two years ago against the Vote for England, and he objected to the Vote for Scotland on the ground that the distribution of the Vote was not equitably made in Scotland—that some portions of the country did not obtain the advantage that others did. What did the hon. Member for Falkirk say his objection to the Vote was? Why, that if the Vote was made at all, it should be made equally all round—that every portion of the Kingdom ought to obtain its share. The hon. Member was supported on that occasion by the Irish Members. He (Mr. A. O'Connor) was sorry to say that they did not find that the Scotch Members regarded it as a matter of reciprocity when the claims of Ireland in the matter were urged upon the House. There was this peculiar feature about the Vote for Scotland, that an allowance was made to the country in respect of those districts in which there never was a turnpike road. Now, the Committee were told by the Lord Advocate that the Vote was to be increased, in order that some inequality might be got rid of. The fact was, that when the Vote was only £25,000, they did not spend so much in Scotland; they only required £23,800 for this purpose. The last Appropriation Account showed that there was actually upwards of £1,100 surrendered out of the smaller Vote of £25,000. What was the case now? Whereas £23,000 odd was sufficient two years ago, Scotland now wanted £35,000, and the only thing to be said in defence of the increased amount was that the Scotch Members insisted on obtaining, and the Government assented to their obtaining, something like a fair proportionate share of this public grant from the Imperial Exchequer. Why should Ireland not be allowed to share in the grant? The Government told the Irish Members that they could not have it, but that they must wait until, by some measure or other to be brought in in a future Parliament, something like equality in this matter could be secured between the different parts of the Kingdom. He had no doubt that when there was a new Parliament, the Irish Members would be able to produce effects much greater than they could now. The pressure they would be able to bring to bear on the Government would be something like the effective pressure which the Scotch Members could now bring to bear on the Liberal Administration. There were now sitting on the Government Bench hon. Members who in previous years had recognized the hardship under which Ireland rested in this particular. The hon. Gentleman who was now the Secretary to the Local Government (Mr. George Russell) recognized last year the inequality of treatment in this respect, and he joined the Irish Members in the division against the Government proposal. He could not now ask the hon. Gentleman to repeat his action, because the position of the hon. Gentleman was altered. The Irish Members would very likely find that, whatever individual Members of the Government felt ought to be done with regard to Ireland, they would have to rest content with the present state of things. He hoped, however, that they would go to a division, simply in order that they might have a record of their proceedings—a record of the protest on the part of Irish Members against this signal instance of unequal treatment which was meted out to Ireland in the distribution of public money.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he hoped that this was the last year in which these subventions would appear on the Estimates. A more objectionable system than that comprised in these grants in aid could not be imagined, for it really amounted to putting money into the pocket of the people with one hand and taking it out with the other, then to be spent without that check which was felt when it came out of their own pocket. He trusted that between this and the assembling of the next Parliament, calculations would be made with the view of getting rid of these subventions. That might be effected by transferring to localities a number of small taxes yielding an income of about £6,000,000—more than sufficient to cover the subventions. He could not help pointing out to the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) and the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), who were very fond of calling attention to the amounts of public money received by Scotland in comparison with those granted to Ireland, that those hon. Gentlemen disregarded the fact that Scotland contributed in many respects considerably more to the Revenue of the United Kingdom than Ireland.

MR. GIBSON said, that this was a matter of great practical importance. A great many things were to be relegated to the new Parliament which they were told would do a great deal of justice which could not at present be obtained; but he would like, if they could, to do a little good in this Parliament. It was small comfort for them to hear from the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir George Balfour) that they should devote the time between this and the next Parliament to making calculations. There were no more intelligent or calculating people in the world than the Irish, and one of their peculiarities was that they could make their calculations with every reasonable rapidity. If the Government told the Committee that they really meant to remedy the state of things which existed in Ireland—if they meant to apply a remedy as soon as the people were ready to supply them with the necessary calculations, he assured the Government that those calculations would be forthcoming a great deal quicker than his hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) imagined.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he had listened to the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) with considerable pain, because, so far as he could gather, the right hon. and learned Gentleman urged the Government to depart from an agreement entered into by their Predecessors. He (Sir Herbert Maxwell) regarded this Vote as a corollary of the Turnpikes Act of the late Government; and, therefore, any indication of an intention on the part of the Government to depart from the agreement entered into in consequence of that legislation, would be a distinct breach of faith. Whatever might be the merits of the relative amounts of expenditure upon what might be called the systems in Ireland and Scotland, there could be no change of intention on the part of the Government on this point. He should be glad to hear from the Government that he was right in assuming that to be the case.

MR. WARTON said, he did not quite understand the process of argument of their Irish Friends. He was willing to admit that Ireland had a claim for relief of local taxation; but he did not see why, because Ireland had such a claim. Irish Members should move to negative this Vote. Their proceeding seemed to him very curious, to say the least of it. He did not understand the logic of it, because the ratepayers of England and Scotland were entitled to relief under an agreement come to between the Prime Minister and the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel Harcourt). That there was not such relief afforded to Ireland was no real reason why the Irish Members should object to the English and Scotch receiving it; it was a very good reason why there should be relief given to Ireland, but it was no reason why it should be refused to England and Scotland. At the same time, the attitude of the Irish Members was quite as consistent as that of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay). The hon. Gentleman said he was opposed to those grants altogether, and being opposed to them he voted against that proposed for England. He was, however, prepared to vote for the grant to Scotland, and the reason he gave was that England already had got the Vote. He (Mr. Warton) hoped they would be able to test the sentiments of the hon. Member for Forfarshire next year by reversing the order of the Votes. He very much questioned whether, if the Vote for Scotland were proposed first, the hon. Member would be found voting against this objectionable system, for he was afraid that the hon. Gentleman would on no account vote against money being granted to Scotland.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman's (Mr. Warton's) observations were very unfair to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay). The interference of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Barclay) in the debate was kindly meant towards Ireland, and his statement was perfectly consistent. The hon. Gentleman was in favour of a grant being given to Ireland as well as to Scotland, and being a Scotchman he naturally voted in favour of the grant being continued to his own country. The Irish Members had no means whatever of giving the hon. Gentleman an opportunity of voting for a grant for them. No one knew better than the hon. Member himself that it was impossible for any private Member to bring forward anything like a distinct proposal of the kind. The reason of the Irish Members' attitude was perfectly intelligible. They were opposed to the Vote for Scotland, not that they disapproved of that Vote, but because it was unaccompanied by a Vote for Ireland. He was glad that this Vote was intrusted to the care of the present Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert). There was no Member of the Government whose mind was more open to reason, and who was more willing to give expression to his opinions when they had been changed by arguments addressed to him, than the hon. Gentleman. Now, the hon. Gentleman had heard that discussion—a discussion of a very remarkable character in one respect. Practically all the speakers, representing nearly every shade of opinion in the House, had joined in backing the claim of Ireland. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) was kind enough, a short time ago, to speak in a spirit friendly to Ireland, and no doubt he would be found amongst the supporters of a grant being given to Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), who was separated from the Irish National Party by as wide a chasm of political difference as could separate any two Parties, pressed upon the Government the desirability of meeting the claim of Ireland in this matter. The hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay), who was not unacquainted with questions of this kind, also spoke in favour of Ireland. Every section of the Committee, therefore, had practically united with the Irish Members in pressing this claim upon the attention of the Government. He was almost precluded from urging any argument in favour of the principle of the demand which was made. He assumed that the demand would not have received such unanimous and highly respectable support if it were not founded on reason and justice. The only point he wished to press on the Government was the desirability and possibility of their dealing with the question promptly. He quite agreed with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) that it was a rather perilous proceeding for them to postpone until the next Parliament all matters of reform. He joined with most other people in looking to the next Parliament for the introduction of very great and desirable reforms in the three countries; but, at the same time, it must be borne in mind that the next Parliament would, in all probability, find, like all preceding Parliaments, that it had more work to do than it could get through. It was only due to the next Parliament that if they could introduce small reforms in this Parliament they should do so. What he would respectfully suggest to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) was that he should deal with this question by Bill. The measure need only contain a very few clauses, and it would certainly be one of a non-contentious character. It would not receive any opposition either direct or indirect. Members' minds were made up on the matter; the Bill could be got through in the small hours of the morning; and, in fact, it would be like the Royal Irish Constabulary Redistribution Bill, a measure which could be passed in the course of a week. Any action of the kind he had suggested would have a most beneficial effect. There was nothing more exasperating to the Irish Members than to observe the gigantic disproportion between the amount of money expended in Ireland upon Police and Constabulary, and the sum expended for purposes of reform—for education or local aid, for instance. He thought his hon. Friends were justified in pointing out the extraordinary inequality in this matter which existed between the two countries, and he hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would take that opportunity of redressing a generally admitted grievance.

Mr. PARNELL said, he was precluded by an engagement from giving his reasons for voting against the system of subvention on the English Vote; but he would take the opportunity of doing so upon the Scotch Vote, which was, of course, of a similar character. He understood that during the debate upon the English Vote, the Prime Minister admitted the apparent justice of the claim of Ireland to a proportionate grant in aid of local taxation in the direction of the maintenance of roads, and said that he would look into the matter, and that if he found upon full examination that the claim was a just one, he had no doubt the House would apply a remedy. But in a matter of such importance, one in which it was evident the general feeling of the House was in favour of the justice of the claim, the Irish Members were entitled to something a little more definite, at all events, as regarded the time when the ameliorating action, by Bill or otherwise, would be taken. He did not know whether it would be necessary to pass an Act of Parliament at all; but, assuming that it would be necessary, it was obvious, from the kindly feeling expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) and by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), that the Bill would neither be blocked nor opposed on the Opposition side of the House. As the Government could control and influence their own followers, it followed that the Bill would not meet with opposition from the Ministerial side of the House either. The Bill, consequently, would be a non-contentious Bill, and would be passed without any difficulty if it were taken up by the only power able to take it up, that power being the Government. He was perfectly willing to leave to the Prime Minister the investigation as to whether justice and right were upon their side; but what he asked was, would the Government introduce a Bill for the purpose of remedying this grievance if the Prime Minister decided that their claim was based upon a just foundation? It was absurd to put the Irish Members off till next year. Many of them might never come back; besides, it was, in any case, their duty, having pointed out this glaring inequality, to use all reasonable means of getting it removed. It might be said that the Government were taken by surprise. But the question had been raised by the Irish Members before now. It was raised upon the Bill, now an Act, upon which this Estimate was founded. They supported the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel Harcourt), when, in the early days of this Parliament, he moved his Motion in favour of relief of local taxation. The majority upon that Motion was so small that the Government were compelled to take action by legislation. Although the Irish Members supported the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Harcourt), they found, when the time came for legislation, that Ireland was left out in the cold. They were entitled to some plain declaration from the Government with regard to this question. The Government ought to say whether they would introduce a Bill that Session for the purpose of removing the inequality which existed. Of course, if the Bill were opposed by the Irish Members, the Government would be justified in abandoning it; but if it were only opposed on the Government side of the House, the Irish Members would be entitled to ask the Government to use their influence to secure the withdrawal of the opposition. He asked the Government to show that their sympathy was bond fide, and not shove the Irish Members on one side for the rest of the Session. He protested against Ireland being cheated annually out of something like £40,000 or £50,000, to which, in comparison with Scotland, they were entitled. When English people went over to Ireland the Irish people were always very glad to see them; but, after all, visitors drove and walked over the roads at the expense of the Irish people. When, however, Irish people came over to England, they found that they drove over roads towards the maintenance of which they contributed. Such a state of things was not fair or just. The Government ought to speak candidly and straightforwardly in reply to the question he had addressed to them—namely, if the Prime Minister came to the conclusion that their claim was a just one, would legislation be initiated that Session to meet it?

Mr. HIBBERT said, he felt that after the speeches made by hon. Gentlemen opposite, it was proper some remarks should be made by the Government upon this Vote. He was extremely sorry the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was not present during the discussion upon the English Vote, because he would then have heard what was said by the Prime Minister. He (Mr. Hibbert) was not able to go beyond what the Prime Minister said on that Vote—namely, that the subject should be considered in connection with the whole system of local taxation and local government. The hon. Gentleman had said he was given to understand that the Prime Minister stated that he would consider this question itself. The right hon. Gentleman hardly went so far as that; he said he was quite willing to consider this question in connection with other questions of local taxation, and he would take care full justice was done to Ireland, not only in respect to this particular question but other questions. He (Mr. Hibbert) regarded the protest which had been made by hon. Members as a protest against this grant being given to England and Scotland unless it was given to Ireland also. His own impression was that it was much more likely that this discussion would lead to the abolition of the grants in aid to England and Scotland rather than a grant being given to Ireland as well as to England and Scotland. He believed that that was so, because when this grant in aid of disturnpiked roads was assented to it was only intended to be a temporary means of meeting the difficulty. It was always understood that the matter would be reconsidered when the whole question of local taxation came to be reviewed. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had referred to him personally. Of course, if he could meet the views of the hon. Gentleman he should be very glad to do so. He was always anxious to deal with questions, no matter from whatever part of the House they were raised, in the most open and liberal spirit. He should be very glad if this question could be settled in the way suggested by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell); but he was not prepared to go further than the promise made by the Prime Minister—namely, that the whole question should be considered as affecting the Three Kingdoms.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, that surely upon the admission of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister there was every reason why the inequality between England and Scotland and Ireland should be remedied that year. If the Prime Minister admitted—and he did admit—that the inequality existed, then he (Mr. Dickson) maintained it was the duty of the Government to remove the inequality that very year. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had very fairly stated that there would be no difficulty in passing a Bill to remedy this undoubted grievance. He (Mr. Dickson) was persuaded that no Member of the House would be found to assent that Ireland should be treated in an exceptional manner with respect to local taxation. If English and Scotch Members really knew how burdensome local taxation was becoming in Ireland they would at once concede the demand now made in regard to Ireland; they would readily admit that if such countries like England and Scotland received subventions in aid of local taxation, a poor country like Ireland should certainly receive such assistance. What did he hear the other day from a friend? Why, that in one county of Ireland he had found that local taxation already amounted to as much as 10s. in the pound. It was a notorious fact that taxation was rising at such a rate in various counties that already the reduction of rents was being rapidly neutralized by the increase of taxation. He hoped the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would consider the desirability of bringing in a Bill to place the three countries, with regard to grants in aid of local taxation, in the same advantageous position.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), who endeavoured, on occasions like this, to derive for the public some benefit from discussions which might otherwise have a tendency to become academical, had suggested that the Government should bring in a Bill to remedy an admitted grievance in Ireland. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hibbert) who was in charge of the Vote seemed to raise some question of the accuracy of the interpretation given by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Parnell) of the Prime Minister's words. Of course, it was impossible to be always verbally accurate; but he (Mr. Sexton) certainly understood the Prime Minister to admit the justice of the claim made on behalf of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman said the question should receive consideration, and he held out the hope or prospect that when the larger question of local government came to be considered all sections of the House would be found willing, and even desirous, to concede the just claim of Ireland on this question. As long as the justice of their claim was recognized he saw no reason why a Bill, and subsequently a Supplementary Estimate, should not be brought in this year to give Ireland the relief which was its due. The Bill could be prepared in a few minutes; it would not arouse any hostile susceptibilities in any quarter of the House, but would be regarded as a praiseworthy effort to deal justly with Ireland. He thought that if the Prime Minister were informed of what had taken place during his absence from the House he might be inclined to reconsider the question. He would not move to report Progress, because he understood there were other hon. Members who wished to address the Committee; but he thought that before the debate was brought to a conclusion it was desirable that the view of the Prime Minister should be had with respect to the appeal which had been made to the Government by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell).

MR. PLUNKET desired very respectfully to add his voice to the unbroken chorus of unanimous approval which had come from all the Irish Members in that discussion. He did not know what answer could be given in justice or in equity to the demand which was now made. It was perfectly plain on the face of this Estimate that large sums were being given to England and Scotland for the purposes of meeting the requirements of the turnpike roads. It had been proved, and it had not been questioned by the Government, that the necessity for such subvention was stronger in Ireland than it was in either England or Scotland; and, under those circumstances, he could not see why the Government should not frankly undertake at once that they would, pari passu with the relief which they were now giving to Scotland and England in this matter, give similar and proportionate relief to Ireland. It could not be a very large sum; but to make the grant would facilitate the course of Business very much. It would be not only a gracious but simply a just thing to do if the Government were at once frankly to say that they would, without postponing the matter until that vague and shadowy time when they could introduce a measure dealing with local taxation generally, redress this admitted grievance. Let the Committee have an assurance at once that the Irish people should not be kept out of that which he sincerely and honestly believed Ireland was entitled to; let them be told at once that the Government would concede the unanimous demand of the Irish Members of all Parties, to which demand the Government had not attempted to make any proper or just answer.

MR. PARNELL said, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) was good enough to give him a more accurate version of the statement of the Prime Minister than that which he had been able to receive otherwise. It now appeared that the Prime Minister desired to leave the question over until the consideration of the question of local government in the Three Kingdoms. They were also very candidly told by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury that, in his judgment, the reconsideration of the whole question of local government would end in the withdrawal of the two Votes which they had been considering that evening, or, in other words, instead of Ireland getting relief, relief would be taken away from England and Scotland. The hon. Gentleman had also reminded the Committee that the Vote which they were now discussing was one of a temporary character. That consideration, however, strengthened very much the position of the Irish Members. They were willing to leave the final settlement of the question of relief of local taxation out of the Imperial funds to the time when the Government might bring it before the House, either in that Parliament or the next. That time might be next year, or it might not be for several years to come. Their case was simply this—that it was not just to vote these sums annually for England and for Scotland without at the same voting a proportionate sum for Ireland. Parliament might decide upon stopping these Votes when the whole question of local taxation and local government came up for consideration; but what the Committee had to do now was to deal with the situation of affairs at the present time, and as matters now stood the Irish people were by their contributions to the Imperial Revenue paying a certain portion of the expenses of the roads in England and Scotland, while the English and Scotch people paid nothing whatever in aid of the maintenance of the roads in Ireland. Such a state of affairs might last for one year, or for several years, or it might last always. These contributions might always be given; but whether they lasted for a short time, or for a long time, it was the duty of the Irish Members to exhaust the means at their disposal to insure that the same treatment should be meted out to Ireland with regard to grants from Imperial sources as was meted out to England and Scotland. He thought that was a fair and reasonable proposition. He noticed that since the debate on this particular Vote commenced, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan), a Member of the Cabinet and a Gentleman who, from his position, was qualified to speak on this important question, had entered the House. The right hon. Gentleman was Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland during a very important period; he discharged the duties of that Office to the satisfaction of the Members of the House of Commons, and, no doubt, of the majority of the people of England, though certainly not to the satisfaction of the Irish Members, or as they believed to the satisfaction of the majority of the people of Ireland, and anything that came from him upon this question would have great weight. It might be possible for the right hon. Gentleman to assist the Committee in unravelling this entanglement into which their proceedings had unfortunately got, and if he would do so he would certainly earn the gratitude of all present.

MR. ILLINGWORTH desired to say a few words in justification of the position he took up upon this question. Hon. Members had urged equality of treatment between England and Scotland on the one hand and Ireland on the other. It must, however, be borne in mind that there were some items of Imperial taxation in respect to which Ireland had an advantage over the other parts of the Kingdom. While equality of treatment in this matter might be urged with unanswerable force, it was only fair to recognize the fact that there were items which were paid by England and Scotland, but which were not paid by Ireland. Having said that, he hoped the Government would understand that the strong objection in principle and in practice that many Members of the House entertained to these grants in aid remained with them as forcibly as ever. He trusted the Government would adhere to the often-expressed determination to remove this system of subvention, which he considered was as vicious a system as could be imagined.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR remarked, that the unanimity on this question had, at last, been broken by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford—[MR. ILLINGWORTH: No, no!]—but, after all, the hon. Gentleman dealt rather with the general principle than with the particular question under consideration. It might or might not have been wise in Parliament to have given these grants in aid; but that was not the question the Committee were discussing. Parliament, whether rightly or wrongly, had given these grants in aid, Ireland being debarred from any participation in them. He rather regretted the attitude which the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) had taken up on this matter; but he did not despair even yet that the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Trevelyan) might be able to give them some satisfaction in this matter. The statement of the Prime Minister, which he had not the advantage of hearing, was very good so far as it went; but he thought it gave the Irish Members very little satisfaction indeed. According to the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert), the Prime Minister meant to say that when the large and general question of local government and local taxation came to be considered the case of this particular grant in aid would be considered also. The Prime Minister must be very sanguine indeed if he supposed that the Irish Representatives could gather any great amount of consolation from such a general promise as that. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) and his hon. Friends were very desirous of seeing a thorough reform of local government in Ireland. They had been waiting for some such reform ever since the very beginning of this Parliament; and they would not be at all displeased if, when the future arrangements of the Session were announced, a Bill for the reform of local government in Ireland took its place amongst the proposals of the Government. So far so good; but surely this was a very small part of the general question of local government. The question of local government in Ireland was a very large question indeed, and he was afraid that the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen (Mr. Gibson and Mr. Plunket) who had given such strong support to the proposal in respect to this small reform would not be found amongst the supporters of the larger reform. He was afraid that any such proposal propounded by Her Majesty's Government would receive a considerable amount of opposition from hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway; it would, indeed, be by a stroke of singular good fortune if the Government succeeded in getting such a measure passed during the present Session of Parliament. To postpone this question until the larger one of local government was considered was practically to postpone this grant in aid to Ireland until the next Parliament. Looking at all the facts of the case, and at the moribund condition of the present Parliament, he feared that any hope of getting such a large reform as local government in Ireland passed that Session was very remote. He hoped the next speaker from the Treasury Bench—and he assumed there would be another speaker—would assure the Committee that this question would receive immediate consideration. That was the demand of the Irish Members. No one needed to be at great pains to see the monstrous injustice of giving large rates in aid to rich countries like England and Scotland, and leaving Ireland out in the cold. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) had referred to the sum contributed by Ireland to the Imperial Revenue. He assured the hon. Gentleman that the comparison between the amount of taxation contributed by Ireland to the Imperial Exchequer and the amount contributed by other parts of the Kingdom was one on which Irish Members would enter with the greatest courage, for they were firmly convinced that any fair and impartial comparison of the contributions of the Three Kingdoms would show that Ireland contributed not less, but far more, than her due share of the general taxation of the Kingdom. He had no desire to enter into that subject now; but he might state that in the case of whiskey, for instance, Ireland was far more heavily and disproportionately taxed than England. The point now under consideration was that the two richer countries received grants in aid of local taxation, while the poorer country did not. That was a monstrous injustice, which ought not to be tolerated a moment longer than was necessary.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that the hon. Members who were present when the Prime Minister made his statement would admit it was extremely difficult for anyone upon the Treasury Bench to add to that statement. It would be conceded that the right hon. Gentleman said the very utmost which the situation justified him in saying. ["He did not say anything."] Yes, the right hon. Gentleman said something; and from the account which he (Mr. Trevelyan) had heard, both privately on the Treasury Bench and through the speeches of hon. Gentlemen and the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert), he gathered that the Prime Minister said all that he thought safe under the circumstances. In saying anything more he would have shown an indiscretion of which he was quite incapable. This was a question which had been started for the first time. [MR. HEALY: No, no; nor the second time.] It was a question which had been started, not on its own merits, but by way of objection to two Estimates laid before the House for the first time. [MR. HEALY: What other way have we?] He did not complain, by any means, of the way in which it had been started; but it having been started under such circumstances, the point was what amount of response it was possible to give to it. The response of the Prime Minister was to the effect that the question would be considered as one of the items of account when the whole matter of local taxation came before the attention of the Executive. It was impossible to go further than that. He (Mr. Trevelyan) certainly could go no further, except to say that all the arguments which had been used since the Prime Minister left the House should be brought before the right hon. Gentleman's notice. He would personally engage himself to urge the right hon. Gentleman to take the matter into immediate consideration. He objected to go deeper into the matter, because, if he did, he should at once embark upon controversies that were not unfamiliar to hon. Members of the House, both with regard to the incidence of taxation in Ireland, as compared with other parts of the United Kingdom, and with regard to contributions, direct in the shape of grants and indirect in the shape of advantageous loans, which Ireland received, but which other parts of the Kingdom did not receive. Let him take the single instance of loans to Irish farmers. The argument the hon. Member had used on the subject differed from those which reached the ear of the Prime Minister, and should be brought before his right hon. Friend, who would be urged to give the question a broad and comprehensive consideration of a nature which would enable him to make a statement on the subject at the very earliest opportunity. More than that it was impossible for any Member of the Government to say at that moment; and, as hon. Members were well aware, it was impossible for the Prime Minister to say more. Under those circumstances, he earnestly trusted that the Committee would allow the Vote to be taken, and enable them to get on with those which, directly or indirectly, concerned Ireland.

MR. WARTON said, that hon. Members had extended the scope of the debate by introducing a sort of comparison between the local taxation of Great Britain and Ireland. Now, it was not a question of the comparative local taxation between the two countries, but a question between the State and the locality. It was a question between the public, as an entire body, and a smaller body of the people on whom the taxation really fell; and the reason why the question arose at all was that the public, as a body, had a user of the roads which was not confined to those who dwelt in the locality. It seemed perfectly fair to him that the State should recognize that fact, and should make a contribution out of the Imperial funds in aid of the local rates. It was, therefore, not a question between England and Ireland, but one between the State and, the locality; and that being so, there was no reason why the State should do one thing in England and another thing in Ireland, or why it should do more in Cornwall or Yorkshire than in any of the Irish counties. It was unjust to deprive a certain number of localities, because they happened to be situated in Ireland, of the right to relief in regard to local taxation, which in Ireland pressed so severely on the occupiers of land. The Committee had been much impressed by the magnificence of the language of the Prime Minister; but, after all, it did not amount to very much. They were all fond of putting forward some grand scheme which would embrace all the areas of local taxation with all their complexity—some grand telescopic plan blinding in its results when seen through a kaleidoscope, but when calmly contemplated through an ordinary medium discovered to be nothing more than a gorgeous vision. He hoped they would all remain Members of the House until that prospect was realized, and he thought they would have a pretty long enjoyment of their seats. He only hoped that he might live to see the day when this grand scheme would come off. He was afraid, however, that it never would be realized either in this or the next Parliament. The earlier days of the coming Parliament would be very much occupied in considering Constitutional questions and the position of Parliament itself; and, after those questions were disposed of, it would be found that there were a great number of new Members, all of whom would have their own ideas, and there would be very little prospect of this grand scheme of local government taxation being carried out.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. and learned Member that he is travelling from the Question before the Committee, which is really a Vote in aid of the maintenance of roads.

MR. WARTON begged the hon. Gentleman's pardon; but he had been led astray by the almost impossibility of rigidly adhering to the text. As they all knew, a sermon very often differed from the text. The question was really one of granting relief to Ireland. They were all agreed that the relief asked for ought to be granted, and the only question was whether it should be immediate or prospective; but after the warning he had received he would not touch upon that question further. He ventured to think that this was the Parliament in which the relief should be granted. At any rate, something should be done quickly, for the purpose of remedying an injustice which the Government themselves admitted was only to be continued temporarily.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR remarked that the Committee were placed in an extraordinary position. The Irish Members were asked to consent to the taxation of their own constituents for the benefit of England and Scotland. Every single Member who had spoken, as the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin had pointed out, had spoken in one voice with regard to the sense of the House about an injustice which was recognized by the Conservative and Liberal Members alike. Even upon the Treasury Bench there was an admission of the injustice, and, that admission having been made, the Committee were quietly asked still to vote the money without any further discussion, so that they might get on, as the Chancellor of the Duchy suggested, with the other Votes. The right hon. Gentleman had not the advantage, as he had himself admitted, of hearing the remarks of the Prime Minister; and he was also under the disadvantage of not having heard the two previous discussions of the question before the Committee of Supply last year and the year before. The very same arguments and the same objections urged that night had on both of those occasions been brought under the notice of the Committee of Supply, and then, as now, the answer was that this was only to be a temporary charge, and that as soon as the general question of local expenditure and local government could be dealt with, as it would be in the near future, the difficulty would be removed. That was exactly what had been repeated by the Prime Minister that night. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy said—"Oh, yes; the Prime Minister did say something. He said a great deal; but he did not go beyond a certain point, and he exercised a wise discretion in the matter." Now, it seemed to him (Mr. A. O'Connor) that the Chancellor of the Duchy had exercised a wise discretion also; because, although towards the end of his remarks he said that he would urge upon the Prime Minister that the question should receive immediate consideration, he gave the Committee clearly to understand what his own general bias in the matter was—namely, that Ireland had counter-advantages to be thankful for, and he pointed out that those advantages consisted in the advances made to the owners of property for improvements. It was no satisfaction to the taxpayers of Ireland, in respect of the distribution of the present Vote, to know that other persons could, if they paid interest for them, obtain advances from the Treasury. The present question was not one of loan, but of granting and voting money from the Imperial Exchequer; and the retort he would make upon the question of loans was that any advantage the Irish tenants were able to derive in respect of them was a great deal more than counterbalanced by the manner in which other grants were distributed. In this case England and Scotland got all the money, and Ireland got nothing at all. In the same way, the Army and Navy Votes were distributed almost exclusively for the benefit of the taxpayers of this country, and the Irish taxpayers, who contributed an equal proportion, got merely a nominal share of them. Every Member on both sides of the House who had taken part in the discussion had expressed an opinion against the inequality of the present system. The Prime Minister, although, no doubt, an important Member of the Cabinet, could not be the only man who was authorized to speak on behalf of the Government. Surely, any other Cabinet Minister ought to be able to express his opinion upon a matter of this kind frankly and boldly, and to say whether he would be prepared to give the Irish Members his substantial advocacy when the question came to be discussed, and whether he would, between this and the Report of Supply, ascertain if the Cabinet were not able to take some further step. The Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. George Russell) had frankly admitted at that Table that he entertained a strong opinion as to the unfairness of the present system, and, as far as he could gather, that was also the opinion of the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert). He asked, then, that the Government should let the Committee clearly see what their view was, and it ought not to be too much for a Cabinet Minister to say what he was prepared to do personally—even if not in a position to speak for the Cabinet—when any proposal upon the subject was brought forward. He could not understand why, long ago, the Prime Minister had not been asked to reconsider his utterances. A mere reference to the possible discussion in the next Parliament of the whole question of local taxation and expenditure was simply to laugh at the Committee, and treat them like a parcel of children. In the meantime, the Irish taxpayers were being unduly burdened for the benefit of the rich taxpayers in England and Scotland. The simple statement of a grievance should be enough to secure that the Government would either withdraw the Vote or promise to bring forward some measure to provide equal treatment for the Irish taxpayers to that which was meted out to the taxpayers of England and Scotland. The attitude of the Government, however good their intentions might be, was such that he found he had no other alternative than to divide the Committee against the Vote.

MR. BIGGAR said, that, if he remembered rightly, there had been one Vote in the present Parliament, and others as long ago as 1873, in favour of assistance to local taxation in England. The Vote now before the Committee carried out that principle, and there was no reason to think that the new Parliament would alter the principle of taxation which had been affirmed by two Parliaments. For that reason he thought the Irish Members ought to still press for an extension of the principle of subvention. It was all very well in theory to say that it would be brought forward at some future time; but, unfortunately, although the consideration of this important question had now been promised for a very long time, the introduction of a Bill for establishing local self-government seemed to be as far off as ever. In the absence of any tangible scheme of that kind, what the Irish Members wanted was a temporary measure which would place the Irish people on the same level as those in England and Scotland in regard to this particular question. He did not see upon what grounds the Government could refuse such a fair demand. This grant to Ireland, if it were now made, would only continue in existence until the time shadowed forth by the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert), and supported by hon. Members behind him—namely, the time when this assistance to local taxation would be cleared away for ever. But, until that time came, it was only fair and reasonable that Ireland should get her fair share of these Votes. As had been pointed out, in the course of the debate, there were no doubt that several taxes, such as the House Tax and the Carriage Tax, were not paid in Ireland. Now, in regard to the House Tax, if it were laid on in Ireland it would bring in a very small amount of money, because a large proportion of the population were so poorly housed, that no tax could be levied; and in regard to the Carriage Tax, it was levied on a particular class of the people who were well enough off to keep their own carriages, and therefore a large portion of the population either in England or Ireland was not affected. It was only those people who lived in a luxurious way, who were able to drive their own carriages, who paid the Tax, and the Committee had already been told that the collection of the Tax cost seven-eighths of the entire amount raised. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) had pointed out, as a counterbalancing advantage, that loans were made in Ireland; but he (Mr. Biggar) presumed they were not made unless good security was given for the money advanced. It was not a grant, but a loan, on the condition that the money was repaid to Parliament or the Government; and, on the whole, he thought Parliament had no cause to complain of those loans. The whole case resolved itself into this—whether they ought to be called upon to wait until some time in the future—perhaps the remote future—before they were placed on this footing of equality with the other parts of the Three Kingdoms. He thought the arguments of the Government were no real defence at all. A complete case, showing the inequality of the treatment of Ireland in comparison with that of England and Scotland had been made out; and so far as the loans to the Irish tenants were concerned, it must be remembered that they only benefited a very small number of persons, and not the majority of the whole people. In the county of Down, according to a local paper, there had only been two loans granted in the whole of the county, and it was very rarely indeed that any demand was made upon the Treasury. That argument was, therefore, of the weakest nature, and one which it was hardly worth while for the Chancellor of the Duchy to use. Seeing that the mind and sense of the Committee had been clearly manifested in favour of the contention of the Irish Members, he trusted that the Government would give way.

MR. SEXTON said, the justice of the case of the Irish Members was not denied in any part of the House. It was obvious that it could not be called in question. No Party in that House denied their claim, and there was nothing in the state of Public Business, or in the prospects of the Session, to relieve the Government from the duty of providing relief. The Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Trevelyan) had been good enough to promise his personal influence with the Prime Minister; but even that promise did not make the case of Ireland more hopeful, because in making it the right hon. Gentleman had let in some rays of light as to the state of his own mind by hinting that, if it were necessary to go further, something to the disadvantage of Ireland, in reference to this claim, might easily be established. Now, he challenged the right hon. Gentleman either at the present time, or any other, to come to an issue upon that point, and he (Mr. Sexton) would be fully prepared to go into all relative injuries sustained, assistance given, and advantages enjoyed by the Three Kingdoms. The right hon. Gentleman said that loans were given upon beneficial terms to the Irish tenants; but fortunately for themselves the English tenants required no loans. They were generally possessed of some capital, and in that respect they differed from the Irish tenants who were possessed of no capital at all. The English farmers had money enough to enable them to cultivate the land themselves; but in Ireland it was found necessary to assist the tenants on terms which saved the Treasury from loss, and even left a profit. How, then, could the Government talk about their philanthropy in a case of that kind when they were actually making a profit out of the money granted? Then, again, out of the large number of tenants in Ireland who had applied for loans, but very few indeed had received them. He was afraid that the right hon. Gentleman, in putting forward a plea of that kind, had somewhat lost his grasp of the details of Irish questions, or, if he had not, the observations he had made must be attributed to his ignorance. The only loans which had been granted on advantageous terms were those which had been granted to the landlords. Something like £150,000 had been lent to the tenants at a good rate of interest; but more than £1,000,000 had been lent to the landlords at 1 per cent, and there was not an impecunious landlord who had not taken advantage of that circumstance. The right hon. Gentleman remarked that the idea of the Government was to abolish this Vote altogether. If that was the latent intention of the Government, there was certainly no evidence of it on the surface. How could it be said that it was intended to abolish the Vote, in face of the fact that the amount of the grant itself was increasing year by year? It might have been thought that the Government would desire to emphasize the fact of the withdrawal of the Vote by gradually reducing it year by year. Last year Scotland got £25,000, and this year it was proposed to give her £35,000, while to England, which received £100,000 last year, it was now proposed to grant £215,000. If that was to be taken as an exhibition of the tendency to abolish these grants, it was the most retrograde and crab-like way of proceeding towards an end which could be conceived.

MR. T. A. DICKSON expressed a hope that the Government would meet the case which had been put before them frankly, and that they would, that Session, redress the inequality. Scotland and England, during the last three years, had received in aid of local taxation a sum of £700,000, while Ireland had received nothing. There was no reason whatever why Ireland should be treated in a different way from England and Scotland. All he had to say was, that if the question was allowed to stand over for the Reformed Parliament, Ireland would never receive a single ld. of the money, because, no doubt, the tendency of future legislation would be to abolish these subventions. He therefore asked the Government why they refused that year to redress the inequality? He would suggest that the Vote should be postponed until a later hour in the evening, in order to give time for the Members of the Government on the Front Bench to announce something more reassuring in regard to their policy.

MR. DEASY said, he hoped the suggestion which had been thrown out by the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) would be accepted by the Government. He was sure that its acceptance would save time rather than otherwise. It was quite plain that if the debate closed without having the views of the Prime Minister upon the subject, it would be necessary to raise the question again upon the Report stage of the Estimates when, in all probability, the discussion would occupy a longer time than if it were settled to-night. So long as Scotland was so strongly represented in the Cabinet by an hon. Gentleman who possessed the sympathy of the great majority of his fellow-countrymen, the House would be afraid to resist any claim that the Scotch Members put forward. The Irish popular Party had no such Representative, and the Government, therefore, treated them in an entirely different manner. The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) could not have been present during the early part of the discussion, or he would have heard the arguments the Irish Members urged in support of their claim. No doubt the Income Tax was much less in Ireland than in England and Scotland; but it was right to remember that the manufacturing industries in that country were not in a flourishing condition, and that while there were large coal and iron mines in England and Scotland, in Ireland the people were entirely dependent upon agricultural pursuits. The late Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. Trevelyan) alleged that it was no injustice to Ireland to place this tax upon the farmers of that country, because the Government were in the habit of granting loans to them; but the profit made in consequence of those loans went into the pocket of the landlords, and did not benefit the tenant at all. Even under the Land Act the Commissioners had confiscated all the improvements effected through those loans; and the result was that the tenants were actually in a worse state than if no loans had been granted to them. He was rather inclined to think that the Irish farmers would have been better off if not 1s. in the shape of a loan had been given to them for the last 10 or 20 years. He was further of opinion that, owing to the way in which the Land Commissioners had proceeded, it would be impossible to settle the Land Question until the people of the country took a determined stand. ["Question!"] He might be out of Order in raising that question, but he would not have referred to it if it had not been for the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy; and he would simply say that he saw no excuse for the course taken by the Government in refusing, that Session, to grant a Supplementary Estimate in aid of local taxation in Ireland. He could not believe that such a proposition would meet with any opposition from any section of the House. They were often told by the Government that they could not ask for Supplementary Estimates because certain Gentlemen strongly objected to them; and yet they never hesitated about bringing in Bill after Bill, and carrying Money Votes, to which Irish Members were strongly opposed. The Government were now asked for an Estimate in regard to which the Committee were all united; and although it would only occupy a very short time to dispose of, the Government objected. They put the Irish Members off by saying that the new Parliament would be able to make provision in some general measure for all that the people of Ireland demanded. But it might happen that the Liberal Party would not be in Office in the new Parliament, and that they might have changed sides with the Opposition; and the consequence might be that the next Parliament would be allowed to go by, just as this had gone by, without remedying the injustice complained of. So long as he could remember he had heard of promises made by successive English Governments to introduce a large measure of local government reform, and yet they seemed to be as far off as they were 10 or 15 years ago. He did not think the Government were really serious in offering this. He thought their real motive in not acceding to the views of the Irish Members was that they were not inclined to do justice to Ireland. Of course, they did not avow that intention openly; but it was perfectly obvious, to those who had watched their proceedings night after night, that they had no intention of doing justice. No doubt, they had passed certain Acts for the benefit of that country; but they had not passed them as Acts of justice to Ireland, but simply because hon. Members on those Benches made it impossible for them to refuse. In the next Parliament the Irish Members would probably have an opportunity of getting their views still better known; but that was no reason why the Government should rob Ireland of £40,000 in the meantime, and compel the poor taxpayers of the country to maintain their own roads unaided by the State, while they contributed towards the maintenance of those in England and Scotland. He saw that the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers) was now in his place, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would give the Committee his opinion and that he would endeavour to induce the Prime Minister to bring in such a Bill as would meet the demands of Irish Members. He was certain there would be no desire or disposition, in any part of the House, to obstruct such a measure. The Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Trevelyan) had told the Committee that he would place the views of the Irish Members before the Prime Minister; but the right hon. Gentleman had carefully abstained from stating what his own opinion on the subject was. He was inclined to believe that the right hon. Gentleman had given no opinion, because he was rather against the claim of Ireland to receive a sum out of the Imperial Exchequer in aid of local taxation. It was unfortunate that the people of Ireland, who were paying in some cases rates and taxes to the amount of 10s. in the pound, should be obliged to contribute £40,000 for the maintenance of highways in England and Scotland. The proposal was made two years ago that Scotland should receive a portion of the grant, and that proposal was accepted by the Government, and there was no reason why Ireland should not be included. The Government acknowledged that they were right in asking for relief, and only said that the question would be dealt with in the new Parliament amongst the first measures to be taken into consideration, or else there would be a total abolition of grants to England and Scotland. That, however, was no reason why, between this time and the new Parliament, the present injustice, in the case of Ireland should be continued. If the Government acknowledged that the Irish Members were right now, surely they ought to give them back the amount they had contributed towards the maintenance of highways in England and Scotland. It would be a very easy matter to give them what they asked. The Government did not hesitate to spend £100,000 in additional police in Ireland, and they would not hesitate to spend millions to-morrow if they were wanted in order to uphold the power of the landlords in Ireland, or to give annoyance to the Irish people. He did not see, therefore, while the fairness of their demand was acknowledged by everybody who had spoken in the debate except by the Chancellor of the Duchy, why even at that hour they should not adjourn the debate until they could have the views of the Prime Minister on the subject, or a promise that a Supplementary Estimate would be introduced.

DR. LYONS concurred with the observations which had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson); and he trusted that the Government would not consider it worth their while to persevere in the attitude they had taken up, but that they would find it possible, by bringing in a short Supplementary Estimate, to redress the injustice proposed to be done to Ireland in the matter. It was conceded, on all hands, that the days of this grant were numbered, and that they would hear very little more about it. Under those circumstances, was it worth while to continue what was practically a grievance and a cause of complaint in Ireland—namely, that a grant of such a considerable amount should be paid to England and Scotland, and that nothing should be given to Ireland for the same purpose? As far as he understood, it was not proposed to ask the Government to refund what would be a considerable sum of money if totalled up; but it would be a satisfactory settlement of the question to Ireland if the amount asked for that year were made to include a grant in equal proportion to Ireland. He had said that he presumed the days of grants in aid of those rates were numbered, and that the Government were looking forward to an early day for the introduction of a new system of local rating under local supervision and management in Ireland such as partially existed already in this country under much less expensive arrangements than those which were adopted in the case of Ireland. He had hoped that the time for the consideration of that subject would have arrived long before this; and last year, with the assistance of the Foreign Office, he had been able to procure some exceedingly valuable information from a country with which they were now, unfortunately, not upon the most pleasant terms. In the Returns which had been laid upon the Table the whole of this subject was minutely gone into, and details were fully supplied by the Embassy at St. Petersburg in reference to the Russian system of local administration. In those Returns the Committee would find much to assist them in the consideration of the subject. He trusted that in the very small shape in which the matter now stood the Treasury Bench would be able to see their way to do something to carry out the views which had been so generally expressed by the Committee.

MR. P. J. POWER said, that to this most reasonable proposal of his hon. Friend's the Government had opposed an objection of a very unreasonable kind. That proposal had been supported by a number of hon. Gentlemen—by the two right hon. and learned Members for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket and Mr. Gibson), who, as a rule, dissented from proposals made on those Benches; by the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson), and by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons). Again, not only was it supported by Irish Members of all shades of political opinion, but it had also received the support of Scotch Members. The hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) had, he believed, spoken more than once upon the subject. He was bound to say that the manner in which Her Majesty's Government had received the almost unanimous opinion of the Committee on that occasion was most disappointing. They had not held out the least hope that they would remedy the grievance complained of; they merely asked Members to postpone the question for two or three years in view of the introduction of legislation that would be introduced to deal with the entire question. A more unsatisfactory proposition could not have been made to hon. Members who raised this question. Everyone knew the difficulty of forecasting political matters; and from the manner in which legislation of the kind proceeded as a rule, they might take it for granted that nothing would be done in the matter for several years; in other words, it was not competent for this Parliament to speak the mind of a future Parliament; and therefore, if the Government adhered to their position in reference to this question, it was obvious that the grievance would continue. He did not think there could be a greater example of unfairness than the way in which Ireland was treated in respect of those subventions. Here was a case in which England and Scotland received from Imperial sources a large grant in aid of the maintenance of roads. Both England and Scotland were rich countries; but Ireland, the poorest of the Three Kingdoms, received nothing at all. In fact, the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons) had put the case in a nutshell when he said that on this question not only ought they to legislate for the future, but make some restitution for the past. It was clear that for many years England and Scotland had been receiving considerable sums from the public purse, while Ireland had received nothing. The proposition of legislation on the subject was entirely vague; and even the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, with all his knowledge of Parliamentary life, was not in a position to promise that this Government or its successor would be able to deal with the matter. His hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), certainly a competent judge of the subject, was of opinion that considerable time would elapse before Parliament would be in a position to do so. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) had said he would convey to the Prime Minister the views which had been expressed in the Committee in his absence; and in saying that he thought the right hon. Gentleman had led them to believe that his own opinion was certainly not favourable to the view taken by hon. Members on that side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman had in the course of his remarks spoken of the great advantages which farmers had in Ireland in respect of Government loans; he said that money was advanced to tenant farmers for the improvement of their holdings, which was not the case in England and Scotland, and that they in Ireland had exceptional advantages. It was certainly peculiar that those advantages, if they existed, should not be availed of; but there were some reasons which, perhaps, accounted for that, and amongst them he would point to the very cumbersome and unsatisfactory manner in which the business was worked. On that point he had some personal feeling, because he had lately induced two farmers to apply for loans for the improvement of their holdings. One farmer applied for a loan of £600 or £700.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member was not entitled to refer to the question of loans in Ireland on this Vote. It was not in any way germane to the subject before the Committee.

MR. P. J. POWER said, he of course submitted to the ruling of the Chairman. He was pointing out that one of the exceptional advantages referred to by the right hon. Gentleman as existing for the Irish people had no existence at all. If they were not to have legislation on this subject for some years, this question had to be answered. Was this great injustice towards Ireland to continue in the meantime? In his opinion, nothing could be easier than for the Government to fall in with the unanimous feeling which had been expressed in the Committee, and to promise to bring in a Supplementary Vote which would remove the injustice complained of. He did not suppose there was any necessity to bring in a Bill to deal with the subject; and the course he had suggested would remove from the minds of the people of Ireland the opinion that they were suffering in this matter, as in many others, a great injustice. At any rate, he thought that the Government, bearing in mind the view that had been expressed by Members in all quarters of the House, should, as had been suggested by the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson), postpone their decision until they had consulted with the Prime Minister and others whom they might find it necessary to consult, especially as that reasonable proposition had been put forward by one of their staunch supporters.

MR. VILLIERS STUART said, it seemed to him that Irish Members could not consistently allow this Vote to pass without a distinct and definite assurance on the part of the Government that the injustice which admittedly existed in this case should be remedied as far as possible without delay. If a division were taken he should have no other course open to him than to add his protest against the continuance of this inequality as between the three countries, by going into the Lobby against the Vote now under consideration. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would see their way to give the desired assurance; and this was emphatically one of those cases in which "where there's a will there's a way." If the enormous sum of £11,000,000 could be granted so easily by Parliament for warlike purposes, surely the very modest sum that would remove the admitted grievance complained of could be provided by means of a Supplementary Estimate. If the Members of Her Majesty's Government then present did not feel justified in giving the assurance asked for without consulting their Colleagues, he hoped they would postpone the Vote. He did not think that details very much signified at the moment; but he might mention that a number of the roads in Ireland were made for military purposes. In his own county (Waterford) there was a military road which ran from one end of it to the other, and the ratepayers had to contribute very heavily towards its maintenance. There were several parallel roads by which the local traffic could be carried on; nevertheless they had to pay for the maintenance of the military road referred to; and if the aggregate sum contributed since its first construction towards that road by the poorer classes in the county were ascertained it would be found to amount to an enormous sum. Looking at all the circumstances, he said that an injustice had been shown to exist, and that it ought to be removed.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the position in which the Committee stood at that moment recalled the story of the farmer who was drinking at the house of his landlord some splendid wine; on being asked his opinion of it, he said—"It's very good, but we seem to go no for'arder." If the right hon. Gentleman would postpone the Vote until the Prime Minister had been consulted, he would save the Committee a great deal of time. It seemed to him that Irish Members must continue to press the Government until they forced upon them their conviction in this matter. Exactly the same arguments, the same prospects, and the same hopes were before them as had been put forward on previous occasions by Her Majesty's Government in replying to the just and reasonable representations of hon. Members on those Benches with respect to the great and unjust inequalities existing as between Ireland and the other portions of the Kingdom in the matter of those grants in aid of the maintenance of roads. They were too familiarized with the way in which those who represented Her Majesty's Government at that moment on the Treasury Bench had dealt with this question to attach any weight to the old arguments they had re-introduced into the discussion of this question; and therefore he suggested that they "got no for'arder." He was glad to see on the Treasury Bench an hon. Gentleman who probably was as well acquainted with this question as any Member of that House, and on that occasion he should endeavour to take the hon. Gentleman along with him while he went over the well-marked track of his previous speeches on this question. When his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) got up and raised this question, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) said, in the course of his remarks, which referred to the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister on the subject of grants in aid of the cost and maintenance of public roads in Ireland, that the right hon. Gentleman had not undertaken to deal with that point singly, but that the right hon. Gentleman had stated that this question would have to be considered in connection with the larger questions of local government and local taxation—that, in other words, while the Prime Minister admitted the injustice of the particular grievance, he was obliged to postpone the remedy that ought to be applied to that injustice until the larger and more general question had been dealt with by Parliament. Now, he did not know whether the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury really thought hon. Members from Ireland on those Benches so ingenuous that they would take that statement of his as a sufficient answer to the complaint they had put forward with regard to this long-standing injustice on the present occasion; because if that were the view of the hon. Gentleman, and if it were correct, hon. Members on those Benches would not only be committing the original sin of helpless Parliamentary imbecility, but they would have proved themselves to be utterly unteachable by all the lessons that had been placed before them, and by the abundant debates which had already taken place on this subject. He would take up the debate of 1883 on the question—it might be called one of the milestones along the road traversed by the hon. Gentleman—and he found that in the course of that debate the right hon. Gentleman now the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) said that he thought the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) was by no means alone in this matter; and in answer to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton and the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) he said that he could only assure the Committee that the arrangement now existing must be looked upon as being in one sense of a temporary character. How often had they listened to that explanation of the injustice complained of from hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench? The arrangement was of a temporary character in 1883; it was so in 1884; they were told that it was of a temporary character now in 1885; and if they lived long enough and were Members of Parliament in 1895, they would, if the Government were allowed to deal with the matter as they had done hitherto year after year, find that it was a temporary grant then. So much as to the question of its being a temporary grant. Then he looked to the debate that took place upon the grants in aid on the 5th of June, 1885. His hon.

Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) had raised the question some time before; and on the occasion referred to, in answer to that, the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), then Secretary to the Treasury, said that the arrangement "was a temporary one." Again it was called a temporary scheme; but there was no sign whatever that he could discover of its ceasing to be practically a permanent arrangement. Thus, in spite of this being a temporary arrangement, the disappointment of the Irish people was to continue; and while the money voted by Parliament for the grant in aid of the maintenance of roads was to go to England and Scotland year after year, Ireland was not to get any portion of it. Then he came to the second argument, that the settlement of this question and the removal of this injustice was to be part of a larger scheme; and in entering upon the consideration of that argument he would venture to remark that it was just as truthful as the argument drawn from the "temporary character of the grant." The right hon. Gentleman said the subject was one that must be dealt with when the subject of local taxation was examined. He hoped that the matter would come before the House at an early period; and whenever the question was considered it must be dealt with as one of local finance, and as one affecting the relations between the Imperial and local funds. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) and the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) were simple enough to take these words as meaning something, and as foreshadowing legislation promptly to be introduced for dealing with the question. The hon. Member for Bradford said he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had informed the Committee that the Vote was only temporary, and that its removal from the Estimates was only awaiting the settlement of the larger question of local government and local finance. That was in the month of May, 1883. The statement was made at a time when the Government had before them two or three years of Parliamentary life or Ministerial existence. That promise of dealing with the whole question of local government and local taxation had never been carried out up to the present moment, although, as he had shown, it was made at a time when it would have been easier of accomplishment by the Government; and now Irish Members were asked again to be satisfied with the same assurance, when the existence of the present Parliament would come to an end within three or four months. He said—and he was convinced his observations would be confirmed by hon. Members—that there never was a more absurd appeal than that made to any body of men. He passed on to the 5th of June, 1884, on which date their venerable friend the Local Government and Taxation Bill reappeared. The Secretary to the Treasury then said that the Government would have to settle this question of local government and taxation. Here, again, they had the same promise, which had been given over and over again, that this matter would be dealt with in a larger scheme. Let the Committee consider the question as to whether the Government ought to put forward this same argument now, and whether hon. Members could receive it seriously—if the Government making this promise in 1883 were unable to give effect to it; if the Government repeating that promise in June, 1884, with respect to a Local Government Bill were unable to carry out that promise, under what pretext could they expect to redeem it now? He did not wish to say anything disrespectful of the present Parliament; but if he were called upon to describe it, he should say that it had about it the close and disturbing fumes of approaching dissolution. The right hon. Gentleman must know that it had all the characteristics of dissolution about it—if one only listened, he could hear the death rattle in it. In the face of that Irish Members were told that they were to expect the question to be dealt with in a large and comprehensive scheme of local government and local taxation. Why, he said, it was trifling with hon. Members to postpone the settlement of the question until the time of the promised measure should come before the House; and, therefore, he pressed this question who he hoped would be able to pass until the Government made a more serious attempt as they had

Treasury Bench was by no means of a satisfactory character. It was true that the Secretary to the Treasury said that those Votes would probably be discontinued altogether. But that argument was a very old one, as he had shown, and it had been put forward over and over again. Hon. Members for Ireland saw no chance of those Votes being discontinued; and he was convinced that if he were returned as a Member of the next Parliament he should find that four or five years hence they would have exactly the same state of things to deal with. Therefore, in view of the future, he should urge his hon. Friends to do all that lay in their power on that occasion towards putting an end to a long-standing grievance by continuing to press this question upon the Government.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE said, he wished to endorse what had been said by hon. Members opposite and in other quarters of the House with reference to this Vote. It was, in his opinion, simply a monstrous injustice that England and Scotland should receive large sums from the Imperial Exchequer toward the cost and maintenance of roads, while the Irish people were left to bear the whole cost themselves. He was glad to be present on that occasion to vote against this grant.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, in the discussion of this question Irish Members were in the peculiar position of having an admitted grievance. He remarked upon that circumstance, because it was a very unusual thing for hon. Members on those Benches to put forward a grievance on behalf of the people of Ireland which received any real attention at the hands of Her Majesty's Government. But here was a case the justice of which was admitted years ago. Notwithstanding that admission, the grievance from which the people of Ireland were suffering had been allowed to exist and to continue year after year. He thought that hon. Members on those Benches had reason to congratulate themselves that this complaint of theirs was not, as was most frequently the case, called by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench a sentimental grievance. They were often charged with placing great weight from time to time on what Her Majesty's Government were pleased to style their "sentimental grievances." The present complaint had certainly nothing of that character about it; it was, indeed, a very practical grievance, affecting the pockets of the Irish people, and one which largely rested on the promises given on many occasions by Her Majesty's Government. Now, the question raised upon this Vote in aid of the maintenance of disturnpiked roads in Scotland involved the question also of the undue taxation of the Irish people to the amount of £40,000 per annum. Now, that amount was probably looked upon by the two countries—England and Ireland—in different lights—that was to say, in the estimation of the British Government and people the sum of £40,000 per annum was a very small matter; but in the estimation of the Irish people it was a very considerable matter. The reason of that was that the people of Ireland were a poor people as compared with the English people; and, moreover, they had been long suffering from the burden of an undue and unfair amount of Imperial taxation, besides the inequality which his hon. Friends were now urging upon Her Majesty's Government. When from time to time hon. Members on those Benches claimed any relief on that score in the House of Commons; whenever they made a claim for any grant for useful purposes in Ireland, they were met by the arguments that had been referred to, and were, moreover, told that they were once again wanting to dip their hands into the pocket of the British taxpayer. Irish Members, however, took an opposite view of the matter; they contended, on the contrary, that in financial affairs as between the two countries the British taxpayer had very much the best of it, and that this British taxpayer, with all his great professions and allegations of generosity towards Ireland, had his hands constantly in the pockets of the Irish people, and filched therefrom a considerable amount of undue taxation. He and his hon. Friends challenged discussion and investigation into the facts of the case. They had done so for years; and it was well known that whenever inquiry had been instituted into the circumstances the truth of their allegations had been abundantly established. He would remind the Committee that it was distinctly set forth in the Report of a

Select Committee of that House that the taxation of Ireland was out of all proportion to the Revenues of the country. Moreover, it had been stated on high financial authority, and it had been adopted in the Report of the Select Committee to which he referred, that in the matter of Imperial taxation England was at once the lightest and the heaviest taxed country in the world—it was the heaviest in respect of the gross amount raised from the people, and it was the lightest in respect of the ability of the people to bear that taxation. But the case was entirely different as regarded Ireland. Notwithstanding that Ireland was oppressed and unduly taxed, she paid a larger proportion out of the Revenues of the country than was paid by the English people. That fact had been established, and the matter was beyond all dispute. Nothing could be more unfair—he might say nothing could be more disgraceful—than for an admittedly wealthy country like England, along with all the other grievances and oppressions which she inflicted on the Irish people, to wrong her in a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence. What could be more unfair, on the face of the matter, than that the Irish people should be denied the same amount of relief of local taxation which was accorded to England and Scotland, and, moreover, that the Irish people should have to pay a share of the relief of local taxation accorded to England and Scotland? They were put off with the allegation that some reform of the whole question of local government was intended. It was said it was just as well they should wait until they saw what reform was effected. But it must be borne in mind that years were rolling on, and that in the meantime the Irish people were paying £40,000 per annum in excess of right and justice; and that, looking to the pressure of important questions of home and foreign politics, there was no guarantee whatever that the promised relief in this matter was at all near at hand, at all within measurable distance. The present Parliament and the next Parliament were likely to have their hands very full; and it was doubted very much whether they would concern themselves with questions which most intimately affected the fortunes and the interests of the Irish people. The Irish Members would be very glad if

Parliament would so concern themselves; but at all events they had a claim, and a very strong claim, for immediate redress and reform in this particular matter. He thought it was neither fair, nor generous, nor just on the part of the Government that the present system—which amounted to nothing less than robbery of the Irish people—should be allowed to go on year after year, and that the Representatives of Ireland should be put off with such flimsy pretences as had been adduced by the Government that evening. The Irish people had a claim not merely to relief in the future, but, if they pressed the thing to the utmost, they had a claim for the re-imbursement to them of the large amount that had been unfairly abstracted from them under this particular head for years past. The fact was undenied, the grievance was admitted, the wrong was patent; it was a practical matter, a pressing matter, a matter of £40,000 per annum to the poor people of Ireland. That unjust abstraction of £40,000 a-year had been going on for many years; but, instead of making a claim that all the money wrongfully withheld from their people should be refunded, the Irish Members merely asked that they should from the present get the relief to which they were justly entitled. They certainly could not assent to the passing of this Vote. They were bound to oppose it and divide against it. Of course, they would be defeated in the Lobby; but he asked the Government if truth, right, and justice were not to prevail? Had they no consideration for the facts and the truth of the case, irrespective of their majority in the House of Commons? Did a majority make right wrong, or wrong right? Did the majority which the Government could command in the Lobby change the aspect of the question by one iota? Did it justify them in placing this admittedly unfair impost on the Irish people? He maintained it did not—the fact that he and his hon. Friends would be outnumbered in the division did not affect the principle involved. If right hon. Gentlemen opposite who represented the Government wanted to figure before the three countries as honourable men, as reasonable men, as upright men, they should, instead of putting the Irish Members off with empty phrases and worthless promises in a matter of this kind, agree to let right and justice be done. They should act upon that principle, which was the best, and in the end the cheapest, whether they were dealing with an Irish or any other question.

MR. BIGGAR said, that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) knew very well that he (Mr. Biggar) would not advocate any expenditure of public money unless he thought it necessary. He approved of the relief in question being given to Ireland; but the very next Vote he should feel it his duty to oppose, for the simple reason that the money was absolutely thrown away. In his opinion, the Executive Government very often assented to money being given for unworthy objects, while they refused grants for purposes of a beneficial character. Earlier in the debate it was stated that part of this Scotch Vote went to places where no turnpikes had existed. When the Turnpike Votes were first granted, the theory was that they amounted to compensation for what might be called vested interests—compensation to those people who in times past had kept up the roads. It was particularly hard upon the Irish people that they should get no part of the public money, because they had not only made the main road through the different counties, but supported them out of the public rates. It had been pointed out that the turnpikes in Ireland were abolished 30 years ago. If that was so, the local ratepayers had been keeping the roads in order during the whole of that time. In some counties where turnpikes did not exist the roads were made, in the first instance, by the ratepayers, and afterwards maintained by them. For those reasons he thought the Government ought to give way upon this question, and thus do justice. If the Government would take the advice of the Irish Members with regard to the grants of public money made with the intention of being expended in Ireland, they could effect a very much greater saving than £40,000, which was all he and his hon. Friends asked. All they asked was that simple justice should be done to Ireland with regard to the question of local taxation. They need not go into the question of general taxation, though, of course, if they did, the Irish Members would be quite prepared to defend their position, and to show that instead of paying too little to the Revenue of the country Ireland paid more than its share. That, however, was beside the question of subventions in mitigation of local rates. The House had decided, over and over again, that assistance should be given to local rates in respect of disturnpiked roads in Scotland and England. All that was now asked was that the same assistance should be given in Ireland. The proposition made by his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), that the Government should undertake to bring in a Supplementary Estimate which would enable them to give to Ireland in the future the same relief given to England and Scotland, was a very reasonable and fair proposition, and one against which no valid argument had been advanced.

MR. HIBBERT said, that if the three countries stood upon an equality in point of taxation he should have thought that the Irish Members had shown a fair grievance. But the three countries did not stand upon an equality. Ireland was not taxed to the same extent as England or Scotland. ["There is only the Carriage Tax!" and "Put them on!"] Hon. Members demurred to that statement; but, at the same time, the fact remained that Ireland was not taxed in the same way as England or Scotland. That created the difficulty there was in dealing with this question. In the first place, the House Tax did not apply to Ireland. It might be said that if it were applied to Ireland it would not produce a very large amount. They were 'all sorry that the generality of tenements in Ireland were of such a character that the House Tax would not yield much revenue. Then there was the Carriage Tax, and the other taxes imposed upon what were called luxuries, which did not apply to Ireland—there was no tax upon the employment of male servants, or upon other luxuries of that kind. When the question of those grants in aid of disturnpiked roads was before the House, there was a proposal made by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Carriage Tax in England and Scotland should be increased in amount, and the reason of that proposal was that the Exchequer should be able to recoup itself. That increased tax would not have applied to Ireland. There were several other taxes not of so large an amount which did not apply to Ireland. He believed the Income Tax under Schedule A was not levied at so high a rate in Ireland as in England. On those grounds he thought he was fairly justified in saying that the three countries did not stand upon an equality. He was quite prepared to admit that if they had stood upon an equality hon. Gentlemen from Ireland would have been perfectly justified in saying Ireland had not been fairly treated as compared with England and Scotland. The Prime Minister had said that before they could deal with this matter they must consider the whole question of local taxation as affecting England, Ireland, and Scotland. He, therefore, did not think hon. Members were justified in saying that what the Prime Minister stated really amounted to nothing. He (Mr. Hibbert) believed that when the whole question was considered justice would be done to Ireland as well as to other parts of the United Kingdom. He, therefore, appealed to hon. Members from Ireland to allow this Vote to pass, and to trust to the representations which would be made to the Prime Minister by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan), and by himself (Mr. Hibbert), and other hon. Members who had been present during the debate, as to what had occurred. The Government had a duty to do to England and Scotland, and, at the same time, they were desirous of doing justice to Ireland.

MR. HEALY said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hibbert) had used very admirable arguments, from his point of view, for getting the Vote passed. But those arguments did not influence the Irish Members in the least. The hon. Gentleman had taunted the Irish people upon the fact that they did not want body servants. Who wanted body servants? The Government might tax body servants as much as they pleased. None of the Nationalist Members ever had body servants, and none of the people they represented employed body servants. Again, the Government were not sparing the peasant class in Ireland if they did not put on the House Tax. Then, it was said, the Irish people did not pay a tax on carriages. Who kept carriages in Ireland? There were not 99 in 100 people in that country who indulged in a carriage, so that it could not be said that the Government were sparing the people of Ireland because they did not put a tax on carriages. Who thanked the Government? The Government might put a tax of £1,000 a-year on a carriage for aught he cared. It would not affect the mass of the people; it would not affect the vast majority of the people who had to pay for the roads; and therefore such arguments as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hibbert) had advanced were utterly beside the question. The Government might, if they liked, put a tax upon the miserable shanties of Ireland, upon body servants, and upon carriages. Who stopped them doing so? Those were the absurdities to which Members of the House of Commons were treated. These three luxuries, which in no way affected the daily lives of 99-100ths of the people of Ireland, were made an excuse for not giving the people the relief which was given in England and Scotland. Everybody had to pay for the roads; and the fact that that was so, and that people who had carriages got off without paying for them, was used as an excuse why the country should be treated differently to England and Scotland. He really would advise the hon. Gentleman to refrain from indulging in such arguments as he had put forward, unless he wished to figure as an Artemus Ward or a Mark Twain. The contention of the Irish Members was very simple. England was receiving something like £250,000 a-year, and Scotland £30,000 or £40,000 in aid of the roads, while the Irish people were required to support their own roads, and they had not even had the pleasure of deducting half from the landlords, as was the case in respect to the poor's rates. For the last two or three years, he and his hon. Friends had urged on the Government the necessity for redress in this matter; but successive Secretaries to the Treasury, according to their humour, had indulged in the same reasons for not granting it. At the present time the House was voting £11,000,000 for guns and sabres with which to fight Russia; they were spending thousands of pounds upon a railway in the Soudan; but they refused this just claim made on behalf of Ireland. It would be much more to the purpose if, instead of making a railway in the Soudan, the Government were to cut roads in Connaught. If they did that, they would do something to bring the resources of civilization to the door of their own subjects; and that was one of the reasons why he and his hon. Friends objected to bloated Estimates on the one hand, and niggardly payments on the other. He could not understand why the Irish people should not be allowed to enjoy this relief in common with the people of England. Ireland paid the Government between £7,000,000 and £8,000,000 sterling per annum, and yet it was quite impossible to ascertain what it got in return, owing to the absurd way in which the Estimates were prepared. The Government spent their money in presents to the Ameer of Afghanistan, and now they were going to war on account of a miserable dunghill in that country, about which no one cared a pin; but they refused to give Ireland £30,000 or £40,000 a-year, which was required to put it on an equality with England and Scotland. One of the curses of Ireland's dealings with England was that they never could get anybody who was actually responsible for the government of the country. When those Estimates came on the Irish Secretary sloped off, and the Solicitor General for Ireland was not in his place. The men who ought to be responsible for those things were not present. At one time the Irish Members had to meet the Secretary to the Treasury, at another time the Solicitor General for Ireland, at another time the Chief Secretary, at another time the Prime Minister, and at another time the Home Secretary. One set of men dealt with them on one set of affairs, and another set of men on another set of affairs; the Irish Members were shifted from one person to another until they really did not know where they stood. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) suggested earlier in the evening the possibility of meeting this difficulty by the abolition of the Votes for England and Scotland. That was a step which the Irish Members would not view with any satisfaction, because, by taking it, the Government would simply injure the English and Scotch taxpayers without doing the Irish taxpayers any benefit. He and his hon. Friends did not wish to play the part of the dog in the manger; what they preferred to do was to share the Imperial boons with their fellow-subjects in England and Scotland. He hoped the Secretary to the Treasury would see his way to say that this matter would be considered in relation to the contributions of Ireland to the Imperial Exchequer, and to the expenditure which was made in Ireland. If the hon. Gentleman would strike what would really be a Civil Service balance as between England, Scotland, and Ireland, apart from the Military and Constabulary Expenditure, he would find that Ireland was treated most unjustly. Under the circumstances, he trusted the hon. Gentleman would not allow himself to be hampered with the fact that his official superiors were not present in the House. It was quite true that neither the Chancellor of the Exchequer nor the First Lord of the Treasury were present; but, unfortunately, they were never able to get the whole battery of the Treasury Bench present at the same time when Irish questions were under discussion. They withdrew themselves into space, and they only got one person to speak to, and he, however distinguished and intellectual he might be, was always obliged to say—"I must consult my Colleagues." They never got the Cabinet, en bloc, on the Front Ministerial Bench, so as to secure an opinion from them. He would ask the Secretary to the Treasury to press this matter on the Government.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he wished to say a word or two with regard to the question of assessed taxes referred to by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury. It would be a positive ease to Ireland if those assessed taxes were imposed on that country. Those assessed taxes were a twopenny-halfpenny matter in Ireland; but they were invaluable to the Government as an ad captandum argument whenever the question of the relative taxation of the two countries cropped up. They were a very trivial matter indeed, and did not really affect the argument as between the two countries on this question. The wealth of England was 17 times greater than that of Ireland—or was on a recent calculation, and no doubt the disproportion had increased rather than the reverse of late. But instead of England paying 17 parts to one of Imperial taxation it paid only nine parts to one. That was the brief fact of the case, and it was really in no way affected by reference to this small matter of assessed taxes. There were two or three small changes which might be made which would not, however, touch the body of the Irish people, and which would produce a result hardly worth mentioning. He was astonished to see the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury—whose honesty they all recognized, and whose honour and honesty they all believed in—producing, as an argument at the Table of the House of Commons, this reference to these miserable assessed taxes, when the disparity between the taxation of the two countries was so great as it was at present.

MR. BIGGAR said, he should like to say a word or two.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remark to the hon. Gentleman before he begins his speech—for I do not wish to interrupt him if I can help it—that this discussion on the Scotch Vote has now been continued for nearly five hours, and that the hon. Member himself has addressed the Committee no less than six times.

MR. BIGGAR said, that very likely that was the case; but he had been obliged to speak so often because the Government would not listen to reason. If they would not listen to reason it was the duty of hon. Members to try and make them do so. He wished to say a word or two with regard to the argument of the Secretary to the Treasury. He had told them that Ireland was too leniently dealt with.

MR. HIBBERT: No; I said it had not been put on an equality with England.

MR. BIGGAR: Well, had not been put on an equality. Ireland was less taxed in regard to the three particular items pointed out than England was. The three items were the tax on male servants, the tax on carriages, and the tax upon houses. Now, if he might make a suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, before the Budget was introduced, he would recommend that those three taxes should be fully imposed upon Ireland. He (Mr. Biggar) was not arguing that the right hon. Gentleman, if he imposed those three taxes upon Ireland, should be even asked to give the pledge the Irish Members were requesting in regard to the particular Vote they were discussing. The people who would have to pay those taxes were people the majority of the Irish Members did not care about. The majority of the Irish Members spoke on behalf of the great mass of the ratepayers in Ireland, who would not have to pay a single ld. if those three taxes were imposed; so that, in point of fact, the argument of the Government, founded upon those three taxes, was not entitled to the slightest amount of consideration. Then there was another question as to Irish taxation. It was notorious that the principal beverage of the Irish people was whisky and not beer, which was the great drink of the English. It was well known that, according to alcoholic strength, the tax on whisky was much heavier than that on beer, so that the unfortunate people of Ireland had to pay a much larger sum to the country on the alcoholic drinks they used than the English people. The hon. Member's argument, therefore, went for nothing. The Chairman complained that they had spent so much time on this Vote; but whose fault was it? The Front Treasury Bench was to blame for having gone into all sorts of questions which the Irish Members had had no idea of bringing into the consideration of the matter. If the Government had met them fairly, and had said—"You are suffering an injustice, and we will remedy it," there would have been an end to the whole business; but, unfortunately, the Government did not do that. They had instead raised a discussion upon man servants and carriages. With regard to carriages, he had always been of opinion that if a man wanted his business well done it would be very much better to hire a horse and conveyance than keep one of his own. It did not add to his personal dignity so much; but if he wished to travel any distance it was unquestionably better to hire a horse and machine to take him than to use one of his own. This question was not much to the point perhaps but it had been introduced by the Government. He really would impress on the Government the desirability of laying taxes on those three items. They would by that means do away with the cry of future Secretaries to the Treasury when the Irish Votes came on that Ireland was treated with partiality, and would narrow and lessen the amount of labour the hon. Member (Mr. Hibbert) or his successors had to perform.

Mr. T. D. Sullivan

MR. PARNELL said, the Irish Members had occupied a considerable time in the discussion of this question, because it was a question of considerable importance to them, involving, as it did, payments by those they represented amounting to £40,000 or £50,000 in aid of English and Scotch rates, whilst those who paid it had no voice in its disposal. As Ireland was a very poor country, inhabited by very poor people, the Irish Members felt that, in view of the very extraordinary attitude of the Government, they would not have done justice to their constituents, or those they represented here, without dwelling at some considerable length—at, perhaps, unusually great length—on the subject. He did not augur from the statements which had been made either by the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Duchy, or the Secretary to the Treasury, that they were really going to do a just and fair thing in connection with this matter. They had scarcely attempted to dispute the justice of the claim of the Irish Members. They had scarcely attempted—from the Prime Minister, who had appeared to admit even the justice of the claim, to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy—to bring forward any valid argument against the claim of the Irish Members. There were very few two-wheel or four-wheel carriages in Ireland, consequently the Government had never considered it worth their while to put a tax on those articles of luxury. They were perfectly welcome to put a tax on them to-morrow so far as the great majority of the Irish people were concerned. The Government were attempting to put off this question until the whole question of local government came to be dealt with. The Irish Members could not accept that as a satisfactory answer; and they were bound to say that on this occasion they could not describe their action as anything less than an attempt to rob the Irish people out of a large sum of money every year without giving them any equivalent in return. The Government had not sought to defend the attempt. They admitted that things ought to be equal as between the Three Kingdoms. If they admitted that, why did they not make things equal? They said that, at some future time, they would do it when they came to consider the larger questions. But this little question had been looming before the House for many years, and the Irish Members did not know when it would be considered. Meanwhile this injustice and inequality was going on. Already the Kingdoms of England and Scotland had obtained something like £800,000 as Imperial contribution in aid of local rates, whilst Ireland had not obtained a single 1*d*. He should have thought that a Government, such as that of the Prime Minister, when it had been clearly shown that Ireland was suffering an injustice, would have been only too ready to come forward and say that though it might necessitate a re-arrangement of their finances, yet that they would not allow a single moment to pass by before remedying the inequality. The present case was similar to that involved in the Royal Irish Constabulary Redistribution Bill, which had passed through that House and had reached the other House. An admitted inequality and injustice had been exposed, and the Government had not put forward any valid argument—which even they themselves claimed as valid—against the statements of the Irish Members; therefore he said their consciences certainly ought not to be at ease until they had introduced a Supplementary Estimate for the purpose of remedying this gross inequality.

MR. HIBBERT said, he would only say one word in reply to the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and it was that he could not agree with him in his statement that the English and Scotch taxpayers appeared to be robbing the poor of Ireland. He must say that he, for one—and he was sure the feeling was entertained by everyone connected with the Government—had a strong desire, in dealing with this question, to avoid doing any injustice to the Irish people. At the same time, he thought the Irish Members had been right in bringing on that discussion. For his own part, he could only promise that he would lay before the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer the suggestions of the Irish Members as to the taxation in Ireland, and see if any means could be adopted for the purpose of arriving at a proper solution of the question.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he had been anxious to see the debate confined to the subject of the Vote. The Ministry had raised collateral issues; but so had the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar). The question was not so much as to the amount of money raised in Ireland, but the amount spent in it. Ireland sent over a surplus every year which was spent in England, and that was their grievance. It did not matter how much money was raised in a country if that money was spent in it; but the money raised in Ireland was not spent in it, and that was always the case in one country subject to another having the power and arms. The greatest injury which could be done to a country was to tax it heavily, and then spend the money raised in the form of taxation out of it. That was what the Government were doing in Ireland. The hon. Member for Cavan had taken up a weak position. They might tax two-horse carriages in Ireland as much as they liked, and they might put on drays and four-horse conveyances 10 times the amount of tax that was charged in England if they liked; but he was not anxious to see the one-horse conveyances taxed. Those general grievances had not been raised to any extent by him, his great grievance being that Ireland was heavily taxed, and the money raised was spent in England. It became outrageous when England took money from Ireland and spent it on English roads, and made Ireland pay for her own roads herself. He had always looked upon this as a remarkable instance of the general policy of the system of taxation carried on in Ireland. That policy was wrapped up in accounts, but it was easy to discover the plan pursued. Ireland sent over to this country £1,500,000, or £2,000,000 a-year, and that he had proved before now by the Returns he had received. Amounts that were described as having been spent in Ireland were frequently—as in the case of the soldiers—found to be fallacious. When £1,000,000 was put down as being spent by the military, the fact was that the amount distributed was only about £600,000. It was only in rations, &c., that the money was spent, the money for the arms and equipments of the men going to England, where the articles were obtained. There was no doubt about it that the money was sucked out of Ireland and spent in England, and that was a glaring injustice that Her Majesty's Ministers would do well to rectify.

Colonel Nolan

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 78; Noes 26: Majority 52. — (Div. List, No. 125.)

Motion made, and Question proposed.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he wished to address the Committee upon one point in connection with this Vote; and he thought the Committee would be glad to know that the Irish Members, who had been objecting to English and Scotch Votes because sufficient money was not spent in Ireland, now desired to save a certain sum expended in Ireland—namely, the £3,000 spent on the Ulster Canal. Not only did the Irish Members wish to save the Treasury this expenditure, but the £4,000 or £5,000 in addition which would probably be asked for. He had never been able to make out why the Government should incur this expenditure. They not only put the Vote down, but also brought forward a Bill on the subject; and whenever the Bill came on, every Irish Member who knew anything about the matter objected to the expenditure, and told them so—told them that, so far as he could see, it was a useless expenditure, and that the whole thing was a job. The Bill had been put down night after night. He was convinced—he could read it as plainly as he could read anything in the House of Commons—that the Government intended to slip it through some night when the Irish Members were not present. And why they proposed to spend the money was this—The Government issued a Royal Commission some years ago to inquire into the Ulster Canal, which Commission consisted of eight Gentlemen, four Irish Members of Parliament, Lord Mounteagle, and Representatives from the Public Offices. One gentleman was sent to represent the Treasury—an officer who had been engaged in irrigating land in India, and had been connected with hydraulic works in that country. Well, the seven Irish Commissioners sent in a Report, to the effect that the Ulster Canal was useless, that it was a very heavy expense, and that it would be well to sell it, or otherwise get rid of it, to save the amount it was costing. That was the advice of the seven Irishmen. Six were present when the Report was agreed to. The seventh happened to be away; but he (Colonel Nolan) believed he was of the same opinion. He was not, however, so sure of him as he was of the other six. The eighth Commissioner—the officer representing the Treasury—had no local knowledge and no political position, though of high rank in the Army. Well, this gentleman sent in an adverse Report, stating that the Government had spent so much money on the Canal that it would be a pity to let it go to waste. The Government had chosen to take the advice of this gentleman, and had decided not to sell the Canal, but to give it away—to spend £3,000 on it to put it in a state of repair, and then give it away. He (Colonel Nolan) did not think £3,000 would be enough to do what the Government proposed to do, and he was strongly of opinion that £1,000 or £2,000 more would be required. All this outlay would be wasted. The whole of the Commissioners, with the exception of the one he had mentioned, believed that this expenditure would be simply so much money wasted. Every Irishman upon the Commission was against it. The Government, however, had got a fancy into their head, and they sent down a Representative from the Treasury, who took a fancy to expend a sum of money. The Commission came to the conclusion that the inland navigation of Ireland was of very little use; and in a great many cases, such as the Lower Bann and the Shannon, it was positively hurtful. The Commission were very strong about the Lower Bann, and terribly strong about the Shannon, and the majority of the Commissioners thought they would leave it to the Board of Works, believing that there was a strong case for considering drainage in the case of the Shannon, but none at all to any extent for navigation. The Government were spending their money everywhere in keeping up these ridiculous navigation works; but they knew the matter ought to be inquired into, and therefore they appointed this Commission, who went dead against them, and gave them a strong

Report, which would have saved their money. He remembered an observation that was once made by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Joseph Cowen) that the first thing to do with Ireland was to dry it. That, no doubt, was a very useful thing; but here the Government were keeping up this waste of money, and they would not take the advice of Irishmen on the subject. They were still going to have a good many thousands of pounds spent upon this business.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, he had the pleasure and honour of being one of the Royal Commissioners who were appointed to inquire into this question, of which body the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) was also a Member. The Commissioners travelled over a great deal of ground in Ireland in connection with these canals. The Royal Commission reported, in reference to this Canal, that, in their opinion, no public money should be expended upon it; and they recommended that the Canal, and all the property attached to it, should, as soon as possible, be offered for sale to the public, for they could not doubt that if there was a fair prospect of its being profitable, its value would easily be understood and appreciated by the prosperous towns in the North of Ireland, and it would be readily purchased and put into working order, and there need be no hesitation in disposing of it, so that it might be turned to some useful account. That was the Report of the Commissioners. He wished to call attention to one fact—that in the five years up to 1880, the average receipts from the 46 miles of this Canal amounted to only £55 per year, whilst the annual expenditure incurred in keeping the Canal in order, and paying the wages of the lock-keepers, amounted to £1,153, leaving a deficit of £1,098 a-year for keeping up what was admitted, by every Member of the Royal Commission, to be a useless navigation. What happened in 1865? The Canal was lying derelict, and the Board of Works, in order to give it a new trial, did that which produced £55 of tolls per annum. One member of the Board of Works said that after they had spent an extra sum of £22,000 upon it, the traffic remained nil, although the tolls were not more than half those imposed by the Grand Canal and the Royal Canal. Now, he thought the common sense of the Committee, and the intelligence of any man in this House who had any idea of business, would recognize the fact that there never was a grosser case of expending public money in an utterly useless manner; and he would ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) if he had read the Report of the Royal Commission and the evidence upon which that Report was based? He would also ask what was the use of appointing Royal Commissions and sending them to Ireland to report on questions of this kind, if then, after they had gone over the whole ground and sat for weeks and months, and given a Report to that House, not a single one of their recommendations was to be acted upon? He asked the Secretary of the Lagan Navigation, who was one of the witnesses before the Commissioners, whether that navigation would take this Canal, and the Secretary replied—"Not unless the Board of Works expend some £10,000 or £12,000 in putting it into proper order." Well, why should £240,000 of public money be handed over to the Lagan Navigation without 1s. of purchase? He did not object to giving them the Canal; but why should that gift be accompanied by £12,000 more in money? One difficulty of the Ulster Navigation was that the locks upon its Canal were not of the same dimensions or capacity as the other locks upon the Lagan or Tyrone Navigation. He would say, give the Canal over to the Lagan Navigation, and so save the expenditure of £1,100 a-year; but they should not throw away £12,000 besides. They tried the same experiment in 1865, and spent £22,000. He was quite certain that if the Committee considered this question they would reduce this Vote by £3,000. He had no wish that this continued and useless expenditure of £1,200 a-year should go on year after year. The Treasury should offer the Canal for sale. They did so before, as his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Nolan) very well knew; but how did they offer it? They embarrassed it with conditions which nobody would accept. If it was offered for sale to-morrow unconditionally, there would be buyers, and he ventured to say that £10,000 would be given for it for the value of the ground, and the houses, and the other things about it. But it must be offered without the conditions which were imposed before. It should be offered for sale in the open market, and he would venture to say that, if the Lagan Navigation did not buy, private enterprise would step in and give a fair price for it. But nothing could be more insane than to follow up the expenditure already incurred by spending £12,000 more, when all the previous expenditure had hitherto been useless. He should certainly oppose the Vote, as he should also oppose the Bill.

MR. TOTTENHAM said, that he also was a Member of the Royal Commission which had been referred to. He was not aware, until he entered the House, that this matter was going to be under consideration, and he was rather in the dark as to what had occurred, for he had only just come in. But certainly his recollection of the matter agreed entirely with that of the two hon. Members who had last spoken. The Commissioners were quite unanimous as to the entire uselessness of the Canal, and they reported accordingly that it should be given up. He could not for the life of him understand what the £12,000 was now going to be spent upon the Canal for. He should be glad to hear what the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had to say—perhaps there was some argument to use which he (Mr. Tottenham) had not yet heard—but if that were not the case, he should certainly support the reduction of the Vote, if for no other reason that this—that he could not see what was the object of getting a Royal Commission to investigate the question of this Canal, and to devote a great deal of time and attention to the matter, if all their efforts and recommendations were to be so utterly and entirely disregarded in the end.

MR. BIGGAR said, the Committee had now been addressed by three Members of the Royal Commission, who spoke of proceedings not at a very remote date, for it was only some four years since the Commissioners started on their labours. In point of fact, it was only about two years ago that they reported in the most direct form against this proposition; and not only was that the case, but if this grant were made, and the Bill connected with it were passed, the result would be that it would be perfectly impossible to lower Lough Neagh to such a depth as would be required. The whole thing would be a most egregious blunder. The Canal had cost £130,000 of public money already, and what happened was this—that the parties who borrowed the money did not give any reasonable or personal security. If they asked Mr. Robinson, one of the Directors of the Company, to give a special guarantee for the payment of the money, they would precious soon find that no money would be taken. This Canal, in times past, had been able to do very little work, and yet it was a Canal on the security of which they proposed to lend a sum of £10,000; and not only that, but the Ulster Railway was in competition with it; and, in addition to that, there was a Bill in Parliament this very Session, promoted by the Great Northern Railway, by which they hoped to be able to put themselves in communication with this district, and to take coals and heavy goods at a substantially less rate than they were ever able to do before, for, formerly, they carried their goods from the quays to the goods station; whereas now, if this Bill passed, their trucks would go alongside the vessels, and the result would be that they would be able to make the position of the Ulster Canal much more untenable than it was at present. There was another canal in the neighbourhood which only paid 1½ per cent dividend to its shareholders, and that not upon the original expenditure upon the undertaking, but upon the remarkably small sum which the canal cost its present owners. What really would happen if they gave this £10,000 now was this—that the money would be spent, and then the people would go to the Secretary to the Treasury, and they would intrigue, and they would lie, and they would get a further credit from a future Parliament upon the pretence of this want of communication in the North of Ireland; while all the time they would take very good care not to work the Canal at all, and would simply pocket the money.

MR. COURTNEY said, he thought he might, perhaps, be allowed to offer an observation or two upon this unfortunate Canal, the misfortunes of which would not surprise anybody who had been connected with the Treasury. But he did not recognize, in the statements that had just been made, any absolutely complete account of the facts of the Canal. It was perfectly true that the Commissioners recommended that this Canal should be sold; but their first recommendation was that it should be sold as a canal; and even as to that there was a dissentient member of the Commission—a gentleman named Dickins.

COLONEL NOLAN: Yes; not an Irishman, but representing the Treasury.

MR. COURTNEY: He might not have been an Irishman, but he was not officially connected with the Treasury, and he was in favour of the Canal being kept up. There had of late years been a considerable modification of the opinion which prevailed a few years ago in reference to canals. At one time there was a movement in favour of their absorption by railways; but now they were looked upon as good checks upon railways. The first recommendation was that the Canal should be sold as a canal. He was aware that a proposition had also been made to break up the Canal; and as to that, there was a considerable objection made to it by hon. Members from Ireland when it was proposed. [Colonel NOLAN: A very small body of them.] The Colleague of the hon. and gallant Member himself raised an objection, and other hon. Members did so also. As to selling the undertaking as a canal, that was what the Treasury attempted to do; but they discovered that they could not find a purchaser—nobody would make an offer. Then came the consideration, should they make any other efforts to release themselves from the Canal; and the Lagan Company offered to buy it, if a certain sum were spent to put it into a condition for use, which sum they agreed to pay by annual instalments. This sum, therefore, was not a gift—it was a sum to be repaid by the Lagan Company; and it was, after all, a good bargain for the Treasury, for the money would be repaid by annuity, and the Treasury, would be relieved from all further responsibility. As to the security of the Lagan Company, it was a Company which realized a dividend. [An hon. MEMBER: Yes, of 1½ per cent.] He thought it was 2 per cent; but, at all events, it was sufficient.

Their surplus was quite sufficient to repay the annuity which they would have to repay, so that the arrangement under the Bill, which would have become law had it not been for the opposition of Irish Members opposite, would have been this—that the Treasury would have been relieved from the expense of £1,100 a-year; and though they would have incurred a fresh outlay to put the Canal in order, that amount would have been repaid. From the point of view of Irishmen, the Canal would have been kept in working order as a check upon the competition of the railways. They all knew the sort of complaints of which so much had been heard of late on the subject of railway rates; and it was no small gain to a country, if they could get an independent Company to keep a canal in working order, and operating as a check upon the railways. From the point of view of the present Committee, the agreement entered into with the Lagan Company was economical, and would have been adopted but for the opposition he had described; and in that way the Treasury and Parliament would have been relieved from an annual charge, and the repayment of the money advanced would have been secured. He had not heard anything to-night, nor did he hear anything last year, which really suggested a well-founded doubt about the matter.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Courtney) had stated that the hon. Gentlemen who preceded him (Colonel Nolan, Mr. T. A. Dickson, and Mr. Tottenham) had given a very incomplete account of the proceedings in regard to this matter—that they had left out some items in the Estimates which ought to be taken into consideration. But the hon. Gentleman had himself given a very incomplete account of the scheme which was proposed. One part of the business was that there was an annual sum of over £1,000 in connection with this Canal taken under an Act of Parliament, and it would require another Act of Parliament to alter the present arrangement. The Ulster Canal was perfectly worthless as a going concern. It involved a dead loss every year, as had already been pointed out. The Treasury wished to get rid of that annual charge of over £1,000, and they proposed to sell this Canal to the Lagan Navigation Company. But there would be absolutely no security at all for the £12,000 which, in that event, would have to be expended to enable the Lagan Navigation Company to make the Canal a paying concern; and in the very Bill which the Government last year introduced to sanction the proposed arrangement there was a provision that, in case the £12,000, or any part of it, was not enough, the Treasury should again assume the position of mortgagees of the Canal; and, therefore, they had no security at all, except the security of the Canal itself, that the Lagan Navigation Company would ever repay the sum for which they became indebted to the Government. He maintained that that was a most ridiculous arrangement. They would get rid of a charge of over £1,100 a-year on the Estimates; but, in order to do that, they would have to undertake to make an outlay of £12,000. They affected to consider that they would have a security for that sum in the Lagan Navigation Company, which undertook to take the Canal over; but the only security was this—that when they had paid £12,000, they would have the Canal itself in case the mortgagors failed to discharge their liability. They would be in a worse position than before, because they would have expended £12,000 which there was no necessity for expending at all. Since he had had the honour of a seat in Parliament, he had raised his voice every year against the system of these navigation arrangements in Ireland. Hon. Members might not understand that there was, from Coleraine in the North of Ireland, down to Limerick in the South, a system of water communication; but, as a matter of fact, it was only nominal, not real. It was supposed to connect the North with the South by means of Lough Neagh and certain other loughs and canals; but, as a matter of fact, one canal in that chain was altogether non-existent. One of the so-called canals was not a canal at all—he doubted very much whether there was any water in it, but certainly there was no boat at all upon it. There was no system of navigation along that line at all, and the Ulster Canal did not connect them. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Courtney) said that the first proposal was that the Canal should be sold as a canal. Now, in page 14 of the Report of the Commission the hon. Gentleman would find it set forth that in 1861, long before the appointment of the Commission, Sir John Macneil reported that the only plan he could suggest by which any return could be made for the undertaking was to take up the lock-gates and drain the Canal, and convert its bed and slopes into grasslands which could be let for grazing. That was after the Treasury had spent no less than £147,767 of public money on the Canal, with the result that the annual income was £55, and the annual expenditure somewhere about 30 times as much, the Government having to make up the difference. The Commissioners went on to say that since that Report of Sir John Macneil, £22,000 of public money, in addition to the annual expenses, had been expended with no substantial result in increasing the traffic. They further pointed out that for the purposes of the navigation the water had not been shut off, nor had the drainage area of the country been interfered with, and that it was now worked at an annual loss of £1,098 for want of traffic. The Commissioners added that they did not think there was a probability of the Canal being profitably used within such a time as would justify any immediate outlay of public money for the purpose of putting it into order. Now, in the face of that Report, the Treasury were prepared to fritter away a further sum of money. The Commissioners said—

“Nor do we think there should be any further outlay made. In our opinion no more public money should be expended upon it. We recommend that the Canal, with all the property attached to it, should be as soon as possible offered for sale to the public, for we cannot doubt that if there is really a reasonable prospect of its becoming a profitable enterprise as a water communication, its value as such will be understood and appreciated in the prosperous and wealthy towns of the North, and it would be purchased and put into proper working order.”

But it should be borne in mind that that was not a recommendation of its prosperity. The Commissioners merely said, in effect—“We do not believe it is worth anything as a canal; but, if not, those who understand it may take it up.” In any case they recommended that no further public money should be spent upon it. This was all the Irish Members had contended for; and, moreover, it should be remembered by the Government that, in this instance, they had the Irish Members asking them not to expend public money in Ireland. Of course, there was a reason for this, and here the reason was that instead of the expenditure being a useful one that would do good to Ireland, it was one that produced no advantage, and really did injury to the country by unnecessarily absorbing in one direction money that would be far better applied in other ways. In this way it was an injury to the community at large. The Irish Members wished to save the pockets of the people, and did not want to take money from the Treasury which they well knew had to be subscribed to by their own countrymen. To spend money in that wanton and reckless manner was, in their opinion, nothing but mere jobbery. The Treasury officials might not be aware of this; but, whether they were aware of it or not, it was so, and those who were committing the Treasury to this expenditure knew that the only advantage to be gained by carrying out the proposal was a present advantage to certain individuals, and that it would be of no good to the country or to the people of Ireland, or to the district in which the money was to be expended; while, in the end, the mortgagees might throw the property on the hands of the Government, as the security was a mere nominal one, and was in reality worthless, and would prove a dead loss to them as it had proved for the last 50 or 60 years. As had been persistently urged upon them for a long time, the best thing the Government could do would be to sell the property for whatever it would fetch. He would strongly urge on the Government that they should simply surrender the Canal to anyone who would buy it, and upon any terms they could get; for so long as they held it, it could be nothing but a loss, as they would have to spend more and more upon it without obtaining any return for the outlay. They had already wasted more than £150,000 upon it together with the interest on that sum, and had done no good, but, on the contrary, had done a great deal of harm to the country. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert), if he had not fully examined the Report of the Commission and did not know the circumstances of the country, would pause before committing the House to a scheme involving so utter a waste of public money and so utter a defiance of the opinions entertained by the Irish people.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had asked what was the recommendation of the Royal Commission on this subject. The fact was that the Royal Commission had made two recommendations. Their first recommendation was that the Ulster Canal should be offered for sale as a going concern—namely, as a canal. The Treasury had adopted this recommendation, and offered the Canal for sale on the stipulated condition; but they could not find a buyer. The second recommendation of the Commission was that it should be offered for sale without any stipulation, and in that case there need be no hesitation in disposing of all the works and land and buildings, so that the undertaking might be converted into some useful purpose. Well, he wished to know why had not the Treasury acted upon the Commissioners' second recommendation, and offered the Canal for sale without imposing any stipulations that might have the effect of preventing anyone from purchasing it? They had, however, done nothing of the kind. With regard to the question of railway competition to which the hon. Member for Liskeard had referred, he would place before the Committee one fact which was put before the Commission in the evidence they had taken on this question. He (Mr. T. A. Dickson) had asked one of the witnesses what was the charge for the conveyance of coal from Belfast to Monaghan by the Canal, and the answer given by the witness was 6s. 6d. He then asked—"What is the rate by rail?" and the answer was "4s. 6d." Now, he would put it to the Committee, was there not in this one answer sufficient evidence to show that the Canal never could be made a paying concern? Was it not evident from this state of things that it would be utterly useless to expect that, with a railway running alongside it, the Ulster Canal would ever be made to pay? But, as far as he was concerned, he had no desire to see the Canal closed. He would say let the Lagan Navigation Company take it over without any purchase at all, but as a free gift; but he was utterly opposed to its being handed over in this way, and to the proposed Vote of £3,000 being also made. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard had impressed on the Committee the desirability of keeping the Canal upon; but in a clause contained in the Bill which was to be brought under the consideration of the House, it was provided that subject to any undertaking entered into by the Navigation Company, the Company might close the Ulster Canal, and might sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of the land and other property of the Canal. The Bill proposed to confer these powers for the advantage of the Company; why should not the Government exercise those powers now? If the Canal need not be kept open, why not sell it at once without the stipulation requiring it to be kept open? Did the Committee believe for a single moment that if this question were to be referred to the whole of the Irish Members, they would report that the useless expenditure proposed by Her Majesty's Government should be continued. But notwithstanding the recommendation of two Irish Peers—Lord Monck and Lord Monteagle, concurred in by four Irish Members of that House—this suggestion had been entirely put on one side. It would seem as if it were thought that the hon. Member for Liskeard, who had occupied the position of Financial Secretary to the Treasury, and other hon. Gentlemen who were also connected with that Department, knew all about these questions, while the Irish Peers and Irish Members, who had inspected the Canal and walked over the ground and had gone fully into the whole matter, knew nothing about it. He must say that if the recommendation of the Royal Commission were not carried out in regard to the disposal of the Canal, and the proposed expenditure of £12,000 was gone on with, there would be no use in again going through the farce of appointing Royal Commissions to inquire into the mismanagement of Irish affairs.

MR. HIBBERT said, after what had fallen from his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Courtney), who had had a good deal to do with the previous management of this matter, he should have been very much inclined to listen and act according to his views; but the observations that had been made by so many hon. Members representing Irish constituencies made him feel that he ought to take time to consider the position the Government ought to take in reference to this Vote. It seemed to him, however, that there were two sides to the question. If the Government had proposed to do away with the Ulster Canal, as had been suggested during the debate, and to drain the Canal and sell the land through which it ran, they might have been met with the complaint that they were raising another Irish grievance by seeking to deprive the Irish farmers of an alternative route for conveying their goods to market. He must say that this was what would have been his first idea in looking at this question, as he admitted that the Canal was not paying. Well, then came the question, had the Government taken what means they could in order to carry out the proposal that the Canal should be sold? The Committee had already been told that the Government had endeavoured to sell the Canal, but that they were unable to find a purchaser. Then he came to the suggestion that they should get rid of the Canal by giving it away, and not trying to sell it. Several hon. Members had asked, "Why do not you give the Canal away?" The answer to that question was that it appeared that no one would have it. [Mr. BIGGAR: I will take it.] He did not think the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) would have a very good bargain if he were to take it with the view of keeping it up. But, without going further into the matter, it appeared to him that the best thing they could do, under the circumstances, after what had taken place, was to propose that the grant of £3,000 which was then being discussed should not be made, unless the Bill before the House, to which attention had been called, was passed. Before that Bill was proceeded with he would take time to consider the question, and decide whether the Bill should be proceeded with or not. This was as far as he could go on the present occasion. He would undertake to consult with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers) on the question, and he trusted that the Committee would, in the meantime, allow the matter to remain where it was.

COLONEL NOLAN said, his difficulty was as to whether his hon. Friends behind him desired to press the matter to a division, in order to show what the feeling of the Irish Members really was in regard to this particular question. The Committee had had the opinion of the Royal Commission upon it as well as that of hon. Members on that side of the House, and he believed the opinion of those who represented Belfast was the same. If the Treasury persisted in the payment of the £12,000 for the purpose intended, the matter would not end there, because, under the Bill to which reference had been made, it was proposed to give power to the Navigation Company to borrow a further sum of £10,000, which, added to the £12,000, would make a total of £22,000. After the election of the next Parliament there would be an agitation among the farmers in the district for lowering the level of Lough Neagh, and this could not be done without some provision being made for payment of compensation to the Navigation Company. When this was done the position of matters would be simply this—that the Company would have £12,000 of the public money in their pockets; they would have raised another sum of £10,000 under their borrowing powers; they would have the Canal to drain and break up into land, which they might sell for £10,000 or £15,000 more, for it would be worth something like that when capable of being utilized for agricultural purposes; and they would also have a claim upon the Treasury for compensation for the stoppage of the Canal. That was what would be the result of the passing of the intended Bill. The Government clearly had paid very little attention to the second recommendation of the Royal Commission, and he did not know whether they had consulted Lord Monteagle or Lord Monck upon the matter; but he certainly did think they ought to be glad to get out of the matter without having to pay the £12,000. He should feel obliged to his hon. Friends if they would not insist in pressing the question further on that occasion after the promise that had been made on behalf of the Government.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had listened to the discussion that had taken place on this subject with a good deal of interest, and he thought the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had come to a very wise conclusion in promising to take time to consider the position in which he found himself with regard to the matter. It certainly seemed to him that it would be a perfect piece of folly to go and spend the proposed amount on the Ulster Canal at the present moment. He never knew a case in which all the Members for Ireland in all parts of the House were so unanimous. This being so, the Government ought to attach the greatest weight to their views upon the question; and unless he heard very strong reasons why the opinion of the Irish Members should be passed over, he should urge upon them the advisability of giving to that opinion a favourable consideration.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, he only desired to say another word. He was very strongly opposed to this Vote, and he thought the Government ought to withdraw it, and agree to refer the Bill which was to deal with the subject to a Select Committee of the Irish Members for them to send in a Report upon the question. If the Government would promise to do this, the time of the Committee would be saved. There would be no difficulty in the withdrawal of the Vote, and no hardship would be involved in such a procedure, and it would, he thought, be much better to let the question be left, like so many others, for the House to deal with.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he hoped his hon. Friends would not press the matter any further on that occasion, as he thought it would be quite sufficient if he promised, on behalf of the Government, that full consideration should be given to the Bill, and that the money should not be expended unless the Bill was proceeded with.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS thought there could be no objection to the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because the present grant was mixed up with other matters which might make it difficult to withdraw it from the Vote.

MR. BIGGAR asked for some explanation with reference to the Vote for the Lough Erne Canal. He wanted to know what was to be done with the money?

MR. HIBBERT said, that was a matter altogether separate from the grant for the Ulster Canal.

MR. BIGGAR wished to know what the money put down in the Estimate for Lough Erne was to be given for?

MR. HIBBERT said, the Vote was in connection with the drainage of Lough Erne. Last year £3,000 was paid towards that expenditure.

MR. BIGGAR said, the explanation was very satisfactory, and he was not prepared to oppose any Vote of money that was to be given for drainage purposes in Ireland. Another matter he wished to mention was that he had made inquiry of the Great Northern Railway Company as to the different rates charged for the carriage of coal delivered along that line, and he had found that the rates were quite as low at all the non-competing points as they were at the points where the line competed with the Canal; so that, as far as those carriage rates were concerned, there was no benefit derivable from the Canal.

MR. HIBBERT said, he was quite of opinion that, as far as possible, the navigation should be made subservient to drainage.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, if the Government acted on the view just expressed by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert), the Irish Members would have every reason to be satisfied. Their complaint had always been that the rivers provided by Nature had not been allowed by the Government to do the work rivers were intended to do. The business of a river was to carry the surplus water from the land to the sea; but either the Government or private Companies had interfered to prevent this, and had erected all sorts of artificial barriers, so that the rivers could not do their legitimate work, and the water was consequently kept back in many cases until it flooded hundreds and thousands of acres, and inflicted a vast amount of damage and ruin upon the country. He wished for a few minutes to call attention to another matter in connection with this Vote—namely, the sum put down for the purchase of sites and for new works and alterations. The sum for the purchase of sites figured in that Vote at the small amount of £15; but last year it was £520. The sum for new works and alterations was put down at £87,321, which showed an increase of £16,311 on the amount voted under the same head last year. In the Appropriation Account of last year the large sum voted under Sub-head B for new works and alterations included new post offices to be built or premises to be converted, and for this purpose £6,900 was voted, of which only £1,600 was spent, so that over £5,300 had to be returned to the Treasury, the explanation being that sites were not available. Then there was an item for new barracks for the Constabulary in Galway, of which the greater portion was not spent, the explanation in that case also being that no site was available. There were similar items for Constabulary barracks in other places, and the money voted had, in the same way, remained unexpended for the same reason. The Government had obtained money year after year for these purposes, and had not been able to erect the intended buildings, because they could not get land for the sites, in consequence of which the money had had to be returned to the Treasury. They were now asking for money again for the purchase of sites, although the amount was small; and what he wished to suggest was that the Government should not ask for money to purchase sites until they had the sites to purchase. What, he asked, was the use of going on in such a manner? It was, in fact, sheer nonsense to submit to reasonable men such Estimates as these. He would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he understood such a mode of doing business; for he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) confessed that he could not? He had examined the Appropriation Accounts and the Estimates, and he could not find out how it was the Government carried out all the works they proposed. The system adopted required amendment; as it was, a large number of works were put down every year under the head of this Vote, and the money was voted by the House, but not expended, while there were a large number of other works that were never submitted or mentioned, and he supposed the money was expended in that way. On page 69 of the Estimates there was a long detailed account, from which it would be seen that sums varying from £20 to £1,800 had been expended on matters that were never even mentioned in the Estimates, and of which the House of Commons never knew anything. He asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to explain how it was that the Government spent money they never asked for?

MR. HIBBERT said, the sites for which the money was asked in the Vote had already been arranged for. He very much agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) in some of the remarks he had made. When the Estimates were in course of preparation, he had struck out certain amounts that were proposed for new barracks in various places for which the sites had not been already obtained, because he thought the money should not be put down in the Votes if the money was not to be expended.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked if the hon. Gentleman would explain how, if this Vote were passed, it was possible for the Board of Works to expend in the purchase of land so small a sum as £15?

MR. HIBBERT said, that sum was merely wanted for the purpose of compensation, and was not for the purchase of sites.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, he agreed with hon. Members opposite in the hope which they had expressed that Her Majesty's Government would not incur any further expenditure in connection with the Ulster Canal Navigation, seeing that the weirs, locks, headings, and other things which impeded the drainage ought to be swept away. If the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) would read the evidence given before the Royal Commission which sat to inquire into this question by the people of Antrim, he would perceive that they contributed annually a large sum towards the expenses of the Canal—that was to say, that the farmers who lived towards the lower part of the district had to pay from £1,000 to £1,200 per annum as taxation for the purpose of keeping up this perfectly useless navigation. It had been shown that the tolls charged on the Canal did not produce more than an average amount of £50 annually. The £1,100 or £1,200 a-year was a very considerable tax upon the farmers of the district; and especially so, when it was considered that it went for the purpose of keeping up a system of navigation on which there was no traffic. But that was not the sole objection to the Canal. Not only had the farmers to pay the sum mentioned, but they lost several hundred pounds per annum in consequence of the damages sustained from the floods caused by keeping up weirs that ought to be condemned. He thought that a promise that no more money should be spent on the Canal would be satisfactory to the people of the district.

MR. HIBBERT said, he was somewhat surprised that the opposition to the Vote should continue, because he had, on the part of the Treasury, expressed almost the same views with regard to the Ulster Canal Navigation as had been expressed by hon. Gentlemen in the course of this discussion. He had replied to the objections raised by hon. Members for Ireland by saying that the best thing probably that could be done under the circumstances was that the Vote should be allowed to pass, and that the £3,000 now asked for should not be used, unless the Bill already before the House was passed. As he had said, he was prepared to give an undertaking that that Bill would not be proceeded with without very careful consideration.

MR. MOLLOY said, his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had pointed out, with regard to the money voted by Parliament, that if there was any portion of it not applied to the purposes for which it was intended, it should be returned into the Exchequer. There was a question which presented itself to him in connection with this Estimate to which he desired to call the attention of the Committee and the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Estimates. The question he desired to put to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was this—Was it a fact that sites had been obtained for the erection of public buildings on account of which the sums that appeared on this Estimate were asked? If so, he would then ask from what source the money was derived, because, as he had said, he understood from his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) that money not spent on the purchase of sites as intended by Parliament was returned to the Exchequer? If no money had been obtained since the money formerly voted was unavailable, he admitted that he was quite unable to understand how the Board of Works in Ireland could obtain funds for the purchase of sites for the new buildings proposed to be erected. For these reasons he appealed to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury for information with regard to this matter, and he certainly thought that before the Vote was passed by the Committee a clear explanation ought to be forthcoming from the Treasury Bench on the subject of the purchase of sites.

MR. HIBBERT said, with reference to the question of the hon. Member for King's County (Mr. Molloy) as to this item in the Estimate, he regretted that he was not at the moment able to give the cases in which sites had been obtained for new buildings. But he might say with regard to coastguard stations that one or two works were in progress, and that, therefore, sites must have been obtained for those works. With regard to the Royal Irish Constabulary barracks, he was unable to state what works were in progress, and, consequently, what sites had been obtained; but he would make inquiries into the matter, and give the information asked for by the hon. Member for King's County.

COLONEL NOLAN said, there was an item of £1,800 for estimated cost of a new post office at Galway, and he would ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury if he was in a position to give him any information with regard to that proposed new building? He would like to know whether the arrangements for the purchase of a site for the building had been completed, because he was certain that any number of suitable sites could be obtained in Galway? Was any progress being made with the work at Galway? He observed that part of the total estimated sum of £1,800—that was to say, £900—was called a Re-Vote in the Estimate. He would be glad to know if there was to be a new site for the post office?

MR. HIBBERT: Yes, I think so.

MR. MOLLOY said, in page 56 of the Estimates there was an item on which he desired to have some information before the Vote was agreed to. Under the heading "State and Official Residences in Phoenix Park and Dublin Castle," there was a charge to the amount of £5,000 for sanitary improvements. As the Estimate gave no details of the improvements in question, he thought that before the Vote passed out of the hands of the Committee, hon. Members were entitled to receive an explanation from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury with regard to the nature of those sanitary works.

MR. HIBBERT said, that the Vote on which the hon. Member for King's County asked for information related to Dublin Castle and the Viceregal Lodge. It had been found that the whole of the sanitary arrangements there were in a bad state, and it was accordingly thought desirable that they should be placed in a more satisfactory condition. He might mention that the reason why attention had been called to this matter was that the hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Spencer) had suffered from typhoid fever at the Castle. An inquiry had been afterwards made into the state of the buildings, and it was then discovered to be necessary for the health of public servants and others that improved sanitary arrangements should be carried out.

MR. MOLLOY said, there were a number of items in connection with the State and Official Residences and Departments in Dublin to which he felt it his duty to call the attention of the Committee and the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury. He found on page 59 of the Estimates charges amounting to a very large sum—no less than £15,000—on account of maintenance and repairs in the course of the year at the official residence of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, at the Viceregal Lodge and Gardens, and at the Chief Secretary's Lodge and the departments connected with the Office of Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. If so large a sum were proposed to be spent by the Treasury on the maintenance and repair of the official residence of the Prime Minister, or any other official in England, he asked what would be said? The Committee must bear in mind that these charges were for the maintenance and repair of the private residences of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Chief Secretary, as distinguished from their public offices, for which there was a large Vote presently coming forward. They had to deal with the fact that they were now asked for a sum of no less than £14,000 for painting, papering, mending window-sills, and such like matters, at the private residences of the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary.

MR. HIBBERT: I think the hon. Member is taking the total brought forward from the previous page.

MR. MOLLOY said, that was not so. The particular items he was referring to were all stated separately on page 59, and they were as follows:—Dublin Castle] Residences, £5,971; Under Secretary's House, £198; Viceregal Lodge, Gardens, &c., £3,808; Private Secretary's Lodge, £312; Chief Secretary's Lodge, Gardens, &c., £1,607; Under Secretary's Lodge and Demesne, £1,000; Chief Secretary's Office and Branches, £1,174. The total of these sums amounted, as he had already pointed out, to about £15,000, or, to speak with accuracy, £14,070. Now, the sum in question was so very large that he considered the Committee were fairly entitled to ask for some of the details of the maintenance and repairs of the residences of the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He would draw attention particularly to one of the items relating to the Dublin Castle Residences. The Committee would observe under the general head of "Maintenance, Repairs, Fittings, &c., by Servants of the Board of Works," that there was in column E a charge of £39 for materials used by them. Without the attention of the Committee being drawn to the circumstance, he believed hon. Members would hardly imagine the amount of the charge for labour in using up the materials supplied to the servants of the Board of Works. It was no less than £1,080—the cost of the materials, as he had already pointed out, being £39 only. Then, again, if the Committee would refer to the charge on account of the Chief Secretary's Lodge, Gardens, &c., it would be found that the amount of payment for labour was £300, while the charge for the materials used by the servants of the Board of Works was £10 only. Now, without the details, it was impossible for the Committee to see how these large amounts were arrived at; and, in the absence of such details, he was obliged to say that the whole thing had very much the appearance of a job.

MR. SEXTON said, there were a number of questions arising on this Vote in which hon. Gentlemen on those Benches took a strong interest; and at that point of the discussion he thought it might be convenient if he stated what course he and his hon. Friends proposed to take with regard to it. His hon. Friend the Member for Wicklow (Mr. W. J. Corbet) desired to refer to the subject of the harbour at Arklow, and to raise the question as to the manner in which that harbour had been dealt with. The vital question would also be raised as to the way in which the Office of Works in Ireland were in the habit of dealing with the piers and harbours in the country generally. Under the circumstances, therefore, and seeing that the discussion of the points referred to were likely to occupy some time, he would put it to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) to consider whether it would not be convenient to postpone the further discussion of the Vote, and to proceed with Votes No. 21 and 22—that was to say, the Votes for the Royal University, Ireland, Buildings, and the Science and Art Buildings, Dublin. He thought those Votes might be passed, if his suggestion that the present discussion should determine were agreed to.

MR. HIBBERT said, a Report would be laid on the Table of the House with reference to Piers and Harbours, and he thought that discussion of the question had better await the publication of that Report. He did not think the policy of the Board of Works, Ireland, could be discussed on this Vote. He asked that they might be allowed to proceed with the Vote for Public Buildings that evening, and take the discussion on the Arklow Harbour when hon. Members were in possession of the Report he had mentioned.

MR. SEXTON said, he could assure the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury that the suggestion he had made for the postponement of the Vote was for the purpose of meeting the convenience of the Committee; if, however, the Government insisted on the discussion of the Vote continuing, all he could say was that he and his hon. Friends would proceed. The discussion of the question that would be raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Wicklow (Mr. W. J. Corbet) would occupy a considerable portion of time; and if the Government desired to get on with other Business, he thought their general plan would be served by falling in with the suggestion he had thrown out.

Mr. Sexton

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, with regard to the Registration of Voters (Scotland) Bill, it had been expected by hon. Members for Scotland that the Motion for going into Committee on the Bill would come on at a reasonable hour of the evening, and therefore they had not thought it necessary to block the Bill.

MR. HIBBERT said, he should be glad to agree to an arrangement which would be convenient to the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. W. J. Corbet); but he doubted whether it would be right to raise the question of the policy of the Board of Works, Ireland, with respect to fishery piers on this point. There was no money taken for fishery piers in the Estimate.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it would not be in Order to discuss the action of the Board of Works, Ireland, with reference to fishery piers on this Vote. He gave no opinion as to the other point with regard to the harbour at Arklow; but the discussion on fishery piers could not be taken on the Estimate before the Committee.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he would ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury if he would consent to postpone the Vote until after the discussion suggested on the policy of the Board of Works, Ireland, had been taken on the Vote for the Board of Works?

MR. HIBBERT assented.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(3.) £29,000, to complete the sum for Science and Art Buildings, Dublin.

(4.) £23,428, to complete the sum for the Royal University, Ireland, Buildings.

MR. SEXTON said, there was one question that presented itself in connection with this Vote. The sum asked for was for the Royal University Buildings, the foundation stone of which had recently been laid by a distinguished Person. He would point out that the gross Estimate for the buildings had been £74,000, that the gross expenditure, actual and estimated up to the 31st of March last, had been about £42,000, and that the amount of the Vote now asked for was something over £27,000, leaving a further amount of between £4,000 and £5,000 to be voted to complete the work. As this matter had occupied some years, he urged that it should be concluded without delay, and with that view he would suggest that the balance of about £4,000 left over for next year should be added to the current Vote, and that an effort should be made to close the work in the current financial year.

MR. HIBBERT said, it was considered impossible to complete the work this year, and, therefore, the Vote had been proposed as submitted, and could not conveniently be altered.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR rose to Order. It appeared that the question which his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had been discussing was that of the Royal University, Ireland, Buildings; but he was under the impression that, before the Chairman put that Vote, he had read the heading of the Vote for Science and Art Buildings, Dublin.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had put the Vote for Science and Art Buildings, Dublin, first.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that was his impression, whereas the Vote for the Royal University, Ireland, Buildings, came first in order, and the Vote for the Science and Art Buildings, Dublin, afterwards. He had been turning over the pages of the Estimates, and had never contemplated that the Chairman had come to the Royal University Vote.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he was going somewhat on the statement of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), who had suggested to the Secretary to the Treasury that the two next Votes should be taken, and the discussion on the Vote for Public Works and Buildings, Ireland, postponed. Having put the Science and Art Buildings Vote, and seeing no one rise, he had passed it.

Vote agreed to (5.) £16,398, to complete the sum for Lighthouses Abroad.

(6.) £25,103, to complete the sum for Diplomatic and Consular Buildings.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 132.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): In moving that you, Sir, do leave the Chair, I will, as requested by some hon. Members, explain the purposes and objects of the Scottish Registration Bill. I may say that I do not propose to ask that anything more be done than that the Committee be set up to-night, so that there shall be time for the Bill to be circulated in Scotland, and the clauses taken not sooner than next week. In regard to the Bill, I may say that there is one clause in it which has a similar object, and is analogous to a clause in the English and Irish Bills. I mean the 5th clause, which contains a special provision as to voters in 1885, which provides that—

“Any person deemed to be an inhabitant occupier, under section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, shall be registered in like manner as though the Representation of the People Act had been in existence throughout the year 1834, and had been duly carried into effect.”

That clause is framed to meet the possibility of its being held that the service franchise could be defeated by saying that, inasmuch as it was created for the first time by Section 2 of the Act of 1884, there had not been the requisite period of possession. The person entitled to the service franchise is to be deemed to be an inhabitant occupier of such dwelling-house for the creation of the new qualification; and in case it should by any possibility be held that that is a new qualification, this clause has been introduced for the like reason as the corresponding clauses in the English and Irish Bills. With respect to the rest of the Bill, I may say it is directed substantially to obtain an amendment of the Valuation Roll, which, as is well known to the Scotch Members, is the basis of the voters' list, and there are various particulars in which there seems to be room for amendment of that Roll, and obtaining a simpler and speedier method of making out the voters' lists. Under the Valuation Act of 1854, comparatively simple forms of Schedule were provided.

The forms of Schedule there provided, and the enactments regarding them, were repealed by the County Voters' Act of 1861; and somewhat more elaborate forms of Schedule were there provided, containing some things which we regard as unnecessary, and not containing certain things which are now essential to meet the requirements of the existing law. I may mention, for example, that in the form of Schedule provided, the heading "Tenant" was divided into three classes—tenants under 19 years, tenants between 19 and 57, and tenants over 57 years. It appears to us that that was an unnecessary subdivision, and we propose to simplify it by simply making one class of tenant. There was another entry in the Roll which I think, by almost universal consent, is unnecessary. I refer to the head which deals with the matter of feu-duties. Now, feu-duties are no longer a qualification for voting as regards the future. As regards the past, of course, there is already the information contained in the existing Rolls. And the requisite information can now be obtained without encumbering the Roll, which will now be a much longer document than it was formerly, by keeping up that heading; and so we propose no longer to continue it. There are various other matters with regard to which we think that the present Roll has been simplified. We propose by one of the sections here to allow an Order in Council to vary from time to time the forms of the Roll, and to obviate the necessity of any Parliamentary sanction being obtained for that end. That, I think, is common to this Bill with the English and Irish Bills. Then, in regard to Clause 4 of the Bill, I may explain that that has been introduced with the object of providing certain additional means of obtaining the requisite information to those provided by the Act of 1884, which has been represented by many experienced assessors as scarcely applicable, and scarcely so simple as might be desired; and, accordingly, we have provided certain additional means for obtaining that information. As regards Section 6, it has been thought necessary to provide for each dwelling-house having a separate entry, inasmuch as each dwelling-house may be the subject of a separate qualification. It has been thought right that a separate entry of it should be made. No doubt, it may sometimes happen that the whole of a dwelling-house may be occupied by a person not a voter, possibly by a woman, or by a minor; but, still, that is by common consent agreed to be a useful entry, as well for rating as for every other purpose. Then, as regards Section 7, that is directed to provide that, where the parish is divided into, or forms part of, more than one polling district, the register of voters in such parish shall be made up separately for each polling district. In regard to Section 8, I may say that if there had been no question except that of Parliamentary registration, it would probably have been unnecessary; but then, even in the case of burghs which under the Bill now going through Parliament—I mean the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill—may cease to return, or may continue to return, a Member to Parliament, they will continue to have a municipal registrar, and, consequently, it has been thought right to preserve the separate entity of the burgh, rather for municipal than for Parliamentary purposes. In regard to Section 9, that has been directed to providing a simple and cheaper form of advertisement than formerly existed. There was great complaint that the method of advertising was unsatisfactory and very expensive, and, accordingly, Section 9 is directed to a cheaper method of making the requisite publication. Section 10 is quite an executive clause, intended to provide for the appointment of assessors to counties that are divided, and I scarcely think that any explanation is required in regard to it. With regard to Section 11, it is, probably, enough to say that it has been suggested from various parts of the country, and I think with very good reason, that it is better that the assessor should not hold some of the offices which are mentioned in this section. We propose that he should not be employed as a collector of poor rates, or as a factor or labour agent. That will meet with the general sense of the House, I think. With respect to the 12th section, I may simply say that it is directed to provide for the case of police burghs. Under the Valuation Act there were only Parliamentary and Royal burghs provided for; but in many cases, under present law, the police burgh is such an important community that it seems reasonable to provide for a separate valuation of the accounts of property, which have previously been provided for in the case of Royal and Parliamentary burghs. I have gone through all the clauses in a very few words, because I do not propose that they should be considered now; but I think any hon. Members who are familiar with the work of making up the register in Scotland will see that the various provisions here are all directed to simplify and make more effective the provisions of the existing law. I do not say that the Bill is not susceptible of amendment, and between now and the time when we come to consider the clauses hon. Members will have an opportunity of suggesting any Amendments that may occur to them. But what I have said will, I think, make plain the objects with which we have introduced the Bill in its present form.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(The Lord Advocate.)

MR. WARTON said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the particular form of this Bill. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would pardon him (Mr. Warton) for saying so; but he had noticed all through the speech they had just listened to that the word "section" had been used instead of "clause," which it was usual to adopt in connection with Acts of Parliament. He (Mr. Warton) did not know whether, in this matter, there was a difference between Scotch and English law; but, according to ordinary Parliamentary proceeding, it was customary to use the word "clause." So far as the 5th clause was concerned, it seemed to him (Mr. Warton) an extraordinary proposition, that after they had solemnly arranged the date at which the Franchise Bill should come into force as an Act—that it should not come into force until 1st January this year—they should assume, under this clause, that the Franchise Act had been in existence during the whole of 1884. It seemed most absurd that, after all the discussion which had taken place on the subject, and the serious Amendments which had been moved—notably the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Albert Grey)—as to the date at which the Franchise Act should come into operation, they should pass a measure which assumed that it had come into force a year before it did. With regard to the service franchise, in respect of which the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had inserted this 5th clause, he (Mr. Warton) remembered moving an Amendment to the proposal in the Bill to provide that the service franchise was only to come into operation in the event of a contract entered into between the master and servant, and requiring evidence of the contract. This singular and new kind of franchise was very undefined as compared with every other kind. It was difficult to see service in the same way as one could see a house that a man was occupying. He had moved an Amendment so as to secure a starting point in the case of the service franchise; but he had been met by the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. Gladstone), and other right hon. Gentlemen opposite, with the statement that it was not at all necessary. Now, they saw the result of his Amendment being refused. They found that there would be all sorts of doors open to fraud and imposture. Persons would be coming forward on all hands, saying they had been occupying the relative positions of master and servant, and arrangements patched up in a few days for a political purpose would be declared in the coolest manner possible, and would, under this 5th clause, stand as if they had existed during the whole of 1884. This seemed to him a most extraordinary provision, and he was not all sure that the House would consent to it when it came to consider it in Committee. He anticipated that if it were passed it would lead to a wholesale manufacture of service qualifications, and would, consequently, become a prolific producer of fagot votes. He hoped the 5th clause would be rejected. He did not intend to follow the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate through the other clauses of the Bill.

MR. BUCHANAN said, they were all indebted to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate for his clear statement with regard to the provisions of the Bill before them. They were especially indebted to him for making his speech to-night, because they were all anxious that the Bill should be pushed forward with the least possible delay. It seemed, so far as he was able to judge, that it would effect a substantial improvement in the Registration Law of Scotland. They had the advantage at present of a more simple system of registration than either England or Ireland, and the Bill would still further simplify that system. It would have the further advantage of putting the counties more on a level with the boroughs in this respect—that the county assessors would have the obligation laid on them of making up the voters' list more rapidly than they were obliged to do at present. He hoped the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would take care that they should have sufficient time for the due consideration of the clauses. He did not wish, at this moment, to go into the details of the Bill; but seeing that it was only put into their hands this morning, and that those interested in the subject had not had sufficient time to consider it, he would ask the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate to take care that sufficient time was given for the due consideration of the clauses.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he agreed with what had fallen from the last speaker (Mr. Buchanan), that the registration system of Scotland was better than that of England, and much more self-acting. They had not the worry and expense of looking after the registration as in England, where candidates for seats in this House were put to great trouble and expense—in addition to their other numerous troubles and expenses—in looking after the voters on the list. He thought it should be a public burden, and not a burden on the candidates; and he was confident that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would do his best to maintain and improve the good registration which prevailed in Scotland. He (Sir George Campbell) only wished to express a hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would take very great care that, in extending the system to the counties—which would be a delicate and, perhaps, a somewhat difficult task—he did not throw on the candidates similar burdens to those imposed by the English law. His experience in England was that whenever duties of this kind were to be performed, under statutory obligation, by people who held their office for life, they were performed extremely ill, and to that, he believed, was due all the trouble and expense candidates in England were obliged to incur in regard to the registration of voters. His attention had been called to the unsatisfactory way in which jury lists were prepared in England, and he trusted the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would take care to maintain the superior system which existed in Scotland. No doubt it would be difficult to bring the new voters thoroughly and efficiently upon the Roll. His own experience was that in Scotland, under the new system, there was a danger of the compound voting system prevailing in England coming in by superiors undertaking to pay the public rates, and still more would it be so with regard to the service franchise, and he had no doubt great care would require to be taken in that respect. He was sure the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would do his best, and consult the best authorities in Scotland, and give a reasonable interval for the consideration of the clauses.

MR. SEXTON said, he had understood, at Question time to-day, that as soon as Mr. Speaker left the Chair, the Government would agree to report Progress, and would fix some day next week for proceeding with the clauses. He would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate, if he would be kind enough to say, before the Question was put, when he proposed to go on with the clauses?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, it would be either Tuesday or Wednesday; he was not quite sure which. It would probably be Tuesday; but it might be Wednesday. He proposed to put it down for Tuesday.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE trusted the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not take the Committee stage on Tuesday. The Bill came out only last night, and it was quite impossible that the constituents could communicate with Members before that time. He trusted that Wednesday would be the day.

MR. WARTON said, he wished to point out that Report of the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill was down for Tuesday next. If the Registration Bill were put down for the same day, there would be two Bills fixed, each having precedence over all other measures. There would then arise a question as to which could be taken first.

each having precedence over the other. He could not understand, under the circumstances, how the Government could think of putting these two Bills down for the same day. Which Bill would have precedence?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): The Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill.

MR. SEXTON: The Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill was introduced first and obtained its precedence first.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Yes; that is the senior Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

Committee report Progress.

MR. SPEAKER: To sit again—on what day?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Monday next; but not with the intention of proceeding with it on that day. We will announce then when it will be taken.

MR. SEXTON: I object to Monday. The right hon. and learned Gentleman a short time ago distinctly declared that it was proposed to take the Bill on Tuesday.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Monday is fixed, not with the intention of proceeding with the Bill on that day, but of announcing when it will be proceeded with.

MR. SEXTON: Very well; but I cannot help thinking it would be much more satisfactory if original promises were kept.

MR. WARTON said, he thought they were not guarding themselves with sufficient care against possible contingencies. They had already put down the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill for Monday; but they were told that it might not be taken on that day, as they would be engaged then in considering the Vote of Credit. But it was possible that the Vote of Credit might not last long. The policy of the Government in that respect might be considered wise, and the Vote of Credit might not take long to consider. In that case they would have two Bills down, each taking precedence of the other, and in all probability they would get into a mess. They had better not have down for the same day two Bills, each of which was entitled to be taken first on the day it came on.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR said, that if the Bill were put down for Tuesday or Wednesday it would immediately take precedence, and that the Government did not wish at present. If it were put down for Monday, it could be placed for any other day when they saw what arrangements could be made for the Business.

Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

EAST INDIA UNCLAIMED STOCKS BILL.

[BILL 125.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. WARTON: I rise to Order. This is not a Money Bill in the proper sense of the word, and, therefore, is subject to the half-past 12 o'clock Rule. The second reading has been challenged, and I ask your opinion on the point, Mr. Speaker?

MR. SPEAKER: This Bill, under the Standing Order, is the same as an ordinary Money Bill. It is essentially a Money Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

MOTIONS.

SCHOOL BOARD ELECTIONS (VOTING).

ADDITION TO SELECT COMMITTEE.

Select Committee on School Board Elections (Voting) to consist of Twenty-three Members:—Mr. JOHN MORLEY and Mr. GORST added to the Committee.—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. SEXTON: This is a most objectionable and surprising Motion. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of the matter is not here, and he is perfectly aware that the subject is one of contention and of difference of opinion in the House. I respectfully ask the noble Lord whether it is necessary to go on with the matter now?

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: The hon. Member made no objection, otherwise I should not have proposed to go on with the Motion. The Motion is merely a formal one.

MR. DILLWYN said, there was no objection taken to the Motion.

MR. BIGGAR asked where the first meeting of the Committee would be?

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: I am not a Member of it.

MR. WARTON thought the Motion was in rather a peculiar form. There was nothing to show from the Notice given that the Committee was now composed of 21 Members. They could only guess or assume that it was.

MR. SPEAKER: The number 21 were originally nominated, and now two have been added.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 57.)

(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that about a week ago a Memorandum was circulated among their Lordships describing the general scope and operation of the Bill. That statement contained a very concise and lucid description of the provisions of the Bill, and as he presumed that those of their Lordships who were interested in the subject had read the document, they would not expect him to enter into the matter at such length as would have been necessary if that Memorandum had not been issued. He would, nevertheless, say a few words as to the reasons which had induced the Government to deal with the subject in this particular form. In the first place, he would remind their Lordships that this Bill was no new measure. It had already been before the House of Commons, and, in fact, had passed through a Select Committee of the House last year. The Bill was now before their Lordships precisely in the shape in which it left the Select Committee of the House of Commons last year, with the exception of a few verbal changes. The Bill dealt with the whole municipal administration of towns. It consolidated and amended the existing legislation. It covered the same ground as was covered by the Police Bills of 1833 and 1850, and the General Police Act of 1862. The series of enactments had a two-fold object. In the first place, they provided a municipal government for populous places which had grown up without having any constitution granted them by Royal Charter, or any other form of municipal government. And, secondly, they conferred upon the authorities of the existing Royal burghs and other burghs such additional powers as they did not then possess. These burghs had already a constitution of Magistrates, of Councillors, and other officers. The Magistrates exercised considerable jurisdiction, both criminal and civil; but under their constitution the powers of assessment which they possessed were of a very limited character. They had no means, and, indeed, it was not their duty by statute, to support any regular Police Force. Neither had they the means of making improvements of any kind—of providing for a water supply, or of taking any effective measures in reference to public health. These serious defects it was intended to remedy by these several Acts. The previous Acts of 1850 and 1862, were permissive in their character. They could be adopted either in whole or in part; but, as a matter of fact, they generally were adopted by a great majority of the towns. The last Act, that of 1862, was adopted by a very large majority of the burghs of Scotland. That Act was passed five years before the present Public Health Act, and it dealt with various topics relating to public health. Some of these matters were afterwards dealt with by the Public Health Act, such as cleansing of streets, the ventilation of buildings, the management of public sewers, the management of slaughterhouses, and many other matters of that kind. But it was a matter for serious consideration whether these subjects should be left out of this Bill, in order to be dealt with by some future measure as an amendment of the Public Health Act, or whether the Municipal Code, which was already provided by the series of Police Acts, should in these matters as well as in other respects be brought up to the present day. After much consideration the latter course appeared to Her Majesty's Government to be, on the whole, the best course to pursue. In the first place, the Public Health Act was a general Act, and applicable not merely to the urban, but also to rural communities. Any amending Act would also have to be general in its character, and would have to apply to all sanitary matters in urban as well as in rural districts. It appeared to the Government that any such general measure of amendment ought to be followed by a reform of local county government. The Government were already pledged to deal with that question; but the period at which they could hope to deal with it was still distant, and the matters requiring to be dealt with were of most urgent importance. The second reason was, that the municipal burghs of Scotland were taking a great interest in this Bill, and were very anxious that their sanitary provisions should be incorporated in a Burgh Police Code. In proof of this, he might mention that the largest towns in Scotland had private Police Acts of their own, and that most of these had been passed subsequent to the passing of the General Public Health Act. The Convention of Royal Burghs, to whom the Government were very much indebted for their careful consideration of this Bill, had unanimously approved of this manner of dealing with the subject. In fact, the opinion of Scotland was unanimous, with the exception of the Police Commissioners of Glasgow. Their objections, however, were only recently raised, and until quite lately this Bill had the absolute and unanimous approval of the burghs of Scotland. As he had already said, the previous Acts were permissive in their character; but after an experience of 50 years of nearly all the towns of Scotland, it was thought that probably the right principle of dealing with the municipal administration in Scotland ought to be pretty nearly settled. The great majority of the existing police burghs and the inhabitants of those populous places which had no previous municipal constitution of their own, having adopted the Permissive Bills, the provisions of the present Bill were made compulsory. But there was a partial exception. Six of the largest towns in Scotland had obtained in recent years private Police Acts of their own. These Acts had been found to meet the peculiarities of each case. These Acts, consequently, the towns themselves were very anxious to retain so far as they possibly could. It seemed reasonable, however, that those provisions in the Bills which applied to certain matters pertaining to the public law should be made compulsory in all towns—such provisions, for example, as the establishment and regulation of the Police Force. The Police Force was, of course, supported in great part by the Imperial Government of the State. That alone was some reason for dealing with it in a compulsory manner. But it was desirable that the case should be dealt with by one uniform system. The second matters which were compulsory were those portions of the Bill which related to public health, and also matters pertaining to the Criminal Law. While all these portions of the Bill would be compulsory, the remainder would be optional to the large towns. Therefore, while the Bill provided for a general repeal of the Police Acts, those parts of the private Police Acts which dealt with other matters which the Bill did not make compulsory were saved; while the other parts of the private Police Acts dealing with matters which were dealt with compulsorily by this Bill were repealed. This might, perhaps, seem rather a complicated explanation; but the Bill itself was as clear and as well-arranged as the complicated nature of the subject admitted of. The complication was in the subject, and not in the Bill. To sweep away all existing Private Acts, as was suggested, and to substitute a General Act of Parliament to simplify the law, would be a very unpopular measure, and would meet with considerable opposition. An objection to this Bill was that it had a somewhat grandmotherly tendency. To that he would reply that there was scarcely anything in the Bill that was not already contained in Private Acts of Parliament. There was very little new matter in the Bill, and certainly it contained no new principle. Therefore the Government, in asking the House to pass the measure, were not asking their Lordships to take a leap in the dark. An experience of 20 years, it seemed to them, ought to suffice to discover the right method of dealing with municipal matters. If their Lordships sanctioned the second reading, he would move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee of their Lordships' House. It was a very long measure, and one which the House would hardly care to deal with, except by a Select Committee. He begged, therefore, to move the second reading, on the understanding that it would be afterwards referred to a Select Committee of their Lordships' House.

The Earl of Dalhousie

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

LORD BALFOUR said, he was glad to hear from the noble Earl that he proposed to move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee of their Lordships' House. When their Lordships considered that there were 529 clauses in the Bill, besides 50 pages of Schedules, they would probably be of opinion that that was the right way of dealing with it. At the same time, there were one or two matters of general principle in the Bill to which he wished to call the attention of the House before the Bill went to a Select Committee—chiefly some of the provisions in regard to the police administration, and as to the enormous powers—he believed the unprecedentedly large powers—given to magistrates in burghs to deal with offences, many of which were of the most petty kind, and which he could not help thinking would be much better left to the general good sense of the community. With regard to the administration of the police, the present state of the law was this—that all burghs of 7,000 inhabitants or more might, if they chose, maintain their own police. The proposal in the Bill was that all burghs of 20,000 inhabitants should do so, and that all burghs which had more than 5,000 inhabitants, and which at present maintained their own police, should continue to do so. He thought it would be much more satisfactory if this Bill had gone a little further in abolishing independent jurisdiction in the matter of police. The Bill itself admitted this principle, because it said that in future no more new independent jurisdictions of this kind would be created, and it just continued those which were at present in existence. He did not think he should be contradicted when he said that it was in conformity with the general policy of Parliament—and it was a sound policy—that these small independent jurisdictions in the matter of police should be as far as possible abolished; and he ventured to express the opinion that no burgh which had less than 10,000 or 12,000 inhabitants was large enough to maintain its own police. It was the experience of everybody connected with the administration of police matters in Scotland that these small jurisdictions were very prejudicial to the efficient service of the police; that in many cases in small burghs there were constant complaints that the discipline of the police was not so efficient as in the counties; and there were also frequent complaints that in the small independent jurisdictions obstacles were raised to prompt apprehension of criminals who had committed crime within the bounds of their jurisdiction. In a small community of 5,000 or 6,000 inhabitants it was impossible to expect that the authorities would be able to engage a Chief Constable of the same education, efficiency, and ability as was the case in a larger community. There was not scope for the energies of an energetic and efficient public servant in such a small district. He wished to call their Lordships' attention to some of the large powers which the Bill proposed to confer on magistrates. He did not think it would be possible for the State regulation of individual conduct to go further than this Bill proposed. There were pages upon pages dealing with some of the most minute offences. How far these provisions were in advance of some of the Private Acts of burghs he was not able to say; but this he would say—that if the present Code as it stood was to be extended to all the burghs in Scotland, it would cause a very great deal of inconvenience and heartburning, and it would be a great surprise to the population, because he did not believe that one-half of them knew what was being proposed in their name by the magistrates and Commissioners of Burghs. He would like to mention one or two of the provisions of the Bill by way of illustration. It was provided that no refreshment of any kind might be sold after 12 o'clock at night, not even in a baker's shop, under a penalty of £5. A chimney sweeper might not walk on the footpath, and you might not carry a bundle on the footpath if it incommoded anyone else. There was no definition of a bundle, and he believed this would be a fruitful cause of litigation. If anyone had a spite against a person, he might jostle against that person when he was carrying a bundle, and that person might be taken before a magistrate and accused of "incommoding." Then there was a provision that no colourable imitation of a bank note was to be made or exhibited. That was a reasonable provision; but he did not see why there should be any further regulations as to a forged bank note in a burgh than in a country district. Then there was a provision against unlawful games, and a person could be fined 40s. for playing any unlawful game in the streets. But there was no definition of an unlawful game. All tables for billiard playing were to be licensed; and if they were kept open and anyone was found playing upon them between 12 o'clock at night and 8 in the morning, they were to be fined 40s. or £5—he forgot which. Just to show their Lordships how very far-reaching this Bill was, he would tell them what it was thought necessary not to make an offence. Sub-section 36 of Section 393 provided that—

"It shall not be deemed an offence to lay sand or other materials in any street in time of frost to prevent accident, or litter, or other suitable materials, to prevent the freezing of water in pipes, or, in case of sickness, to prevent noise, if the person laying such things causes them to be removed as soon as the occasion for them cases."

When anything of that sort had to be specially exempted, it showed how far-reaching the provisions of the Bill were. There were provisions which were extremely onerous upon another matter. As had been shown more than once on the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, there was a difference of opinion as to the clauses anent the keeping of disorderly houses; and he thought a very general opinion had been expressed in the House, or a very considerable body of opinion, that many of these clauses were not in conformity with public policy. They would find all these clauses embodied in this Bill. He knew what the answer would be. Some large towns had got Acts, such as Edinburgh and Glasgow and Dundee, and he thought Greenock, in which these clauses were incorporated, and the surrounding districts and other burghs, such as Leith and other places, complained of the effect of these clauses in Private Acts for large towns. Houses which these clauses were intended to suppress simply migrated beyond the bounds of these large towns, and went to the country district; and if they extended all these clauses to other parts of Scotland round the outskirts of every town, the same class of houses would grow up, and there would be no proper supervision. There would not be even the same amount of possibility of dealing with these matters as in towns. He thought it would be better if these matters should be dealt with comprehensively in one general Bill for the whole country. As the noble Earl had said, this Bill was now compulsory. Formerly any burgh might or might not adopt the measure if it wished it, according to a plebiscite of the inhabitants; but under this Bill, in any burgh of 2,000 or more inhabitants, any seven ratepayers might present a petition to the Sheriff, and the other inhabitants of the burgh would have no option but that the Act should be adopted. Surely the 1,933 other inhabitants might be allowed to have some say in the matter as to whether this Bill was or was not to be adopted. There were also some provisions as to the compulsory taking of land which he should certainly like to have explained. He did not know how far they came in advance of the present law; but there were provisions in the Bill to enable the Commissioners of any burgh to take land compulsorily for the purpose of storing manure, and for making gasworks and waterworks. They had not to go to Parliament for the powers, but might go to the local Sheriff-substitute, whose judgment was final. It seemed to him that this was a provision which should be very carefully considered by Parliament before it was allowed to pass. Then there were various other matters of detail; but he thought he had said enough to show that this Bill required most careful consideration, and that the Select Committee upon it should be a strong and representative one, and that plenty of time should be given for its consideration. He might venture to make a suggestion. He had a strong impression that before such a Bill was passed affecting Scotland everybody should be made thoroughly aware of its provisions, and he would not be sorry to see the Select Committee sitting in public. He had no intention of opposing the second reading; but the subsequent stages of the Bill would require most careful consideration.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, from the speech which the noble Lord had just delivered, their Lordships must see how desirable it was that a measure of this character should be carefully considered before it became law. The Bill embodied, in a compulsory general Act, all those different provisions interfering with men in their private business; and it confirmed, he thought unnecessarily, those provisions which had already been passed by both Houses of Parliament in Private Bills. When clauses such as these were inserted in Private Bills, those who were opposed to them had an opportunity of appearing by counsel or otherwise in opposition. It became, therefore, more necessary, when all these provisions were to be embodied in a general Bill, to carefully consider how far they should apply. Under the provisions of this Bill the municipal authorities could regulate the size of every room and of every window in every dwelling house, and the ventilation of every dwelling house. It imposed heavy fines on omnibuses that were not in a proper state of repair; and if the horses were not properly trained there was a heavy penalty. There was a penalty of £2 or £5 if a slow vehicle did not immediately get out of the way of a faster vehicle passing. But he thought the most extraordinary provision of all was one dealing with morals. The object, no doubt, was that everyone should live in the Palace of Truth. It was provided that anyone who attempted to commit a falsehood would be liable to a penalty of £10 or two months' imprisonment. What they were fast coming to, if this kind of legislation was about to pass, was a state of things where every citizen would only be able to live and move and have his being by the favour of the Secretary of State, or of some municipal authority. He hoped their Lordships would put their foot down on this kind of legislation, and that the Bill would come out of the Committee very different to what it was now.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, this was, no doubt, a very important Bill. Having devoted weeks to the consideration of the measure, he had tried to understand it, but had failed to do so. The whole principle upon which the Bill was drawn up was most inconvenient. It was partly a mere condensation of the existing law, and it was partly an addition to the existing law. It was very difficult to make out what clauses were new legislation and what clauses were old legislation. He suggested that what was a mere re-enactment should have been treated in one type, and what was new in another type. His noble Friend who had charge of the Bill (the Earl of Dalhousie) said there was very little in it that was new; but he (the Duke of Argyll) could not believe that all the provisions that had been detailed could be found in existing Statutes. Certainly, he had never heard any such powers in regard to the classes of offences which had been mentioned being exercised by magistrates, although he had no objection to sweeps being prevented from walking on the footpath. There were one or two clauses in the Bill with respect to which he had heard very serious remonstrances. One in particular was a very important one—that was the power given to populous places to annex parts of counties with the view to include them in the rates. That was a very important question. He had heard contests on behalf of his own tenants and feuars, who objected to be included in towns or cities that wanted to annex them. As he understood the Bill, this power of annexation was carried much further than under the existing law. Under the Bill, not only great cities and important towns, but populous places, constituted into police burghs, would have the power of annexing parts of neighbouring counties at the discretion of the Sheriff of that part of the district which had the majority of ratepayers, which was, of course, the populous place itself. Therefore, the Sheriff had the power of annexing new land to these populous places; and if the Sheriff of the less populous place objected to the annexation he would have no power to resist it. He had heard remonstrances on these points from persons well versed in the law. It would be absurd to oppose such a Bill as this on the second reading; but it was one that would require the very close attention of their Lordships.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, it might be as well to state, with reference to the expression “falsehood,” which had a somewhat ridiculous appearance, that the Scotch law phrase “commit falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition,” was a synonym for the old English word “swindling.”

INFANTS BILL.—(No. 78.)

(The Lord Fitzgerald.)

REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

Clause 3 (Mother may appoint guardian).

THE EARL OF LIMERICK said, he objected to the provision in the clause which gave the mother of the infant power to appoint and nominate a guardian by deed or will. Whatever was to be done on behalf of the wife ought to be done openly during her lifetime. It ought not to be possible for her to make an arrangement in secret, which should be kept secret until after her death. It was a dangerous and invidious power to give to enable a wife to appoint a guardian by will. He, therefore, proposed to amend the sub-section of the clause by providing that the Court might, upon the application of the mother of an infant, appoint a person or persons to act as guardian or guardians jointly with the father if the Court was satisfied that this was necessary or desirable.

Amendment moved,

In Sub-section 2, line 22, leave out from (“The”) to end of sub-section and insert (“court may, upon the application of the mother of any infant, appoint some fit person or persons to act as guardian or guardians of such infant after her death, jointly with the father of such infant, if satisfied that such appointment is necessary or desirable for the welfare of such infant.”—(The Earl of Limerick.))

LORD FITZGERALD said, the objections of the noble Earl would in some respects apply to any appointment of a guardian by will, for until the death of the testator, if it was the testator's wish, the provisions of a will must be kept secret. As the clause stood, it was the clause of Lord Cairns; and the Amendment would restore the clause to its original form. There might be cases in which the wife had the strongest reason for believing that her husband was not a proper person to be intrusted with the charge of their children after her death.

LORD INCHQUIN said, he could not agree with either the Amendment or with the clause as it stood. The noble and learned Earl (the late Earl Cairns) said that in case of a temporary difference between the husband and wife the latter might make an application to the Court to annoy him and put him upon his defence. In any case the clause would be a fruitful source of inconvenience. The person or persons appointed by will would most likely be hostile to the husband, and even if not hostile could scarcely assert a claim to act without offending the father. The father might say that if he was to be interfered with the children might be taken from him altogether, and he would not leave them any of his property. There might be individual cases in which the father should be interfered with; but for that the law already provided. He should, therefore, move that the sub-section of the clause be omitted.

Amendment moved, to leave out Sub-section 2.—(The Lord Inchiquin.)

LORD WATSON said, he approved of the clause as it stood rather than of the proposed Amendment. The clause could have no operation until it was proved that the father was not a fit person to have the control of the children, and that the person nominated was a fit person. A person nominated as guardian would have to make up his mind before applying to the Court whether he was likely to obtain the confirmation of his appointment. He would enter the Court with the responsibility that the case for his appointment must be proved.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, there was some inconvenience in having two Motions before the House at once. He had already explained that the law at present was very different from what it would be under that clause. It was true that the Court had power to take children from their father, either in the lifetime of the mother or at any other time, for causes which the precedents had established as sufficient. But that power was circumscribed by the rules for its application laid down by Lord Eldon and other Judges, and was never exercised save in the most extreme cases, not only of immorality or profligacy on the part of the father, but of such immorality as was proved to be likely to directly influence or affect the child. Even if the father was living in scandalous profligacy, but did not bring his children into the society of his paramour, or did not deprave the child by wicked teaching, the Court would not interfere. The cases chiefly meant to be provided for by the sub-section were those in which, in the opinion of all reasonable persons, it must be altogether wrong to allow the child to fall back under the power of the father. Take an extreme case. When the father and mother were living apart, and when there were young children, girls, living under the care of the mother during her life. In such cases, after the mother's death the children fell back under the power of the father, however undesirable such a result might be, and even if the mother, herself being pure and blameless, had obtained a divorce from her husband. In such a case as that, this clause would enable the wife to anticipate and make provision for the event of her own death, and to name the person whom she would wish to succeed to her own place, so far as that was possible. But the clause as framed by his lamented Friend Lord Cairns did not give her an absolute power, or enable her to do even this, for any reasons which were not grave reasons. The Court could only confirm the exercise of the power in cases where it was absolutely necessary to do so for the benefit of the child.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he must protest against the use which had been made of the name of his noble and learned Friend the late Earl Cairns, whose authority was so great in that House. He knew that at the end of last Session his late noble and learned Friend had expressed himself privately as perfectly horrified with this Bill, and his wonder that it had ever been allowed to pass the House of Commons. What Earl Cairns might have said to the Committee to mitigate legislation which he did not feel himself strong enough to avert in the way of compromise he did not know; but as the noble and learned Earl was now no more, he asked their Lordships to dismiss from their mind any prejudice in favour of this Bill which might be raised by citing the name of Earl Cairns. It was impossible to exaggerate the importance of the decision at which they had arrived, because it was a decision which might affect the happiness of any married man who had the misfortune to be a widower. A man might be exposed to interference to which he had never been exposed before. It became them, therefore, to watch whether the securities were sufficient to save a father against whom there might be no complaint from undue and improper interference. The language of the noble and learned Lords who had spoken was very different from that of the Bill. They said it was necessary, where a wife was living separate from her husband, and the father's influence would be dangerous to the children, that they should be saved from his influence; but there was nothing of that kind in the Bill. If their language could be imported into the Bill he should not have so much objection to it. The Bill said nothing of the cases to which the Lord Chancellor had referred, or of a father who wilfully corrupted his children's mind. It allowed a wife, by a will secretly made and locked up in her desk, to appoint any guardian or guardians, male or female, no matter what their character or capacity as guardians, who were to have equal power with the father; and if there were two of them they could outvote the father in everything which appertained to the bringing up and management of his own children. What security was there that the wife would exercise such a power wisely? None whatever. Of course, in a vast number of instances the power would not be exercised at all, or if it were it would be rightly exercised; but there might be a case where a woman, living in loneliness, subject to the influence of mischievous or gossiping persons, misled by false stories, or guided by mistaken spiritual advisers, might exercise this power in circumstances which would make it improbable that she was exercising it wisely. The mother would have the power of projecting into the family of the father two representatives of her own, who would have the right of determining how the children should be educated. Let their Lordships consider what cases might arise. There might be the case of a Catholic or a Protestant mother, the father being of the opposite religion. Or there might be a very Low Church father and a very High Church wife, and the latter might appoint two High Church guardians, who would proceed to bring up the children in a manner wholly opposed to the wishes of the father. The Bill would enable the wife to exercise after her death a power which she could not have exercised while living. The two guardians appointed by her would obtain a power which she never possessed, and however odious they might be to the father, she, being dead, would be incapable of retracting what she had done. Keeping cases of scandal out of view altogether, they would wreck hundreds of households if they were to allow guardians to be forced into a family at variance with the opinions of the father. The father might be a man who took an old-fashioned view as to the way his daughters should be educated. The wife might be a strong-minded woman, and appoint as guardian a woman with a taste for male studies and occupations. They might, on the other hand, have a father with an austere view of the duties of life, and wished to bring up his sons in virtue and frugality, and perhaps an undue abstinence from the amusements of the world; and the friends of the wife might be of an opposite character. They might be persons who had a great love of amusement, who might, perhaps, attach an exaggerated importance to our great national sports at Epsom and Newmarket. What would be the effect on the children? It was bad enough for the father, for he could not imagine anything more deplorable to a father than having his children wrested from him in this way, and brought up in a manner he did not approve of. But what would be the effect on the children? There would be constant squabbling between the father and the guardians as to what kind the religious teaching should be—what morality should be considered right or wrong. It would completely wreck the morals and the faith of the children, who would see those who had the bringing of them up differ on every point on which their bringing up depended. He was aware the answer would be that this was not to take place unless a Court deemed it necessary and desirable. No doubt, there was a great deal of majesty in a Law Court, and his noble Friend thought he had disposed of every question when he said it would be decided by a Court. For his own part, however, he was not an absolute believer in the divinity of a Court. He was not prepared to give that absolute confidence to the Court except under well-defined conditions. Under the Bill, if only a single Judge thought it desirable not to interfere with the dying wishes of a wife, the guardians she appointed would be thrust upon the father.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: No, no. The burden of proof was the other way.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The words of the Act were—

“The court, after her death, if satisfied that such appointment is necessary or desirable for the welfare of the children,” &c.

He did not say that in a considerable number of cases the Judge would not insist on confining the confirmation to cases of proved incapacity or unfitness of the father; but they had no security whatever that that would universally be the case. If they laid down in an Act of Parliament what they required to be done, no doubt the Judges would give effect to their wishes; but if a Judge were to decide, without any guidance whatever, whether he would set aside the nomination of guardians by the mother, the decision would be left absolutely to the accidents of his own individual disposition. The Judge's intentions might be good, but then he might be a man with peculiarities. For instance, he might think that religion was not of much importance. He had been treating the matter on the supposition that the High Court would have to decide the question; but, under the provisions of the Bill, a County Court Judge would have the power of forcing guardians into a family at the will, perhaps, of a wicked, an infamous, or a frivolous wife. He could not conceive that their Lordships would, with light hearts, make such a revolution in all English families as was shadowed forth by this Bill. If words were introduced to supersede the father, where he was shown unfit to have the guardianship, he would not resist any such proposal; but the Bill, as it stood, seemed to him to be the greatest interference with the rights and privileges which men valued more than they did their own lives, on the mere opinion of a County Court Judge. To oust the father from all care of his own children seemed to him so unwise, and so unlike anything ever done in legislation before, that he earnestly hoped the House would pause before agreeing to it. He thought the best plan would be not to divide, but to bring up a clause dealing with those cases on which they were all agreed.

The Marquess of Salisbury

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Marquess had spoken in an impassioned way against reference to the opinion of the late Earl Cairns, and had called on their Lordships not to allow their minds to be biassed by what had been said in that connection, and then the noble Marquess proceeded to give a very strong expression of opinion on the part of Earl Cairns against the Bill, which, it appeared, had been confided to the noble Marquess last year. He (Earl Granville) thought it better to be guided by the public utterances of Earl Cairns; and, so far as he knew, Earl Cairns had never expressed his opposition to this Bill, though he had said it was a Bill which required great care and attention with regard to its details. Acting upon that opinion, Lord Cairns suggested that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, and in that Select Committee he took immense pains himself. It was an extraordinary thing for the noble Marquess to ask the House to vote against a clause on the authority of Lord Cairns, which Lord Cairns himself had framed. The noble Marquess went further, and made a speech in which he spoke of the danger of giving a posthumous power to a wife to overrule her husband in respect of guardians, and then, at the end, the noble Marquess anticipated what their answer would be—namely, that they should read the words of the clause, which showed that there was no such power given. The Bill provided simply that the Court should have power to intervene, and if it thought proper, might confirm the appointment of the guardians so nominated. But if the noble Marquess was right, the argument was strong against the power which the Court of Chancery possessed in regard to children. Then he said he was putting his case too weakly; this decision was to be taken, not by a Court of Chancery, but by a County Court Judge.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH: Hear, hear!

EARL GRANVILLE: Of course the noble Lord was quite right to cheer his Leader, whatever he might say. But he was going to state what was in the Bill itself. If the noble Marquess had read the Bill, he would have found that it was in the option of either of the parties to go to the County Court Judge or require the case to be taken to a higher Court, and if first decided by the County Court Judge, there was a right of appeal to the highest Court in the Kingdom. He really never saw a case which more completely disposed of the arguments of the noble Marquess than the present.

LORD BRAMWELL pointed out that by the 5th clause of the Bill the wife would have the power to go to the Court in the lifetime of her husband; and it occurred to him that unless some such provision as that under consideration were inserted, the wife, if she had reason to be dissatisfied with her husband, would be almost driven to go to the Court in his lifetime to get the power to appoint guardians, and scandals would thereby arise which otherwise would never be made public.

Amendment negatived.

On Question, That Sub-section 2 stand part of the Bill?

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, he hoped the clause would not be struck out altogether, as he felt the force of the remarks of the noble and learned Lord who had just sat down, as the wife might be driven into Court to do what, under the Bill, she could do in private. He thought it would be most undesirable to drive the husband and wife into a quarrel. There were many cases in which a wife would endure a great deal for the sake of the children rather than raise a scandal.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON suggested that it would be well to strike out this particular clause then, and to bring up another clause which would more completely meet the views of noble Lords on the third reading. He thought the power of the wife in respect to appointing guardians to act after her death should be confined to cases in which the husband had been guilty of misconduct as to make him an improper person to have the absolute control of his children. What was desired was, the introduction of words which would set out the cases in which it would be desirable the wife should have the power to appoint guardians.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR hoped his noble and learned Friend would not agree to the suggestion. It would be better to amend the clause on the third reading if thought necessary.

Clause 5 (Court may make orders as to custody).

EARL BEAUCHAMP moved an Amendment limiting the power of the Court to make an order to cases in which the father and mother are separated by deed or decree of a Court or otherwise. He explained that the Amendment was drafted and proposed by the late Lord Cairns, when the Bill was before the Select Committee. If some such alteration were not introduced into the clause a mother would be able to make an application to the Court upon any frivolous pretext. To prevent such occurrences the power of applying to the Court ought to be limited to cases where the parents had separated. Under the clause as it stood husbands would be at the mercy of their wives, should the latter choose to carry their domestic quarrels into Court.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 12, to insert at the beginning of the clause ("Where the father or mother of any infant are living separate under a separation by deed or decree of the Court or otherwise.")—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

LORD FITZGERALD opposed the Amendment. There was no public expression on the part of Lord Cairns as to the proposal contained in the clause. Was it not a shocking thing that this right should not be given to the wife unless she was divorced or lived separately from her husband?

LORD BRAMWELL said, that by the clause as it stood when the husband and wife were living together the wife might require the Court to make an order, the effect of which would be to transfer the control of the children, which the father now rightly possessed, to both father and mother. That would be a Dual Control of the most vicious kind. The reason why this right should be given to the wife when living separately was that she was no longer a member of the household, and then it might be proper that she should have a voice in the management of the children. When husband and wife were separated in that way there was no increase of scandal in her going to the Court. What he remembered that great lawyer and consummate Judge, whose loss he so much regretted, did when he dealt with this provision was, he objected to it on the ground, among others, that every little quarrel between husband and wife, which might otherwise be easily made up would enable her to rush off to the Court.

LORD BRABOURNE said, that whilst the Law Lords on the Select Committee had differed upon this Amendment, the three Lay Lords had all voted against it; and as he had the honour to be one, he wished to say why he had ventured to dissent from Lord Cairns's opinion. In most cases of husband and wife disagreeing, the wife would never desire to apply to the Court, and the question would never arise. But there might be cases—as for instance, when it had been agreed before marriage that the children of one sex should be brought up in one religion, and those of the other sex in another—in which the wife might desire so to apply. If this Amendment were carried, she could not do so whilst she lived with her husband; but the moment she separated from him, “either by the decree of a Court or otherwise,” she could make the application. Therefore, this Amendment would offer a direct premium to the wife to separate from her husband, by making that separation the only way by which she could acquire a right which it was generally conceded that she ought to have. His (Lord Brabourne's) noble and learned Friend (Lord Bramwell) said that the clause without the Amendment would strike at the supremacy of the husband; but he should recollect that the whole of this Bill was based upon the desire to elevate the status of the mother, and give her a greater right over her children than she had hitherto possessed, and if his noble and learned Friend wished to maintain unimpaired the entire supremacy of the husband, he should have opposed the Bill upon its second reading.

PUBLIC HEALTH—CREMATION.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW said, he wished to call attention to the erection of a public crematorium at Woking, and the cremation of a body there on the 26th of March last, and to inquire, Whether Her Majesty's Government would use whatever powers they had in the matter for the discouragement of the practice?

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE asked what powers the noble Earl referred to?

THE EARL OF ONSLOW said, he understood the Home Secretary to state in “another place” that Her Majesty's Government had power to discourage the practice.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he was not aware of the existence of such power. Some time ago the Government was asked to legislate, with a view of surrounding the practice by certain safeguards. The reply of the Secretary of State was that the people of this country were not in the least inclined to adopt cremation as an ordinary mode of disposing of the dead. He would, however, endeavour to ascertain what the views of the Home Secretary were upon the subject, so that he might be able to give the noble Earl a more satisfactory answer if he desired it.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW said, he would repeat the Question on a future occasion.

LONDON STREET TRAMWAYS (EXTENSIONS) BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GREGORY, in moving the rejection of the Bill, said, he desired to call the attention of the House to the important nature of the provisions of the measure and the very considerable powers which it proposed to take. A measure very similar was introduced by the London Street Tramways Company last year, but was rejected by the Select Committee to which it was referred. As originally introduced in the present year, it was a very large scheme, which would have materially affected an Institution with which he had the honour to be connected—the Foundling Hospital; but that part of the scheme had been dropped, and therefore he did not speak on behalf of that Institution, which was satisfied with the course which had been taken. He was authorized, however, to speak on behalf of other persons who opposed the scheme in the last Session of Parliament, and who succeeded in getting a decision of the Committee in their favour. The Bill consisted of several parts, and proposed to authorize the Company to construct additional tramways, and, in connection therewith, to improve certain streets in the Metropolis; and he would deal with it as the promoters themselves dealt with it. In the first place, the measure comprised some small extensions in the neighbourhood of the Fleet Road. He did not know whether there was any objection to those extensions; his own objection related not so much to them as to other parts of the Bill. The measure further comprised extensions down the Chalk Farm Road, down a road called Crown-dale Road, and also a considerable extension down King's Cross Road. Having had some personal experience in the matter, he deemed it necessary to point out to the consideration of the House the objections to the scheme of the Company which that personal experience enabled him to mention. In regard to what, for the purposes of argument, he would call scheme No. 1—the extension down Chalk Farm Road—it was a road upon which, as many Members of the House would be aware, there was a very considerable traffic, and a main road running as far as Hampstead Heath. Many omnibuses passed along it, and in parts the traffic was of a very congested and difficult nature. An iron bridge carried it over the Regent's Canal in Camden Town, and along a portion of the road which was approached by gradients of considerable steepness. The bridge was a girder bridge, which only admitted of one carriage with two lines of passage, one up and the other down, which were only wide enough to admit of one carriage passing to or fro at the same time. It was proposed by the Tramway Company that they should have the power of passing over that narrow bridge, and up and down that incline, without any alteration of the gradient or any lateral extension of the bridge. The consequence would be that under the powers which the street tramways usually possessed they would have complete control over the traffic. They talked themselves of "marshalling the traffic," which he presumed to mean that they would stop all other traffic until their own tramcars had passed; and as it would be impossible for any other carriages to pass at the same time, the rest of the traffic along the road would be completely at the mercy of the Tramway Company. It was quite evident that such powers would be highly inconvenient, and might be exercised very much to the detriment of the general public. He could not find that there was any great reason for this extension, and it would only be necessary for the tramway to make a small detour in order to reach the same point, and the traffic was already abundantly provided for. So much, then, for the proposed extension along the Chalk Farm Road. He now came to scheme No. 2, by which it was proposed to extend the tramway system down the road from King's Cross, where the Great Northern Railway Station was situated, so as to carry on the traffic down the Farringdon Road to Blackfriars Bridge, along and across roads upon which there was also, at the present moment, a considerable amount of traffic. This road would be carried along the whole line of the old Fleet Ditch, following pretty closely the valley through which the ditch formerly ran, and having on each side very steep, sloping streets. In one instance a street ran down to the valley at a gradient of something like 1 in 13. There were streets on both sides along which the traffic was very considerable. It would, therefore, be pretty well imagined that the running of tramcars along this route would be a source of great danger to the traffic coming down at right angles from the steep roads on each side. That fact was felt to be a strong ground of objection to the Bill when it was before the Select Committee last year; but they were told now that it was proposed to undertake certain engineering works in the neighbourhood of King's Cross which, in future, would obviate the difficulty. The nature of the ground, however, would render it almost impossible to construct a tramway with safety to the ordinary traffic, because, as he had pointed out already, the streets on both sides of the valley sloped down to the centre upon very steep gradients, and unless the banks were dealt with it would be impossible to obviate the difficulty at all. The provisions of the Bill were fully considered by the Committee last year; and it was for the House to consider whether by allowing the Bill to pass now they would reverse the decision then arrived at, and also whether they would sanction the principle of allowing the promoters of Private Bills to come before Parliament, year after year, with the same scheme, in the hope, in the end, by the enormous expenses incurred, of wearing down their opponents. It would be manifest that a powerful Company like this, coming before Parliament year after year, would gradually wear down any power of resistance on the part of their less wealthy opponents. It must be borne in mind that Parliament had already intimated, as plainly as possible, that tramways would not be allowed to be constructed in the centre of London. There could only be one object in promoting this King's Cross extension—namely, to bring the system of tramways which now existed in the outskirts on the Northern side of the Metropolis into the heart of London. As the scheme was now presented, it terminated in nothing—indeed, there was no terminus indicated at all; but, no doubt, the object of the Company was to connect the system hereafter with Blackfriars Bridge and the tramways now existing on the South side of the river, so as to carry the tramways across the Thames, and place the lines on the North and South side of London in immediate connection with each other. He ventured to submit that he had shown sufficient grounds to induce the House to refuse to read the Bill a second time; but his hon. Friend the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) would probably state, by-and-bye, what the views of the Committee of last year were. Even without taking into consideration the grounds upon which the Committee threw out the Bill, he thought he might safely appeal to the House, on public grounds, not to permit these tramways to find their way into the heart of London. They were already able to reach the City by means of the City Road, and they should be kept to that perfectly clear and well-defined line. There already existed sufficient means of communication between the North side of London and the City; and while the Northern tramways were restricted to the North side of London, those on the South side of the Thames should be kept to the South side as they now were. He begged to move that the Bill be read a second time on that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Gregory.)

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, that in supporting the second reading of the Bill he wished to express his regret at the course which his hon. Friend had taken. There were a great number of provisions contained in the Bill to which his hon. Friend took no objection at all; and it would be a departure from the ordinary and almost uniform practice of the House, where a Bill contained provisions of a separate and distinct character, not to send that Bill to a tribunal upstairs specially appointed to decide upon its merits. If the House consented to depart from that rule now, there could be no doubt that they would be called upon to do so in other cases; and their decisions in reference to Private Bills would hereafter depend upon the chance of bringing up a certain number of Members to support or reject a measure without the possibility being afforded of entering into the merits of any case of the kind. There was one ground which might induce the House to take a favourable consideration of the present measure which he thought the hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex, who presided over the Committee last year, would be the last person to disregard when his attention was called to the matter. He (Mr. Torrens) had now been for 12 months engaged upon a Royal Commission appointed to investigate the cause, and to suggest remedies to get rid of the overcrowding of the population in the centre of large towns; and he would be guilty of no violation of confidence, although the Report of the Commission had not yet been laid upon the Table, if he said that the Commissioners were in absolute despair where to find sufficient remedies for the cruel pressure which now existed. Not only was the pressure seriously felt, but it was positively detrimental to the health of the whole community; and yet his hon. and learned Friend said that Parliament ought to keep these tramways from getting into the centre of the Metropolis. He (Mr. Torrens) frankly avowed that his object was to bring them as close as possible to the centre of the town, and he took that course for the sake of the community at large, because it was impossible at present to find vents enough to relieve the pressure which now existed—a pressure full of future danger, and calculated to produce ultimately every evil that could be enumerated. He regretted that his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had not been a Member of the Commission, so that he might have been able to bring his great knowledge and sagacity to bear upon its deliberations; but, owing to the fact that his hon. Friend was not upon it, he was unable to appreciate the pressing necessity for relief, and, by the action he was now taking, was, in point of fact, attempting to get rid of a source of relief. He (Mr. Torrens) contended that the first duty of the House was to consider the interests and welfare of the community at large. What was the case of those who objected to this tramway line? His hon. Friend said he appeared there to advocate the claims of certain persons who opposed a similar scheme when it was introduced last Session. About 210 owners of property along the proposed route were interested in the matter, and of that number about 50 had petitioned against the Bill. Surely the House of Commons were not to be bound by one-fourth against the other three-fourths. Considering the matter upon that ground, he entirely denied that there was any case for the opposition. No doubt the Bill of last Session was rejected by the Committee; but that, he thought, did not bind the House in regard to a new Bill, and it would be very unfair to prevent the promoters from going before a Committee again. A Committee upstairs, after the Bill had been read a second time, would fully inquire into all the provisions of the Bill, and would be able to say whether the question of the narrow bridge referred to by his hon. Friend ought to be regarded as a valid objection to a particular clause of the measure. It would, however, be no reason for throwing out the whole Bill, which was a measure of many clauses, which clauses, for the most part, were unopposed. He asked the House, therefore, not to depart from their usual practice, but to repose confidence in the tribunal to which they were accustomed to intrust these questions. Seeing that the House itself was altogether unfit to discuss such questions, let them hesitate before they usurped the functions of their ordinary tribunal. They had hitherto found their Committees thoroughly reliable; but that was no reason why they should be bound by a single decision, and for all future time refuse to reopen a question which had been once decided. The promoters believed they would now be able to remove the physical objections which were raised against their scheme last year, and that their new proposals would meet with the approval of the hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex, who presided over the Select Committee. The promoters had displayed every willingness to show deference to the opinions of the Committee; but the House had something even more than that to consider—namely, the interests and welfare of the people of London generally. He trusted the House would not be led away by the objections which had been raised by his hon. Friend, and which were very small indeed when compared with the general public advantages which would be conferred by the Bill, which advantages were of a nature that could scarcely be realized by those who had not served upon the Commission of which he had the honour to be a Member.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he would much rather not have taken any part in this discussion; but as he was Chairman of the Committee which considered what was practically the present Bill as it stood, with a very slight alteration, he felt bound to say a few words, and to put before the House, in the first place, the reasons which induced the Committee last year to decide unanimously to reject the Bill as it was then promoted, and the difference which existed between the present measure and that of last year. The principal object of the Bill of last year was identical with that of the measure now under the consideration of the House—namely, the construction of a system of tramways along the Northern road by the extension of existing tramway lines in the neighbourhood of Camden Town and Chalk Farm Road, and a proposal to carry those tramways on by way of King's Cross Road to Farringdon Street. There was also a further proposal to connect two existing tramways running down the Crowndale Road, which was not in the Bill of last year; but, with that exception, his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens) would not be able to show that this Bill differed in any material point from the one which was carefully considered by the Committee last year, and after that careful consideration thrown out upon public grounds. The Committee took considerable pains to make themselves masters of all the engineering details of the Bill; they visited the sites in each instance, and had those sites fully explained to them, as well as the engineering difficulties. In dealing, for instance, with the Chalk Farm Road route, they inspected the bridge over the Regent's Canal and the gradients of the road leading to the bridge, and the proposals contained in the measure with regard to that bridge certainly formed one of the chief objections they took to the measure. The bridge itself was divided into two narrow compartments sufficient for the passing of a single carriage each way, and the gradients of the approaches were unusually steep. In these respects the present Bill did not propose to alter the provisions of the measure of last year, and if the tramway were constructed the existing traffic must necessarily be materially impeded. As many hon. Members knew, the traffic was at the present moment very much congested; but, by making a detour, a delay of some four or five minutes only would take place, although he admitted that the alteration would involve a change of carriages. But the whole saving which the proposed scheme would effect really would not amount to more than that; and at the present moment there existed a tramway line running along part of nearly the same route as the projected extension, which was utilized for the conveyance of the same people which the new line was intended to serve. Consequently, the masses of the population, which his hon. Friend (Mr. Torrens) was desirous of serving, would sustain no serious injury; and he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) was quite as anxious of providing them with every facility for getting to and from their daily labour as his hon. Friend. The length of the line would be a little shorter, he admitted; but, practically, the persons whom the present Bill was intended to serve would be placed at no disadvantage, and the connection between two existing tramway lines could be made, and one route formed at the present moment by going a little further round. The engineering difficulties involved in carrying out the proposed scheme were very great, and the construction of a tramway line would inflict considerable injury upon the public by blocking up the already crowded traffic along the Chalk Farm Road. Both the goods traffic and the passenger traffic by omnibus would be impeded, and it was upon that ground mainly that the Bill of last year was rejected. The scientific men who were examined before the Committee were entirely agreed as to the engineering difficulties; but, beyond that, the Committee examined the line of route, and were able to form their own opinion as to the inconvenience and confusion which a block at the Canal Bridge would occasion. By the other part of the scheme, the Tramway Company sought power to construct a line running from King's Cross to Farringdon Road, and in that case the danger to the traffic would even be still greater than it was on the other line. As his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had pointed out, the road along which it was proposed to carry the tramway occupied the site of the old Fleet Ditch, and ran down from the Pentonville Road to a street called Wharton Street, the gradients along the whole line being exceedingly steep. Not only would a block there be extremely dangerous, as his

hon. Friend suggested, but several accidents had taken place quite recently, before the visit of the Committee, in consequence of horses getting the better of their drivers, and galloping down the street at a pace which rendered it impossible to stop them. The footway was consequently rendered exceedingly unsafe; and he might add that the footway which ran upon one side of these inclined streets, along the whole of that part of King's Cross Road, was most dangerous even at the present moment, and would be infinitely more so if this tramway were constructed. Indeed, the present Bill would increase the danger, as it would be impossible to diminish the levels, and it was proposed to increase the height of the road. Therefore, all the dangers which were pointed out to the Committee last year would be retained, and, to his mind, would even, if possible, be increased. His hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury had spoken in the interests of the working classes; but it so happened that, although this tramway line would be dangerous if it were allowed to be constructed, there did exist in the Metropolitan Railway, along the whole line of the contemplated tramway, that cheap means of conveyance which his hon. Friend would like to see established for the working population. They practically had at their disposal now, by the Underground Railway, and, in the Northern part of the district, by existing tramways, although in one instance for a shorter distance, a double means of conveyance, without any of the dangers involved in the construction of the proposed line, which dangers, although they induced the Committee to reject the Bill last year, did not appear to have been obviated in the least degree. He certainly thought the Committee were right in the decision at which they arrived last year, and that it ought to be maintained in the present instance. In conclusion, he would merely point out to the House that, although he would be the last person to advocate that the House should take into its own hands the decision of questions involved in Private Bills, which were far better threshed out before a Committee upstairs, yet he did think that when the same Bill was brought forward year after year without any material alteration, notwithstanding the fact that the reasons for rejecting the measure were the engineering difficulties and the danger to the public, the House, in this instance, would be perfectly justified in supporting the conclusion come to by the Committee of last year, and in rejecting the Bill.

MR. GORST said, he thought that the principle laid down by the hon. Baronet was a rather objectionable one, because it amounted to this—that if people went before a Committee with certain evidence, the decision of the Committee upon that evidence was to be a decision for all time, which was never to be upset hereafter upon any additional evidence or consideration. He had no doubt that the Committee last year came to a perfectly legitimate decision on the Bill then placed before them; and if the House were now asked to support them in that decision he should certainly feel inclined to do so. But circumstances had changed, and in the present year another scheme was brought before Parliament, and it would be stretching the procedure of that House to a very unwarrantable extent if, because the Committee decided against the Bill of last year, the House were to refuse to read the present Bill a second time now. What was the Manchester Ship Canal Bill but a great scheme which came before Parliament year after year. So far from finding the decision of one Committee rigidly adhered to, it was notorious that in the case of that Bill both the House of Commons and the House of Lords had in each successive year reversed the decision given in the preceding year. It was generally admitted that this scheme, if carried, would be an enormous boon to the Metropolis; and Parliament had long been attempting to find a remedy, in the interests of the working classes, for the congested condition of certain districts. The answer of the hon. Baronet was that there was provision already; that the passengers could get out of the tramcars at King's Cross and get into a train on the Metropolitan Railway which would take them on to Farringdon Street. Was that a reasonable proposal? Was it more convenient to go the whole way by a tramcar, or to go part by tramcar and the rest by the Metropolitan Railway? He certainly thought that when the hon. Baronet mentioned the Metropolitan Railway he really let the cat out of the bag, and that the opposition which was that day directed against the second reading of the Bill was not the opposition of the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), or of the landowners and frontiers who could not afford to come there to oppose the Bill year after year, but the opposition of the Metropolitan Railway Company, and an expression of the determination of a powerful and influential body to prevent a scheme for the cheap conveyance of the people to and from their daily labour from being heard in the usual way before the ordinary tribunal. Having listened carefully to the discussion, and especially to the speeches of the hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), and the hon. Member for East Sussex, he had arrived at the conclusion that the whole question was one of engineering, which it was quite impossible for the House to settle offhand in half-an-hour. According to the practice and procedure of Parliament it was eminently a question which ought to be submitted to the consideration of a Committee upstairs, who would come to a decision after hearing the engineering evidence which would be laid before them. For these reasons he should support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. PULESTON said, he had only one remark to make in reference to the opposition which the hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex had given to the Bill; and it was to call the attention of the House to a curious fact which occurred the other day. On the occasion to which he referred there was a similar discussion on another measure, and it would be found that the hon. Baronet strongly supported the second reading, urging as a reason that the second reading of a Private Bill was very seldom refused in the House itself, and pointing out that if the Petitioners could show any case against the Bill, they would have full opportunity of being heard before the Committee. [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Hear, hear!] His hon. Friend said "Hear, hear;" but he did not think that cheer was quite consistent with the course taken by his hon. Friend in regard to the present Bill.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the circumstances were altogether different. In the one case it was a new Bill; but in the other they were ~~an~~

to read a second time a Bill which had already been considered by a Committee and rejected.

MR. PULESTON said, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had already pointed out that the Manchester Ship Canal Bill was a case strictly in point. In that case the engineering evidence had been rejected by one House one year, and by the other in the next year; and although the question was entirely one of engineering difficulties, the Bill was still brought forward this year and referred to a Select Committee. Then upon what ground were they, in this instance, to reverse the usual practice of the House, and to come to the conclusion that because a Bill had been thrown out one year it must not be introduced, even in another form, in a following year? So far as he was acquainted with the procedure of the House that would be an entirely new practice. There was also another ground for referring the Bill to a Committee upstairs. Last year the promoters had no reason to expect that they were going to have any opposition, and they were not prepared, as they were now, to bring forward rebutting testimony. They would be able to do so this year, and they believed they would be able to give a complete answer to the engineering difficulties which were urged against the Bill last year. He hoped, therefore, that the House, duly considering the importance of the Bill to the public, and the fact that on some of the proposed tramway extensions all the persons interested in the property, who were the only persons who ought to be consulted, were almost unanimously in favour of the Bill, while on the remaining sections of the line the Petitioners only represented one-fourth or one-fifth of the owners and occupiers of property, would allow the measure, as the least thing they could do, to go before a Select Committee.

SIR ARTHUR OTWAY said, he had brought a very open mind to the consideration of this question; but he must say that the speeches of his hon. Friend the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), and his hon. Friend, the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), had convinced him that the Bill was one which ought to be read a second time in order that it might be inquired into by a Committee. His hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex said that his desire was to keep the tramways out of the heart of London. That was quite another question. Tramways might be a very desirable thing, or they might be objectionable; but this was not the case of an encroaching railway sending out its feeders much to the detriment of other persons. It appeared to him that the construction of this tramway would be of great advantage to the public and to the poorer classes of the community. These tramways were used mainly by the working classes; and the question he asked himself was whether this extension was desirable or not, and whether it was likely to confer benefit upon those classes? In passing, he might say that it was very much to be regretted that other subjects had been imported into the consideration of a question of this kind, such, for instance, as engineering questions, which were clearly matters to be decided by a Committee after investigation and the hearing of evidence. He quite accepted the statement of his hon. Friend who presided so ably over the Committee last year. There might have been reasons then upon which it was thought desirable not to pass the Bill; but those reasons, as far as he was informed, did not exist to the same extent this year. As he understood the project, it was that of a Tramway Company already in possession of some considerable tramway lines not in a part of London where their existence was considered objectionable, but in a part of London crowded with working classes, and leading from their doors to the nearest place where they could really obtain fresh air—namely, Hampstead. What was the object of the Tramway Company in this instance? So far as he was able to judge, it was to shorten, as an examination of the map would show that it did, the time occupied in the journey to Hampstead by about ten minutes. It was true that another matter had been referred to by his hon. Friend the Member for West Essex; but it was entirely an engineering difficulty which could not be discussed in the House itself, but must be investigated by a Select Committee, and dealt with by them in such a way as to provide for the general traffic without detriment to the public. These, however, were essentially matters for the consideration of a Committee, because such details could never be discussed in the House, nor could it be of advantage that such questions should be decided in the House. To his mind, the principle on which the Bill was founded was one of public advantage—to give the general public a better and cheaper means of locomotion which all desired to see carried out. The means by which effect was proposed to be given to that desire were questions entirely for the consideration of the Committee upstairs. For these reasons, and for higher reasons still, he thought the House would act most unwisely if it were to reject the measure; and he felt it his duty to advise the House to pass the second reading of the Bill.

MR. GILES said, that when the first tramway was laid in London it was generally objected to, and was very soon taken up. We had become wiser since, and had discovered that tramways were a great benefit to the working classes. London was now so well provided with tramways that the working classes were enabled to get into the country when they desired to do so, and to obtain not only cheaper rents, but purer air. It would, therefore, be very much to be regretted if the House were at this stage to throw out the Bill. He thought that the engineering difficulties could be much better settled by a Select Committee than in the House itself; and he trusted that the House would assent to the second reading of the Bill.

MERSEY RAILWAY BILL.

REFERENCE OF PETITION.

RESOLUTION.

SIR JAMES CLARKE LAWRENCE, in moving—

"That the Petition of Peter Williamson Dumville and Henry Daniel Davies, presented on the 17th instant, be referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, with an Instruction to report whether Standing Order 62 has been complied with,"

said, that the Petition complained of a grievance; and he did not know upon what ground the Motion could be resisted, seeing that the House had always been willing to consider grievances which were set forth in a respectful manner.

Sir Arthur Otway

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Petition of Peter Williamson Dumville and Henry Daniel Davies, presented on the 17th instant, be referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, with an Instruction to report whether Standing Order 62 has been complied with."—(Sir James Clarke Lawrence.)

MR. RAIKES said, he felt himself compelled to oppose the Motion, and he trusted that the House would not entertain it. As far as he could ascertain, there was no precedent for the course which had been taken in the matter, or, at all events, if there was, he had been unable to find it. The question was one which could not greatly interest the House; but it was, nevertheless, of considerable importance to those who were immediately concerned in it. The circumstances under which the hon. Baronet the Member for Lambeth (Sir James C. Lawrence) made the Motion were these: Mr. Dumville and Mr. Davies, the gentlemen whose names were mentioned in the Motion, had presented a Petition against the Mersey Railway Bill, which had been referred by the House to a Select Committee The Court of Referees, in accordance with the usual practice of the House, had inquired into the locus standi of the Petitioners, and, having disallowed it, Mr. Dumville and Mr. Davies were not in a position to appear before the Committee against the Bill. It was now sought, on their part, to go behind this decision of the Court of Referees, which was the recognized tribunal of the House, and to have the Bill referred back to the Examiners of Petitions on Private Bills, with an Instruction to the Examiners to report whether Standing Order 62 had been properly complied with. He understood that Mr. Dumville was a proprietor of 12 shares in the Mersey Railway Company, and that in July last he parted with those 12 shares to Mr. Davies. The Wharfedale meeting, at which the consent of the shareholders was given to the Company to proceed with the Bill, was held in February last, seven months after the transfer of shares took place. Mr. Dumville had, of course, ceased to be a shareholder; but Mr. Davies, to whom the transfer had been made, went to the office and requested to be allowed to register them in an irregular manner. He was desired to comply with the usual formality, which, although he had been in possession of the shares for more than six months, he had not complied with, and had, therefore, never become a registered shareholder of the Company. At the Wharncliffe meeting resolutions were passed in favour of proceeding with the Bill, and it was now sought by persons who had never represented more than 12 shares in the Company to have the progress of the Bill stopped, and to evade the decision of the Court of Referees by endeavouring to convert the Examiners of Private Bills into a legal Court, which they had never claimed to be, to determine a question of registration under the Joint Stock Companies Act. He ventured to think that the House of Commons, which had quite enough to do, would be unwilling to undertake a novel and embarrassing duty of this kind. As he had shown that there was no ground for the Motion, and that no precedent existed for it, he should oppose it in every possible way.

MR. PEMBERTON said, the case had been before the Court of Referees, to which he had the honour to belong, and he would explain how the matter had arisen. The House would be aware that, under one of the Standing Orders, a shareholder of a Company was not allowed to oppose a Bill introduced by the Company, provided that the opinion of the shareholders had been expressed in its favour at a properly constituted Wharncliffe meeting. The facts of the case had been fully stated by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes). There had been a transfer of shares from Mr. Dumville to Mr. Davies; and the question whether the Company were right or wrong in refusing to recognize and register the transfer was not a question for the Court of Referees. If the Company had acted wrongly, the Courts of Law were open to the persons who felt themselves aggrieved for the purpose of compelling registration, and it would have been a most improper course for the Court of Referees to have assumed the functions of a Court of Law. That was one of the reasons why he and his Colleagues came to the decision to refuse to admit this Petition; but there was a further reason—namely, that by the certificate of the Examiners, who had certified that all the proper notices had been given, and all the necessary forms had been complied with, the question had been, in point of fact, taken out of their jurisdiction. To call upon the Examiners to decide a question which a Court of Law only could deal with, and to ask them to pronounce whether the Company had or had not good reason for refusing to register the transfer, would, in his opinion, be most improper.

QUESTIONS.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—NORTH DUBLIN UNION—BANK ADVANCES.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Bank of Ireland has agreed to make advances to the Guardians of the North Dublin Union, free of interest, in the early part of each year, in consideration of the balances to credit of the Union in the later portion of the year; whether the Bank of Ireland has offered to give the loan now required by the guardians on the same terms as those agreed to by the Hibernian Bank; and, what is the issue of the correspondence between the guardians and the Local Government Board with respect to the resolution of the guardians appointing the Hibernian Bank their treasurer?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The arrangement which has obtained for several years in the North Dublin Union is that the Bank of Ireland charges the Guardians interest on overdrafts, and allows them interest on credit balances. The terms on which the loan for building purposes will be advanced by the Bank of Ireland have yet to be arranged between the Guardians and the Bank. I have already stated what the issue of the correspondence has been—namely, that the Local Government Board have declined to sanction the proposed change in the treasurership of the Union.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—MAGHERACLOGHER, &c. DIVISIONS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the decision of the Irish Local Government Board with respect to certain illegalities and irregularities affecting the elections for Poor Law divisions of Magheraclogher, Meenacladdy, and Dunlewey, which have been reported to the Local Government Board by the Rev. James M'Fadden; and, also, as to claims to vote which have been made by occupiers whose valuation is under £4 per annum, but is higher than their rent, and who are liable to pay Poor Rate on the difference between the rent and the valuation, and are not entitled by Law to deduct the Poor Rate on the amount of such difference from the rent?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The decision of the Local Government Board in this matter cannot be given for some days to come. The correspondence is not yet completed.

IRELAND—THE INCOME TAX COLLECTOR, DROGHEDA.

MR. SEXTON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether Mr. John Farrell, Collector of Income Tax at Drogheda, was dismissed by the Local Government Board from the office of Poor Rate Collector, for not having accounted for the rates; and, whether, if the fact be so, Mr. Farrell can retain the collectorship of Income Tax?

MR. HIBBERT: Mr. Farrell was compelled to resign his local appointment in 1883. On the other hand, he has an extremely good character as an Income Tax officer, and his conduct to the latest dates was very satisfactory. The attention of the Board of Inland Revenue has been called to the circumstances of the case.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE KINSALE MAIL SERVICE.

MR. DEASY asked the Postmaster General, Whether the Post Office authorities intend to make the alterations in the mail service to and from Kinsale which the Town Commissioners have suggested to them?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The day mail to Kinsale is forwarded by the first available train, and the suggestion of the Town Commissioners could only be complied with by establishing a train specially for the Postal Service at a cost out of all proportion to the correspondence to be benefited. I regret, therefore, that it is not practicable to meet the wishes of the Commissioners.

Mr. Sexton

POOR LAW EXPENDITURE (IRELAND).

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, as President of the Local Government Board, his attention has been directed to the table of expenditure of Poor Rates for twenty-one years, as printed at page 19 in the last Report of the Board; whether it is a fact that the total expenditure for the year 1883 was £1,326,963, as against £716,523 in 1863, or an increase of £610,440; whether he has observed, at page 9, that the inmates of workhouses have decreased from 206,504 in January 1851 to 49,884 in 1884; whether he has noticed that the cost for maintenance, including out-door relief, and the blind and deaf and dumb in extern hospitals, is £669,382, while the salaries and rations of officers are given at £137,025 and "other expenses" £236,438, as against £96,222 and £105,821 in 1863; whether, as the expenses under the Medical Charities, Burial Grounds, Registration, Sanitary, Contagious Diseases, Superannuation, and National School Teachers Acts are all excluded, he can say what items are included under the head of "other expenses;" what is the cause of the annual increase of establishment charges concurrently with the decrease of population; and, can anything be done to put a stop to it?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The figures given by the hon. Member are correctly quoted; but he has not taken the same years in his comparison of the expenditure with the number of inmates. Under the heading "other expenses" are included all establishment charges other than the salaries and rations of officers, such as expenses for furniture, implements, fuel, light, books, printing, stationery, drugs, medical and surgical appliances, rent, taxes, and so forth. The increase of establishment charges to which the hon. Member alludes is in a large measure due to the increased cost of the rations of officers, of which some idea may be formed from the fact that within the past 20 years the cost of inmates of the workhouse for provisions and officers has increased 40 or 50 per cent. The Local Government Board are not aware that there has been any undue expenditure, and every proposed increase of salary or emolument is carefully scrutinized.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked whether, under the heading "other expenses," any extra charges were made for duties performed by the officers of Poor Law Guardians in connection with other matters?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I have seen a list this day, and my impression is that nothing of the kind is allowed.

IRELAND—NATIONAL LEAGUE MEETINGS—COOTEHILL—INTRUSION OF THE POLICE—SERGEANT HARVEY.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Sergeant Harvey, Royal Irish Constabulary, attended a meeting of the Cootehill branch of the Irish National League, in the county Roscommon, on Sunday last, and refused to withdraw at the request of the Secretary, Mr. James O'Hara; whether it is true that Sergeant Harvey has used insulting and threatening language to Mr. O'Hara on several occasions; and, whether he will inquire into the truth of the allegations made against Sergeant Harvey?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Sergeant Harvey did not attend the meeting of this branch of the National League on Sunday last. He applied for admission to the meeting on the 12th instant, but was refused, and at once withdrew. I am informed that he has never used insulting or threatening language to Mr. O'Hara.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—GALWAY AND ARRAN ISLANDS' DISPENSARIES.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he be now in a position to make a statement in reference to the union of the dispensaries of Galway and Arran Islands?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Local Government Board have decided that they could not properly impose on Arran Island the serious financial charge entailed by the existence of a separate Dispensary Committee. The separation of the two districts could not affect or benefit the sick poor, as the members of the Committee resident on the principal Island can give orders for medical attendance whether the Committee meets in Arran or in Galway; and while the result of separation would be a very slight financial relief to Galway, it would involve for Arran the very serious addition to the rates of something like 10*d.* in the pound.

SPAIN—EXTRADITION OF CRIMINALS.

MR. GREGORY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any Treaty exists between this country and Spain by which persons who have absconded there to avoid the consequences of gross fraud or robbery in England can be made amenable to the Law, or the extradition of such persons can be demanded; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Government could make a friendly representation to that of Spain upon the subject?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: An Extradition Treaty between Great Britain and Spain was concluded on the 4th June, 1878, and is at present in force. It contains provisions for the extradition of persons accused of robbery or fraud. The Treaty was laid before Parliament during the year in which it was signed.

FISHERIES BOARD (IRELAND)—BOARD OF CONSERVATORS, COLERAINE DISTRICT.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the working licensed fishermen of Lough Neagh, upwards of three hundred in number, complain that they have power to elect only four out of twenty-four members of the Board of Conservators of the Coleraine district; whether the total number of licences of all kinds issued annually in that district is not more than about four hundred; what proportion of the funds administered by the Board of Conservators is derived from the licence duty paid by the working fishermen; whether the fishermen represent that some of the Conservators, being themselves the owners of salmon fisheries on the Bann, between Lough Neagh and the sea, are hostile to the industry of the working men who fish the lake, and have caused the institution of regulations which impede and harass the working fishermen to such an extent as to deprive them of the means of subsistence; whether the fishermen claim that Lough Neagh should be constituted a separate district; whether, the voting for elections of members of the present Board being open, the water bailiffs are in the habit of using intimidation to induce the working fishermen to give their votes for certain candidates; whether the fishermen declare that the loss of the lives of four of their body in the Lough, on the 26th November last, was caused by the want of a suitable landing place; and, whether the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries will hold a public inquiry into, and make a report upon, the several complaints in question?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Perhaps the hon. Member will kindly repeat this Question on Monday. It only appeared yesterday, and I have not had time to procure Reports on the subject.

IRELAND—EXTRA POLICE TAX (LIMERICK).

MR. LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the amount due to the Government from the Corporation of Limerick for extra police; when such debt was incurred; when was judgment recorded against the Corporation for the amount; whether the Corporation continues to resist payment of the demand; whether it is the fact that the Lord Lieutenant, some time since, invited the Corporation to a meeting to discuss a possible compromise or arrangement; whether the Corporation refused to attend such meeting; whether the Government has, for nearly a year past, allowed the matter to rest, and the judgment of the Court in its favour to remain unexecuted; and, whether the Government has enforced, and received payment, from other Irish municipal bodies of similar claims, incurred at the same time, under similar circumstances, under the same Law?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The net amount due by the Limerick Corporation for extra police down to the last presentment made, and exclusive of a sum of nearly £400 due for detachments sent into the city on occasional emergencies, is £1,305 5s. 3d., and the charge has been accruing since October, 1881. The position of the Irish Government in the matter, and their views as to the mode in which payment should be enforced, have been frequently explained, and have undergone no change. It was not until late in last year that the situation was exactly defined, and no opportunity has since offered for obtaining the legislative powers necessary to carry out the proposals of the Government. I trust, however, such an opportunity will soon arise. Other Municipal Bodies have become liable to similar claims; but it has never been necessary for the Government to resort to extreme powers with a view to enforce payment.

MR. LEWIS asked if the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to state when it was intended to introduce the necessary legislation on the subject?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: No, Sir; I cannot say when.

MR. LEWIS: I will repeat the Question this day fortnight.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES BILLS
—THE NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SIR BERNHARD SAMUELSON: I beg to ask the senior Member for South Durham (Sir Joseph Pease), Whether he is prepared to state, on behalf of the North Eastern Railway Company, what course they intend to take in regard to their Rates and Charges Bill? Perhaps the hon. Baronet will also be able to explain what course the other eight Railway Companies, who have introduced similar Bills, propose to take.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE: The North-Eastern Railway Bill was brought in in order to carry out some of the recommendations contained in the Report of the Committee on Railway Rates and Charges, especially those having regard to the classification of goods and the consolidation of those Statutes by which powers are given to the North-Eastern Railway Company to levy tolls. It proposed in the Bill also to settle the terminal question, and to subject the terminals to the control of the Railway Commission, as suggested in the Report of the Committee on Rates and Charges. While modifications of existing tolls were proposed, there was no desire on the part of the North-Eastern Company to ask for powers to increase the gross amount they could levy by the tolls already granted to them by Parliament. The Company never supposed that the provisions of this Bill would be accepted by Parliament as a solution of these difficult questions without the minutest care and criticism. They were perfectly prepared to pass this Bill in review before any of the usual tribunals of Parliament.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the hon. Gentleman, in answering a Question as to the course he proposes to take in reference to a particular Bill, is in Order in entering into a lengthened statement of the contents of the Bill, and indirectly arguing in its favour?

MR. SPEAKER: As far as the hon. Member has as yet proceeded, I have not observed any argumentative statement, but simply an explanation of what was intended to be done. Of course, any statement of the kind referred to by the noble Lord would be entirely out of Order.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE: The promoters of this Bill, from the communications they have had with traders using their railways, have no reason to suppose that they could not have been able to arrange with the traders of their own district such modifications as would have made this Bill generally satisfactory to them. Having reference to what has passed in this House from the President of the Board of Trade as to the position of the Government in relation to the Railway Bills, and also to the opposition manifested in the country, directed, perhaps, more to questions not dealt with in these Bills than to the contents of the Bills themselves—

MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Baronet to leave out any controversial matter.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE: I shall propose either not to take further steps with this Bill, or I shall ask leave of the House at an early date to discharge the Order for the second reading of the North-Eastern Railway Company's Bill; and on that occasion perhaps the House would give me leave, should I think it needful, to make some observations more in detail on the reasons which led to the introduction of the Bills, and for taking the course indicated. The same course, I believe, would be followed as regards the Bills of the other Companies.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (IRELAND) BILL—MEMORANDUM OF THE JUDGE OF THE COURT OF PROBATE.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Whether the Government will lay upon the Table, without delay, the Memorandum of the Judge of the Court of Probate upon the provisions of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Bill?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I shall be prepared to lay the Memorandum in question on the Table with some other Memoranda relating to the same subject.

ARMY (INDIA)—PROMOTION IN HER MAJESTY'S INDIAN FORCES.

MR. GIBSON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Government intend to consider the claims and grievances of the Indian Military Officers, with a view to the removal of their discontent at the present slowness of promotion?

MR. J. K. CROSS: I am not aware that discontent prevails among the officers of Her Majesty's Indian Forces in respect of promotion. Recently, on the issue by the War Office of a Royal Warrant, giving promotion in the Corps of Royal Engineers to the rank of captain in 11, instead of as heretofore in 12, years, the change was introduced in the Indian Staff Corps, promotion in which is made on the same lines as in the Engineers. I do not know that any further change is now contemplated.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that if this matter were again brought before the House, he would ask the Under Secretary if it was not a fact that the promotion of officers was better and quicker now than it ever was in the days of the East India Company?

ARMY (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—THE MARTINI-HENRY CARTRIDGE.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether any further official reports have been received from the Soudan confirming the statements in the newspapers as to the defective manufacture, and frequent jamming, of the present service Martini-Henry rifle cartridges, and the inefficiency, in many instances, after use, of the bayonets now in possession of the troops; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay such reports upon the Table; whether, without detriment to the public service, he can state what exertions are being made to substitute, as soon as possible, either by increasing the manufacture at Woolwich, or by contracting with private firms, for the present cartridges now in store in India and elsewhere, the new solid drawn metal cartridge, definitively adopted as the service pattern cartridge of the future; and, whether the new Maxim machine gun has yet been approved, and its manufacture ordered?

MR. BRAND: Further official Reports regarding the rifle cartridges have just been received; but there has not yet been time to examine them in detail. No Reports have been received as to the alleged inefficiency of the bayonets now in possession of the troops; and I would remind the noble Lord that I made a statement the other day on this point. I can only repeat the statement I made then—that in the opinion of the authorities the bayonets issued to the troops are perfectly serviceable. Supplies of cases for the solid-case cartridges to the full extent required can be obtained without difficulty from the trade; but, in the event of a final decision being taken to adopt the solid-case cartridge for use in practice as well as in the field, steps will at once be taken to alter the plant at Woolwich. The Maxim gun is now under trial, but no pattern has yet been approved.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Are we to understand that the solid-case cartridges are not to be supplied from Woolwich?

MR. BRAND: What has been done was stated by me the other day. In compliance with Lord Wolseley's urgent request, the solid-case cartridges have been manufactured for the Forces in the field. It has long been known that the solid-case cartridges have advantages over other cartridges.

MR. MACFARLANE asked if the hon. Member could say when the troops would be supplied with the new metal cartridges?

MR. BRAND: No, Sir. And I do not think it is at all desirable to answer Questions regarding the precise details of our military equipment and armament.

SUPERANNUATION AND RETIRED ALLOWANCES (IRELAND)—CORRY CONNELLAN.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If Corry Connellan has called for his pension since the debates of last year; and, if not, has it been paid to him, and, if paid, how and where was it paid?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Corry Connellan died three months ago?

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT, 1884—HOUSEHOLD QUALIFICATIONS.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the occupiers of houses of the yearly value of £4, held without any written title, each occupier paying £1 a-year as rent or ground rent, together with 4s. on account of taxes, will be qualified to be put on the roll of voters under the new Reform Bill?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): I consider that the persons referred to, assuming them to be men of full age, will be entitled to be registered and to vote under the new Act. Upon the facts stated in the Question, they appear to me to be qualified as inhabitant occupiers or tenants.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—M. DE GIERS' DESPATCH IN REPLY TO EARL GRANVILLE.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Despatch from M. de Giers, published in the English newspapers of the 22nd and 23rd, and purporting to be a reply of the Russian Government to Her Majesty's Government, is authentic; and, whether the following or similar passages occur in the Russian Despatch:—

“It is impossible for us not to trace back the cause to the military aspect with which the English Government thought it their duty to invest their boundary commission.

“We cannot pass by the facts that certain Officers in its suite directed the movements of the Afghan troops, and that the loudly proclaimed interview between the Amir and the Viceroy, and its bellicose surroundings, must certainly have contributed to embolden the Afghans to the point of committing such acts of provocation as could not be tolerated by the representatives of Russian Military authorities?”

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Until the moment arrives for presenting Papers to Parliament, it would not be in the public interest that I should make any statement in regard to documents published in the newspapers which, if they are what they profess to be, are evidently of a confidential character.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Then the noble Lord does not deny that there is a Despatch?

[No reply.]

CYPRUS (FINANCE, &c.)—REPORTED REVENUE FRAUDS.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Chief Inspector of Revenue in Cyprus has resigned his office; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will withhold their acceptance of his resignation until further inquiry into the recent revenue frauds has taken place?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I am not able to answer the first part of the Question; but as to the second, which is really the most important, I am able to reply that the day before yesterday we telegraphed to the Governor that should there be any question of resignation he should refuse to accept it until he receives further instructions.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN — DIPLOMATIC NEGOTIATIONS—TREATY OF PARIS, 1856.

MR. RICHARD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in case ordinary diplomatic negotiations have not or may not prove successful in settling the points in dispute between this Country and Russia, the Government will act on the declaration of the Treaty of Paris of 1856, which expresses the unanimous wish of the Powers who were parties to the Treaty, that States between which any serious misunderstanding may arise should, before appealing to arms, have recourse to the good offices of a friendly Power, as set forth in the Protocol of April 14th 1856?

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in voting the exceptional amount to be asked for armaments on Monday next, this House may assume that Her Majesty's Government adheres to the following declaration of the 23rd Protocol of the Treaty of Paris:—

"The Plenipotentiaries do not hesitate to express, in the name of their Governments, the wish that States between which any serious misunderstanding may arise should, before appealing to arms, have recourse, as far as circumstances might allow, to the good offices of a friendly Power;"

and, that this House and the Country may rest assured that a proposal will be made to refer any matters in dispute between this Country and Russia to such arbitration, should it so unfortunately happen that an amicable solution of them fails to be arrived at by direct negotiation?

MR. GLADSTONE: What I have to say in answer this Question is that Her Majesty's Government have never, during the course of the recent or present Correspondence, or in answer to Questions in this House, said anything to the prejudice of the idea which is put forward in these two Questions. But it must be borne in mind that every declaration made in this House in reply to a Question is virtually an announcement or a declaration to the Government of Russia. It does not appear to us convenient or desirable in the public interest that declarations to the Russian Government should be made through the channel of Answers to Questions.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether information has been received from Sir Peter Lumsden, explaining if the advance of an Afghan reconnaissance on 27th March was previous to, or subsequent to, the reconnaissance of the Russians on the same day, and to what point the Afghan reconnaissance was pushed; whether any Report from Captain Yate, with regard to the advice tendered by him to the Afghan Commander on the 29th of March, and referred to in the extract from the Letter of the Afghan Commander to General Komaroff, has been received; whether Copies of the Letter of General Komaroff, which called forth the above Letter, and of the private Letter of General Komaroff to the Afghan Commander, received a few hours before the Russian attack, have been received; whether it is known if any reply was sent by the Afghan Commander to General Komaroff's second letter; and, whether, with reference to Sir Peter Lumsden's statement that the Afghans were induced to extend their defensive position, any subsequent information has been received explaining more clearly the nature of this extension, and if a withdrawal on their part to the positions occupied on the 17th of March constituted the Russian ultimatum alluded to in Sir Peter Lumsden's telegraphic Despatch of 17th April?

MR. ONSLOW also asked whether Her Majesty's Government had received from Sir Peter Lumsden, or from any other source, information of the "incessant irritation" which Sir Peter Lumsden described the Russians as having kept up against the Afghans; and, if so, what action the Government had taken on receipt of that information?

MR. GLADSTONE: I was about to answer my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) to the effect that, owing to Lord Granville's heavy engagements, I have not been able to hold any communication with him on all the points of this Question; and I would therefore ask my hon. Friend to be kind enough to postpone it until we should have an opportunity to consider it. It is rather a nice matter whether in the end it would be desirable to carry on a detailed discussion of points of this kind with the Russian Government. I quite admit that it is our duty to take care, if, in questions of this kind, as is perfectly possible, any new light is thrown upon any point of the case, or any suggestion made which ought to lead to some extension of any explanation made by us, it would be our duty to advert to it. For the present I should be glad if the hon. Member would postpone his Question; and I must ask for Notice of the Question which has just been put by the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow).

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government are in possession of telegraphic information from Sir Peter Lumsden on the subject of his removal from Gulran to Tirpul, and the circumstances preceding and attending it; if so, whether he will communicate that information to the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: In general my answer would be that we are not in possession of any full statement at all of the reasons which determined him to remove his camp from Gulran to Tirpul. That was my impression when I heard the Question of the noble Lord yesterday; but I was desirous of refreshing my memory. What we have heard from him is as follows:—On the 6th instant he telegraphed that he had arrived at Tirpul on the previous day, with the loss of some followers in crossing the pass in a hurricane of wind and snow and rain; and subsequently, on the 10th, he reported more fully to the effect that 24 followers, including three Afghan sowars, and eight Persian muleteers, together with many mules and baggage, had perished from the inclemency of the weather. That is all the information we have had, and we can only form our own judgment as to why he took the step.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that the Russian Forces are now marching on Herat; and, whether Her Majesty's Ministers are taking any steps for the defence of that important position?

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to the first Question there is no information, and we have no reason to believe that the Russians are marching on Herat. In regard to the second branch of the Question, I do not suppose the hon. Member desires me to say more than that the subject is receiving the attention of the Government.

EGYPT—SEIZURE OF THE "BOSPHORE EGYPTIEN"—RECALL OF THE FRENCH CONSUL.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister or the noble Lord, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any information as to the French Government having recalled their Consul General from Egypt?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; we have no information.

ARMY—COMMISSIONS TO CANADIAN CADETS.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it was true that the Government had offered 25 commissions in the Army to be competed for by graduates of the Military College in Canada; and, if so, whether it was in contemplation to offer similar advantages to candidates from other Colonies who might be properly qualified?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In addition to the four commissions usually granted to that institution, 26 commissions in the Army have this year been offered to duly qualified graduates and cadets of the Royal Military College, Kingston, Canada. The Dominion of Canada is the only Colony which persesses a Military College; but the War Office is also in communication with the Colonial Office on the subject of offering, this year, a limited number of commissions in the Imperial Army to members of the local Military Forces of the Colonies.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (IRELAND)
—THE ARCHBISHOPRIC OF DUBLIN.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Prime Minister or the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with regard to the positive statements which have appeared in the Press, Whether it is true that the British Government has caused representations, through Mr. Errington, to be made to the Sovereign Pontiff, with a view of influencing His Holiness in the appointment of an Archbishop to the Catholic See of Dublin, other than the capitulary of Archbishopric of Dublin, contrary to the wishes of the clergy of the diocese?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I must ask the hon. Member to give Notice of that Question.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Does the noble Lord require Notice to answer a Question as to whether the British Government meddles in a matter of internal government like the appointment of an Archbishop of Dublin?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Yes, Sir; I do require Notice.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: When the Question of which Notice has been given by my hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) is put, I beg to give Notice that I shall ask, Whether, when Her Majesty's Government instructed Mr. Errington to interfere, they at the same time caused a copy of Vaticanism and other works of the Prime Minister to be sent to the Holy See?

EGYPT AND FRANCE—RUPTURE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it was true, as reported, that the French Government had broken off diplomatic relations with Egypt; and, secondly, whether the French Government had offered to release Her Majesty's Government from the unfortunate financial agreement in respect of Egypt to which the House recently gave its assent?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No such information has reached the Foreign Office.

Afterwards,

MR. GLADSTONE said: The answer I gave to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition just now was with respect to the information received up to that time. I am sorry to say that within the few minutes that have since elapsed a telegram has been received stating that the French Chargé d'Affaires left Cairo this morning. I am not sure of the technical term Chargé d'Affaires; but what I understand is, that it means the Representative of the French Government.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Is that communication from Cairo?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is a telegram from Sir Evelyn Baring. It has been sent down to me, and I have no doubt that it comes from Cairo.

MR. BOURKE: Will the right hon. Gentleman state whether or not there is any other telegram from Sir Evelyn Baring leading up to that one?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked whether the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would now answer his Question as to whether the French Government had broken off diplomatic relations with the Egyptian Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The information given by the Prime Minister is all that is in possession of the Foreign Office.

MR. O'KELLY asked if the noble Lord could state under what conditions the French Chargé d'Affaires has left Cairo? Had he merely gone on a visit to Alexandria, or was there any diplomatic reason for the step?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: There are no details. The actual words received by the Foreign Office have been given to the House.

MR. O'KELLY asked whether it was M. Barrère or his Representative who had left Cairo?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: M. Barrère is in Paris sitting on the Suez Canal Commission. It must, therefore, be his Representative.

MR. O'KELLY inquired whether the Government would telegraph to Sir Evelyn Baring to ascertain under what circumstances the French Chargé d'Affaires had left Cairo, in order that the House might know the facts as soon as possible?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no doubt that in the ordinary course we shall receive full information, and it will not be necessary to make a special inquiry. I should take the information which I have just given to the House as a proof that the Agents of the British Government will communicate with us with all possible rapidity.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) BILL.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I shall place on the Paper this evening my Amendments to the Redistribution Bill; but I am anxious to take the earliest opportunity of mentioning to the House a difficulty which has arisen with regard to Westminster. I stated in Committee that I thought a fair case had been made out from the opposite side for treating Westminster as an ancient borough, and for assigning to it four Members instead of the three which had been allotted to it by the Bill. I had made inquiries of the Leaders of the Opposition, and had found that it was their opinion that the additional seat required should be taken from some other part of London. I examined which was the least under-represented part of London, and, finding this was the centre of the Tower Hamlets, I suggested to the Committee that the seat must come from thence. I undertook that Sir John Lambert and Sir Francis Sandford should, after local inquiry, advise us as to the division of Westminster into four, and should also advise us as to the re-division of the Tower Hamlets. Their Report will be circulated to-morrow morning, and will contain maps. It yesterday came to my knowledge that the Leaders of the Opposition so greatly disliked the proposed division of Westminster, and so greatly preferred the original division into three, which had been made by myself without the advice of the Boundary Commissioners, as to lead me to doubt whether it will be wise for me to propose to go forward with the changes which I had intended to make. I regard those changes as mutually dependent, and I should be prepared to revert to them should I find a decided change of opinion on the other side of the House.

Mr. O'Kelly

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked if the right hon. Baronet would amplify his statement by saying which Leaders of the Opposition had informed him of their views—which Leaders wished Westminster to have four Members, and which Leaders wished it to have three? Otherwise, isolated Members of the Party had great difficulty in knowing what course to take.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I must say that the Leader of the Opposition wished for four as against three.

MR. W. H. SMITH intimated that when the right hon. Baronet proposed to reduce the number of Members for Westminster he should oppose it.

MR. GORST asked whether, when the Amendment was proposed, the right hon. Baronet would take into consideration the feelings and views of the inhabitants of Westminster as well as the opinions of the Leaders of the Opposition?

MR. RITCHIE asked whether the claims of the Tower Hamlets to have seven Members was to be dependent upon an agreement between Her Majesty's Government and the Leaders of the Opposition as to the representation of Westminster?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that if Westminster was to have four Members instead of three, the additional seat was to be taken from the Metropolis. He should propose that it should be taken from the Tower Hamlets.

MR. RITCHIE inquired whether it was an open question with the Government whether the additional seat was to be taken from the Metropolis or from some town in the Provinces?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE replied that, on former occasions, he had stated that there had been a suggestion made that an additional seat for Westminster might be obtained from other sources besides the Metropolis.

MR. ONSLOW remarked that, as communications appeared to have been going on between the Leader of the Opposition and the Government, he should like to ask the Leader of the Opposition what course he proposed to ask the Party to take on this question?

MR. RAIKES said, that, as the Mover of the Amendment, he would remind the right hon. Baronet that it was unanimously accepted by the Committee. He wished to ask, if upon Report there was still a strong feeling shown as to the claim of Westminster to have four Members, the right hon. Baronet would adhere to the decision already arrived at by the House?

MR. BRODRICK suggested that a seat might be taken from one of the over-represented counties in Ireland.

MR. LEWIS observed that Wolverhampton was an over-represented borough from which a seat might be taken.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that Wolverhampton was mentioned on a former occasion as one of the boroughs from which a seat might be taken. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University that the view which met the general concurrence of the House was that the question of dividing Westminster into four districts should be decided on the advice of the Boundary Commissioners.

MR. RITCHIE wished to know whether, in the event of the Tower Hamlets retaining its seven Members, there was to be any fresh scheme of redistribution, or whether the original scheme of the Bill was to be carried out?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that, in the event of the Tower Hamlets retaining its full number of Members, the original scheme of division would be carried out, and there would only be a change of name, the separate divisions continuing parts of the borough of the Tower Hamlets.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Leader of the Opposition what the arrangement was with regard to Westminster and the Tower Hamlets?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I can only say that I understood it was the wish of the House to change the number of Members for Westminster from three to four, and I entirely approve of that alteration. That, however, involves a change of the redistribution of the divisions of Westminster. But when the re-arrangement of the borough came to be made the division which was suggested and approved by Sir John Lambert and Sir Francis Sandford appeared to me and to the right hon. Member for Westminster to be an unfortunate division, and one which would not be satisfactory to the people of Westminster; and I certainly intend to support my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) in his endeavours to obtain a better division for the borough than that proposed by the Schedule.

MR. HEALY asked whether the arrangement between Lord Salisbury and the Government was that any arrangement come to by the Boundary Commissioners the Government pledged themselves to carry through the House; and whether, in consequence of that, the Government had refused every Amendment in the case of Irish divisions, whereas they had consented to a change in the case of Westminster?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE replied that the division of London and the Metropolis generally was made by himself, and not by the Boundary Commissioners.

VISIT OF H.R.H. THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES TO IRELAND— THE CITY OF LONDONDERRY.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true, as stated, that the Prince of Wales is, on his visit to Derry on Saturday next, to receive an address from the local Orange and apprentice boy parties; whether the Orange address is to be presented by Mr. Robert M'Clintock, who was rebuked by the Lord Chancellor for his participation in an Orange apprentice boy meeting on the 1st of November last, when two Nationalists were shot and badly wounded, and for which one apprentice boy was convicted and sentenced to a long term of imprisonment by Justice Murphy, who described the Orange proceedings as "the wild work in Derry;" whether, on a previous Royal visit, party riots took place, in which the police shot dead three men; whether, under the circumstances, and having regard to the local party feeling, it is deemed desirable that addresses should be received from societies and individuals notorious for violent party displays; whether a demonstration of protest by the Nationalists is to take place; whether, at a meeting of the Royal Reception Committee in Derry, a vote on the subject of the propriety of receiving the Orange Address was taken, when the Committee equally divided, three Presbyterian Liberal magistrates, one Catholic Liberal magistrate, and one Presbyterian Liberal merchant protesting against the arrangement for receiving the Orange Address as a party affair; whether, some days previously, the Address of the County Derry Liberal Union was refused on the ground that the visit was non-political; and, whether the Government will take steps to prevent possible disastrous consequences on the occasion of the Royal visit to Derry by advising against the reception of the Addresses referred to?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I telegraphed to Ireland this morning, but have not yet received a specific Report with regard to the matters of fact on past occasions referred to in this Question. I understand, however, that no addresses have been received or will be received by His Royal Highness from associations which are in their constitution distinctly political, and no addresses are received which contain any political allusions. The addresses from the Orange Lodge and Apprentice Boys of Derry will not be allowed to be presented as a Party display; and as no partizan character attaches to the addresses, it is hoped that no Party feeling will be evoked which might mar the peaceful character of the reception. It is needless to add that steps will be taken to prevent any disturbance arising from any mistaken conception as to the character of the addresses. The Government are fully alive to the existence of a strong Party feeling in the City of Derry, and to the importance of taking every precaution to prevent disturbance.

MR. PARNELL: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that the Orange Lodges and the Apprentice Boys Association are not political organizations?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I am neither an Orangeman nor an Apprentice Boy; but they utterly deny that they have any political meaning, and that is the general understanding.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 110.]

(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 23rd April.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Special provisions as to voters in 1885) agreed to.

Mr. Parnell

Clause 2 (Power of Lord Lieutenant in Council to prescribe forms).

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, in rising to move an Amendment, to leave out the first part of the clause down to the word "not," in line 22, for the purpose of inserting—

"The forms contained in the First Schedule to this Act, or forms to the like effect, may be used for the purposes of the Parliamentary Registration Acts in substitution for the corresponding forms used for the same purposes before the passing of this Act."

said, that the object of the Amendment was to alter the manner in which the forms for carrying into effect the Parliamentary Registration Acts were to be prescribed, in consequence of the decision which had been come to by the Committee upstairs in connection with the English Bill. There were two ways of settling the forms in regard to registration; one by Order in Council, and the other under the authority of the Act which would require the forms themselves to be embodied in the Act. The Committee upon the English Bill had resolved that it would be better to prescribe the forms in a Schedule attached to the Bill; and as this clause in the Irish Act gave power to the Lord Lieutenant in Council to prescribe the forms, the object of the Amendment was to omit that power, and to substitute a Schedule in which the forms required for the purposes of Parliamentary registration would be set out.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 17, leave out from beginning of Clause 10 the word "and" in line 22, and insert "The forms contained in the First Schedule to this Act, or forms to the like effect, may be used for the purposes of the Parliamentary Registration Acts in substitution for the corresponding forms used for the same purposes before the passing of this Act."—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. HEALY said, he thought the Amendment showed how unfairly the Irish Members had been treated in having been allowed no representation whatever upon the English Committee. If there was one subject which was highly technical and complicated, it was the question of registration in Ireland; and he would point out to the Government that, in the forms proposed to be included in the Schedule, there were a series of gross mistakes. The forms themselves were only laid on the Table yesterday, and hon. Members had not had very much time to look into them; but in the short time which had been allowed he had been able to detect very extraordinary errors. He did not propose to discuss the Schedule now; but he simply desired to point out that the best mode of promoting the despatch of Business would be to pass the Schedules, when they had gone through the clauses, with little or no debate; and then, when they had the Bill reprinted, for the Government to give a week or 10 days for consideration, and, if necessary, re-commit the Bill in respect of the Schedules. No questions of policy would arise upon them; but they involved matters of technical detail which could not be agreed to hurriedly. He certainly did not think it would be fair to Ireland to allow English forms, shaped by English lawyers, without a single Irish Member being on the Committee, and in which he could already discover several blunders, to be accepted, as they stood, for Ireland. For instance, the 1st Schedule related to the precept of the Clerk of the Peace, and of the Clerk of the Union, and towards the end of No. 2 appeared these words, as a ground of objection—

“Firstly, if such person shall not have been rated in the then last rate made for the relief of the poor as the occupier of the same lands, tenements, or hereditaments, in such copy of register mentioned of a net annual value of twelve pounds or upwards.”

There were several mistakes in that passage. One had reference to the rating, because under certain circumstances, by the provisions of the Franchise Bill, a man need not be rated at all; and he (Mr. Healy) had an Amendment to provide for such a state of things. The Government might say that that was the law at present; but the object of his Amendment was to make the law fully declared, and he saw no reason for the insertion of this extraordinary clause about being rated in the last rate made for the relief of the poor. It was quite clear to his mind that the words about rating should not occur in this Bill; because, if they were going to have household franchise, there was no necessity whatever to be rated in order to have the vote, and he did not understand that that was the opinion held by the hon.

and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. Then, again, he might point out in No. 3, headed “the supplementary list of ten pounds rated occupiers,” it appeared to him that after the work “register,” and in all subsequent precepts of the same character, it would be necessary to insert the words “or objected to therein.” The paragraph would then read in this way—

“You are also to make out, and, together with such copy of register for the said polling district or division of the said polling district, transmit to me a supplemental list [Form 11] of every male person of full age not appearing already on such copy of register who shall be rated in the last rate made for the relief of the poor or objected to therein.”

There clearly ought to be such a Proviso, and it should run all through these forms. In some of the later precepts he proposed to insert Amendments; and, therefore, he was not in a position to agree generally to these forms. He wished to know from the hon. and learned Solicitor General, or the Chief Secretary for Ireland, whether, if he agreed to the forms as they now stood, when the Bill was ready for Report, it would be re-committed in respect of the forms? In the first place, however, he would ask the Chairman whether, if the Committee accepted the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment, and thereby agreed to accept the forms in the Schedule of the Bill, they would be afterwards debarred from amending the Schedules? That was to say, that by agreeing to the Amendment they would accept the proposal to insert the forms in the Schedule, but only subject to amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member asks whether, if the Committee accept the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, they would be debarred from subsequently amending the Schedules? No; I think not.

MR. GIBSON said, that he had read the Schedules himself with great attention, both yesterday and this morning, and he had sent them to Ireland, in order that they might be considered by those who were better acquainted with the Registration Law than he was himself. As had been stated by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), the questions involved in these Schedules were of a very technical character. He would assume that they must have been prepared by the Law

Officers of Ireland, with the assistance of others who were acquainted with the matter; and he would be glad if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would say whether they had been prepared merely with a view of applying the new Reform Bill to the existing Registration Law, and to permit the registration to take place this year, as soon as possible after the passing of the Bill? Was that the object with which these Schedules had been prepared? Assuming that he received an affirmative answer to that question, he would suggest that, if this stage of the Bill was passed with these Schedules in it, after very little discussion, there should be a distinct understanding that they would not be debarred from using any information which might come, either from Ireland, or from their own examination of the Schedules, and that on the Report stage their right of criticism, revision, and amendment would be preserved.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he could assure his right hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Gibson) that the Schedules had been prepared with the single object of bringing upon the Register the different persons who were entitled to vote as £10-rated occupiers, and for the household and service suffrages. There was no other object whatever in preparing these Schedules, and he had himself intended to suggest that it would be desirable, after the Schedules had been adopted, that time should be given, in order that they might be thoroughly examined, because, originally, the Bill was framed in another way; and, therefore, it was only reasonable that such time should be allowed, and that either on the Report, or in some other way, the Schedules should be fully considered. It was not necessary that he should answer the objections to some of the forms which had been made by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy); because there would be an opportunity afforded for discussing them. He would be glad if, when his right hon. and learned Friend received information, he would point out to him (the Solicitor General for Ireland) any point which would assist in carrying out the object of the Bill—namely, to bring upon the Register any person who was entitled to be upon it.

Mr. Gibson

MR. LEWIS said, that nothing would be more inconvenient than to alter the Schedules on the stage of the Report, when it would not be possible to answer all the questions which might be raised on minute matters of detail. What occurred to his mind was this—that the body of the Bill should be settled, and then that the question of the Schedules should be adjourned for a few days, until they could make up their minds with regard to them. That would be the most sensible course to adopt, in order that the Schedules should be made as intelligible as possible. He thought it would be impossible to alter them satisfactorily with the Speaker in the Chair, and that they would never be able to get to the end of them. He would, therefore, suggest that they should go through the Bill now, and set the Schedules apart for another day. It could not be a matter on which there would be any great difference of opinion; and, with regard to the English Bill, it had been considered that day in the most friendly spirit.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, it was only reasonable that considerable time should be given for an examination of these complicated Schedules; and he quite agreed that it would be desirable to stop the Bill when they got to the Schedules.

MR. GREGORY said, he thought there ought to be some communication with gentlemen who were interested in the question of Irish registration. Therefore, it was advisable to go through the Schedules, in some sort of conference, in order to see how far they agreed, or what points of difference arose. From his own experience, in dealing with the English Registration Bill, he knew the difficulties that might arise, and he thought it was necessary that there should be some communication of that kind.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he would be very glad to adopt that suggestion.

MR. GORST said, he would say a word to confirm what had fallen from the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory). He was quite sure they would never get these forms satisfactorily settled, except by having a conference of that kind, either by the appointment of a Select Committee, or in some other way, by means of which Members, who had actual experience of Irish registration, might meet together and settle the forms. The English forms had been settled in a very short time, and without the slightest difference of opinion.

MR. PARNELL said, the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) had intimated that he thought some reasonable time ought to be given to the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) for the purpose of obtaining advice from Ireland in regard to these Schedules, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland subsequently stated that he thought considerable time should be given. Now, he (Mr. Parnell) was of opinion, with regard to this matter, that it was most desirable the Bill should proceed with all reasonable speed, and that it should not be behind the English or the Scotch Bill. The conduct of the Government had been, he thought, in this matter, very negligent. He agreed with his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Healy) that, in the first instance, the Bill should have been printed long before it was printed; but the Irish officials did not seem to be able to make up their minds for a long time as to what the provisions of the Bill were to be. Secondly, the Bill was not printed until long after the English Bill was printed, and no Committee was moved for the purpose of considering it, as in the case of the English Bill. Ireland was not even given a Member on the English Committee; in fact, it was represented to the Irish Members that it was not necessary for them to have a Member on the English Committee, as the Bill entirely concerned the English registration. They now found that a vast mass of matters had been imported into the Irish Bill by the English Committee. The consequence of all this was that an excuse for delay was afforded to the Front Opposition Bench, and their Friends in that House, and it would be necessary for the Irish Members to raise a very serious question. If some considerable time, according to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, was to elapse before the Bill was again taken up, and before anything was again to be done, the other measures might come on before it. The Redistribution Bill might come on on Report and upon the third reading, and this Bill might be altogether left behind. He should regard such a circumstance as most disastrous; because it might afford an excuse for the House of Lords to object to any additions which might be made to the Bill by the House of Commons, and, in fact, to repeat the course which they had several times adopted in years past. He, therefore, wished to have a clear understanding. He desired to know, in the first place, whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) considered it necessary that the Bill should be re-committed; and, secondly, whether the Government considered it necessary that the Bill should be re-committed in reference to the Schedules? If not, whether they were of opinion that the Report stage would be sufficient for the examination of the Schedules; and, if so, at what date they proposed to take the consideration of the Report? Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University consider that Wednesday next would be appropriate for the Report stage, and that it would afford him sufficient time for making inquiries? If it were fixed for any later date, and any considerable time was occupied in inquiry, the result would be a great and dangerous delay in the reprinting of the Bill. He, therefore, thought it his duty to ask for some further understanding from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland as to the delay which would take place.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the Government had only two objects in regard to the Bill, one of which was to get it passed as quickly as possible, which, for reasons other than those which had been mentioned by the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell), was of great importance to the country. That was, therefore, the first object; but it was further desirable that those who were interested in the matter should not be deprived of a reasonable opportunity for considering the provisions of the Bill. The hon. Member for the City of Cork had spoken as if the Government had allowed the English Committee to frame part of the Irish Bill. Nothing of the kind had been done. The Committee on the English Bill upstairs did not frame this Bill; but they decided that the forms, instead of being fixed by Orders in Council, should be embodied in the Bill itself, in Schedules attached to it; and it was felt desirable that the same thing should be done for Ireland as was done for England. Therefore, the Government had added to the Bill, which was originally a small and simple Bill, these rather cumbrous Schedules. He admitted that they did contain a good deal of complicated material; but he did not think that any thorny matters were involved. Still, as the Schedules were complicated, it was only reasonable that time should be given for their consideration. The hon. Member complained that a proposal had been made which involved a loss of time before the re-committal of the Bill, and suggested that the Schedules should be considered and reported. They were quite ready to adopt that suggestion; but the complaint which was made was not unreasonable—namely, that matters of this sort would not be so well discussed in the House as in a Committee. Personally, he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) was willing to take either course—either to re-commit the Bill in regard to the Schedules; or to stop the progress of the Bill, in order to get the Schedules discussed consistent with a reasonable opportunity of obtaining the opinion of persons interested in the question. He could not say now to what day it would be necessary to adjourn the Bill; but he could assure the hon. Member it would be the earliest day they could get.

MR. GIBSON said, he would point out that the delay had been suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy). He (Mr. Gibson) had not suggested it himself. He had only said that with 25 pages of Schedules it was only reasonable to give time for examining them.

MR. SEXTON said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland maintained that the English Committee had not been allowed to draft the Bill. He (Mr. Sexton) contended, on the other hand, that they had, in point of fact, drafted a very vital part of it, because it appeared that the forms inserted in it were to be those which were considered suitable for use in England.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

Sexton) was under a misapprehension. All the English Committee decided was that the forms in regard to the English Bill should be inserted in the Schedule, and not fixed by Order in Council; but they did not prescribe what the forms were to be. There were two courses open—either to insert the forms in Schedules attached to the Bill, or to settle them by Order in Council. As the first course had been adopted in the case of the English Bill, it was considered desirable to pursue the same course in regard to the Irish Bill.

MR. SEXTON said, that, at any rate, the principle of the infusion of the Irish forms in the Bill was decided by the English Committee. It was to be regretted that no Irish Member had been upon the Committee, and hon. Members who had been engaged in other Committees upstairs had not, as yet, had an opportunity of perusing the forms. Those forms extended over a considerable number of pages; but they were told that they contained nothing upon which there was likely to be a difference of opinion, and, therefore, might be dealt with at any time with very little legal help. He thought the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was a fair and proper one, and that it would be very easy, on the Report, with the Speaker in the Chair, to settle and discuss the question. He wished to understand whether or not the Government consented to the suggestion of his hon. Friend—that they should discuss the Schedules on the Report of the Bill, and that they should take the Report on Wednesday? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had said that the House had two objects—first, to pass the Bill; and, secondly, to afford a reasonable time for the examination of the Schedules. He (Mr. Sexton) thought the examination might be completed in a very short space of time, and he was most unwilling that the progress of the Bill should be unnecessarily delayed. He thought they were all agreed as to the necessity of passing the Bill as quickly as possible; and, personally, he should be disposed to insist, as far as he could, on the Bill being allowed to hold its place in the relative progress of the three Bills which it now occupied, and that it should not be allowed to fall behind either the English or Scotch Bill. At present, it was in front of the three Bills, and it ought to be allowed to retain that position. It could not be forgotten that on two previous occasions the will of the House of Commons had been overborne by the House of Lords, who had twice thrown out an Irish Registration Bill passed by the Lower House. The Irish Members, therefore, required some security and guarantee as to the date on which the Irish measure would be sent to the House of Lords, so that they should be able to know what the decision of that House was before the other Bills were sent up. If the Irish and Scotch Bills were submitted before a definite verdict were obtained with regard to the Irish Bill, the Irish Members might find themselves in a hopeless position, and the Government would be unable to take any definite action. The House of Lords might even throw out the Bill, as they had done on former occasions. Therefore, the pivot on which the whole question turned was this—that the Irish Bill should retain its present place in the order of procedure, and, if it was at all practicable, that it should be the first Bill to be sent up to the House of Lords. He also wished to know how Clause 2 was intended to operate if this Amendment were inserted? It provided that—

As the Amendment stood, the forms now provided in the Schedule were to be the forms adopted without any power of alteration. He wished to know if those forms were to be always permanently used?

MR. WARTON said, he would suggest that after the words “Parliamentary Registration Acts,” in the Amendment, the words “and this Act” should be inserted, or it might be held that the forms inserted in the Schedule did not apply to the last Registration Act. He presumed it was the object of the Government to carry out the provisions, not only of the previous Registration Acts, but also of the Act now being passed. He would propose an Amendment to that effect for the purpose of eliciting the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor-General for Ireland.

Amendment proposed, to amend the proposed Amendment, by adding, after the word “Acts,” the words “and this Act.”—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, this Act would be cited as “The Registration Act, 1885,” and, therefore, it seemed to him that it would come under the description of “Parliamentary Registration Acts” proposed to be inserted in the clause.

MR. HEALY said that the object of the Irish Members was an intelligible one—namely, that by whatever means it might be obtained, whether by recommitting the Schedules, or not recommitting them, but taking them upon the Report stage, the Bill should not be unduly delayed in finding its way to the House of Lords. They insisted upon having some security upon that point. They knew that the House of Lords would destroy their chances, if they possibly could. They had already proved their malice twice, and he did not wish to give them another chance. He complained strongly that the Government had not brought in the English and Irish Bills together. He had asked the question over and over again, but had never got a satisfactory answer. They had received a pledge, two years ago, from the Prime Minister, which had not yet been redeemed, and they had no promise that it would be redeemed. What he wished to know was, whether, now the Bill had been brought in, it would not be left to the mercy of the House of Lords to play what pranks they pleased with it, at the instigation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (MR. GIBSON), who had moved a number of Amendments without caring whether they were accepted here, but confiding in his Friends in the other House to adopt them? Therefore, the Irish Members would have no guarantee whatever that anything the right hon. and learned Gentleman proposed would not be ultimately carried, and he wanted to know what the position of the Bill would be with regard to leaving the House?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, there was every intention on the part of the Government to carry on the three Bills pari passu. They were all required for the same purpose, and there was no intention of unduly delaying them.

MR. HEALY asked when the Report would be taken?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he was unable to say at present, and he would point out to the hon. and learned Member that he himself had originally proposed that there should be delay. The Government were anxious to proceed expeditiously with the Bill, consistently with a fair discussion of it. Some hon. Gentlemen suggested that it should be discussed on the Report; but, in dealing with technical matters of this kind, a conversation would be better than a formal discussion; therefore, personally, he should prefer to have it in Committee. It would not cause the Bill more delay than the other course.

MR. LEWIS said, the Committee had now been engaged for some time in discussing what day should be fixed for the Report instead of considering the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It certainly appeared to him (Mr. Lewis) that, instead of making progress with the Bill, they were really going backward.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he was not prepared to rule that the discussion was out of Order, because it was intended that the subject to which the matter referred should be considered on the Report.

MR. WARTON said, he imagined that the Amendment now before the Committee was the one which he had moved.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that Amendment would not be in Order yet, because the Committee had not yet decided to leave out the words proposed to be omitted by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

Amendment (Mr. Warton), by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SEXTON said, that, before they arrived at the conclusion of the conversation, it was necessary to know how the Schedules were to be disposed of, and at what time they would be taken. At present, the English Bill had only been read a second time; and in the case of the Scotch Bill, the Speaker had simply been got out of the Chair. What he wished to know was, when the Chief Secretary for Ireland said that the Irish Bill was to proceed pari passu with the other Bills, whether they were to continue to occupy the position they now occupied; and, whether the initiative of progress would rest with the Irish Bill as at the present moment?

MR. TREVELYAN said, that, in considering the important Business yet to be disposed of in connection with the electoral system, it was impossible to give an absolute pledge of precedence, especially as it would be necessary to consult the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board, and several other Members of the Government who had taken an active part in the proceedings. His (Mr. Trevelyan's) experience of Registration Bills led him to desire to see them sent up to the House of Lords as early as possible. He would promise, on the part of the Government, that they would see that in this matter the Irish Registration Bill should not be left behindhand. He hoped that hon. Members would accept that promise.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. WARTON said, he believed that he would now be in Order in moving his Amendment—namely, to insert, after the words "Registration Acts," the words "and this Act." If the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) would look at that part of the clause which they had just struck out, he would see that the words were "the Parliamentary Registration Acts and this Act." He thought that, on reconsideration, the hon. and learned Gentlemen would see that his (Mr. Warton's) Amendment was necessary.

Amendment proposed, to amend the proposed Amendment, by adding, after the word "Acts," the words "and this Act."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that he had no objection to accept the Amendment; but he did not think that it was absolutely necessary.

MR. HEALY said, he would call attention to the words "as near thereto as circumstances may require," in line 25, which were made to apply to the form prescribed in connection with the registration of Parliamentary voters. He wished to know what they meant?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN thought there was a little ambiguity in the words, but he did not think they would do any harm.

MR. HEALY remarked, that in Ireland, on one occasion, a number of processes had been rendered void, because the County Court Judge held that the words should have been "County of Cork" instead of "Cork County." What he was afraid of was that the Revising Barristers might rule all the objections on the Tory side to be in order because they were "as near thereto as the circumstances required;" while, on the other hand, they would rule out all the objections on the other side because they were "as near thereto as the circumstances required." He thought it would be better to secure literal accuracy in the words used in the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Committee had not yet reached the words at which this question arose.

Question put, and agreed to; words added accordingly.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. WARTON, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 24, to omit the words "so prescribed," for the purpose of inserting "the forms in the said Schedule contained," said, that he partly adopted in this proposition an Amendment which had been placed on the Paper by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It was quite clear that the words "so prescribed" must be left out, because they were simply an echo or trace of what had already been omitted.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 24, to leave out the words "so prescribed," in order to insert the words "the forms in the said Schedule contained,"—(Mr. Warton,) —instead thereof.

Question, "That the words 'so prescribed' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'the forms in the said Schedule contained' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. HEALY said, he would admit that there would be some difficulty in striking out the words "or as near thereto as circumstances may require." He was only afraid that by keeping them in, if ever the other side made a mistake, they would get the benefit of it; whereas the National Party, if they made a mistake, would receive no benefit. He thought it would be far better, however, to have the forms in the Act described accurately, and therefore he would move his Amendment. He would also ask the Government if they had made any provision for the supply of these forms, and how the forms themselves were to be procured?

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 25, to leave out "or as near thereto as circumstances may require."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he was afraid if they were to adopt the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Healy), it would tell much more against him than he supposed, because if there was the slightest variation from the form an objection would hold good. As to the question of the forms to be supplied under the provisions of the Registration Act, printed forms would be supplied. But with regard to the Amendment, he thought it was extremely undesirable that the franchise of any man should be endangered by the omission of a single word, or a letter, in a mere form, because there happened to be a clause prescribing that all the forms contained in a Schedule of an Act of Parliament must be literally followed.

MR. HEALY said, he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 26, to omit the words, "And anything in connexion with the said registration done in accordance with the said Order in Council or as near thereto as circumstances may admit, shall be deemed to be validly done."—

(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. HEALY asked the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland to answer the question, whether forms would be procurable at a cheap rate?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) was understood to say that there would be a Schedule of rates.

Question put, and negatived; words struck out accordingly.

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 3 (Dispensing relief not to disqualify, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 68).

MR. GIBSON said, he had to ask the Committee to agree to the Amendment he had placed on the Paper, proposing to omit the clause entirely from the Bill. The clause provided that—

"Medical or surgical assistance, or the giving of medicine under any Act relating to Medical Charities in Ireland, should not be deemed to constitute relief under the Acts for the more effectual relief of the Destitute Poor in Ireland within the meaning of the Representation of the People Acts."

Now, he thought hon. Members would see from that recital that that provision of the Bill purported to make a very grave and serious change in the laws relating to the representation of the people, not only in respect of Ireland, but also in respect of other parts of the United Kingdom. He held that it would be obviously contrary to common sense to make such a change in the Representation of the People Act, as that it should be enacted that persons receiving indoor relief should be permitted to exercise the franchise, as it would be equally foreign to the considerations which were usually supposed to prevail in these matters, to permit those who were in receipt of outdoor relief to exercise this franchise. But this was a proposal on the part of the Government to obviate that reasonable restriction, and to enact that, notwithstanding the past and present practice under the existing law, the franchise should be exercised by those who deliberately appealed to public medical aid. He repeated that this was a clause which, if it were retained in the Bill, would constitute a very serious innovation of the existing law. A few evenings ago, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had stated to the Prime Minister that his object was to insure that the Registration of Voters Ireland Act should work an absolute assimilation of the law as administered in England and Scotland. ["No, no!"] He could assure the hon. Member below the Gangway that the words used by the hon. Member for the City of Cork were "absolute assimilation." He contended, however, that there was no such provision nor anything like such a provision as that provided for in this clause in the law of England; and although he always spoke with great diffidence of the law of Scotland, he believed he was correct in saying that there was no similar provision in the law of Scotland either. But the Committee would understand that it was a very serious thing, with reference to Ireland, to propose to introduce an alteration in the law not known in Scotland, and not proposed to be introduced in the case of England. Why, he asked, should this change be made against the corresponding laws in England and Scotland; on what foundation did it rest; on what argument of justice or common sense, or on what plea of a sounder administration of electoral law could it be defended? He ventured to think if the principle of this clause were enacted in the Bill that it might result in fast-and-loose play of the gravest possible character in respect of the administration of the Poor Law in Ireland. He reminded the Committee that if it were introduced as a proposition sanctioned by Act of Parliament, that the recipient of dispensary relief should be qualified to vote, it would be but a step further in the same direction to say that the recipient of outdoor relief should be qualified to exercise the franchise, and the whole system of the Poor Law of the country would be exposed to attacks, which he ventured to think would lead to serious consequences. Further, he did not think that the exceptional enactment of the principle of the clause would add to the self-respect of the voters in Ireland: on the contrary, he believed it would lead to the impairing of that independence of character and status which the country had a right to expect in those who were permitted to exercise the franchise and return Members to Parliament for the administration of its affairs. He remembered a leading Member of that House pointing out, in a great discussion which took place on one of the Reform Bills, that one of the most serious and grave dangers that would have to be guarded against in the future would be a lax administration of the Poor Law under the new system; and he (Mr. Gibson) could but think that such a provision as this would, particularly if it were enacted exceptionally for Ireland, amount to the introduction of a laxity of the gravest kind. Medical assistance in Ireland was intended to be given to those who could not pay for it themselves—that was to say, to those persons who were really in need of it, and could not procure it. Although it was desirable that those who required medical relief should have it, yet he must point out that the dispensing of medical relief in Ireland was a practice which, in many cases, had been the cause of scandal and abuse; and doctors had been summoned by what were called “red tickets,” or “scarlet runners,” to assist those who could very well pay for themselves. And if it were found that in an Act of Parliament, it was permitted, sanctioned, or encouraged that persons should receive dispensary relief and still retain their right to the franchise without any qualification whatever, it must lead to the extension of an abuse which pressed already very hardly on the Medical Profession in Ireland, inasmuch as it would appear to have received the sanction of Parliament. The arguments relating to this question lay within a narrow compass, and they were so obvious that he did not think he should be justified in pressing them at greater length upon the Committee, or in occupying further time in the consideration of the subject; but if any arguments should be used, or any statements made, which rendered it necessary that he should re-enter the discussion, he reserved to himself freedom to say a few more words in support of the Amendment which he now begged to move.

MR. SEXTON said, they were accustomed to these arguments from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). They always listened to him with great respect, and saw in him the apologist and champion of the Poor Law in Ireland. But they had the right hon. and learned Gentleman telling them to-night that the Dispensary Poor Law had been greatly abused. Well, he (Mr. Sexton) was ready to admit that he had seen some allegations to the effect that the dispensary regulations had been called into operation under questionable circumstances; but his own experience was, that those allegations related only to a very minute proportion of the cases in which medical aid was dispensed. Moreover, the details of dispensing medical relief under the Poor Law was as completely under the supervision of the Local Government Board as the details of any other Department; and the Local Government Board was composed of persons so vigilant—excessively so sometimes—and of persons whose conduct was so closely watched in that House, that he ventured to say no suggestion deserving attention at their hands would be passed over, and that if there had been any accidental abuse of the provisions of the Poor Law in this respect the Local Government Board would have taken good care to check it before that time. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had certainly perplexed him in the course of his speech with the argument that that House ought to strike out this clause in order to preserve the independence of character and status of those who voted. But whether men were independent or not, they were not in the habit of going to a doctor of their own choice; they did not go to the dispensary for pleasure or recreation. If a man went to a doctor, no matter the class to which he might belong, he went to him because he was ill; and, therefore, he did not see how the independence of character of the persons concerned could be brought into this question at all. He said that this independence of character and status for which the right hon. and learned Gentleman was so anxious could be maintained, even though poverty might compel the individual to accept the aid of a dispensing doctor. If a man were able to pay for the medical assistance which he received for nothing, there was, of course, an abuse which ought to be corrected; but, looking at the matter from the other point of view, if the individual were unable to pay the doctor for the medical aid that was necessary for him or his family, the requirements of humanity and civilized life demanded that the aid of the doctor should be given to him or his family free. And if that necessity were met, how could anyone contend that a man should be deprived in consequence of the first right of citizenship, because he had not preserved his independence of character and status? He supposed, as it would seem from the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that a man's independence was to be measured by the length of his pocket; but he (Mr. Sexton) declined to accept that view of the case, and he repeated that a man's status might be perfectly independent, even if his poverty deprived him of the necessities of life. Let the Committee consider the great disproportion that existed between the fees exacted by medical men in Ireland and the incomes of the poor class of men in that country. The right hon. and learned Gentleman in the course of his remarks had delivered himself of a curious fact when he spoke of the absolute assimilation of the law in respect of the three countries, England, Scotland, and Ireland, which he stated the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) intended to bring about. [Mr. Gibson: I quoted the report in The Times.] He (Mr. Sexton) cared not for the report in The Times; he asked who was the writer of that report? Was he a sworn shorthand writer? He had heard his hon. Friend often speak of assimilation of the law; but he had never heard him reach the superlative term of "absolute assimilation." There could be no such thing as absolute assimilation of laws; because the first necessity of law was that it should conform itself to the circumstances of the country in which it had to operate, and as no one would say that the circumstances of England and Ireland were similar, there could be no absolute assimilation of law in respect of them—it would be impossible to apply an absolutely similar principle to the people of the two countries at large. The people of England, as compared with those of Ireland, were better able to live and pay the doctor; and the existence of medical aid societies was a recognized fact in England. In dealing with the poor, the doctor's fee in England was almost nominal; but, so far as he was aware, the Irish doctors as a class were not in the habit, except under compulsion of the "red ticket," of discharging any medical function for their fellow-creatures unless on payment of a guinea. Now, what, he asked, was the use of expecting poor people in Ireland to pay a guinea, half-a-guinea, or even half-a-crown, for any medical attention received from a private practitioner? The thing was an impossibility; and if they could not pay, why should it be suggested that they should be shut out from the exercise of the franchise? Here was a classification of the agricultural holdings in Ireland. The number of holdings of one acre and under was 49,000; of from three to five acres, 53,000; of from five to seven acres, 59,000; and of from seven to 15 acres, 39,000. There were in Ireland more than 200,000 holdings of between one acre and 15, occupied by families who were drawing their living from them, after satisfying the landlord by paying rent and taxes. Now, he asked if any Member of the House would have the hardihood to go to the Table and say that the income of any one of those holders of farms was such as to allow them to pay a single guinea to the doctor in the course of a year? The whole scale of medical fees in Ireland must be reduced, unless it was to remain outside the means of the population to pay for medical relief; and he challenged anyone to show in the case of the poor people of Ireland, and in face of the incomes they derived from the cultivation of their holdings, why, being unable to pay the medical fees at present demanded by the Profession, they should in addition to that have the penalty inflicted upon them of not being allowed to vote. They contributed to the rates; and that being so, they had a right to expect and to receive something in return. However, the Government had inserted a clause in the Bill which he considered to be perfectly just in principle; it would have been a mockery to do otherwise, and the only construction he could put upon the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was that, while endeavouring to exclude the class of persons in question, he hoped that the object of the recent extension of the franchise might be defeated by a side-wind.

COLONEL NOLAN said, as a general rule, hon. Members on those Benches were glad to listen to the speeches of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) on Irish affairs, because he had knowledge of the subjects on which he usually addressed the House; but, in the present case, he (Colonel Nolan) believed the right hon. and learned Gentleman knew very little of the subject practically. He was an eminent barrister, and he had lived long in Dublin; but there was nothing, or very little, in common between the people of that city and those of the districts of Ireland principally concerned in this question. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, moreover, was a statesman a good deal drawn upon by the Conservative Party, and who was in the habit of attending and speaking at large meetings in England; but he (Colonel Nolan) did not think that he knew much of the so-called "scarlet runners" in Ireland. He (Colonel Nolan) had given away many of those tickets in his capacity of secretary to one society and chairman of another, and he ventured to think that he represented the feelings of the people on the subject as well as any man in Ireland. He knew that the Boards of Guardians held strong views on this point. If the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman were adopted by the Government, and the clause under notice struck out of the Bill, it was believed that the Franchise Act, so far as an enormous number of the people of Ireland were concerned, would be a farce. With regard to the refusal of medical men in Ireland to take less than the fee of a guinea from the very poorest men, it was felt that this was something that must be changed—and it must be changed either by the general consent of the Medical Profession in Ireland, or else by action on the part of the Government. He wished to point out, however, with regard to the fees exacted by medical men in Ireland, that although they received £1 for their assistance, they saw or attended the individual three or four times for that amount. But were they to enact that because a man could not pay £1 for medical aid when he or his child, for instance, were ill, he should be deprived of his right to vote? He (Colonel Nolan) could assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that it was not solely a question of "scarlet runners" that was involved here. Even if a person in employment who might be considered tolerably well off were ill, he was expected to go to the dispensary in the nearest town for advice and medicine; and it was absurd to say that unless people in that position paid a guinea to the doctor they should lose their vote. Then there was another argument in favour of retaining this clause in the Bill. The country was talking of war, and were they to say to officers in the Army and Navy that they would be disqualified because they received gratuitous medical advice. Everyone knew that they had gratuitous medical advice; and did the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that those officers lost their independence of status and character when they went to the surgeon of their regiment or ship? The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the people in Ireland would lose their independence if they did not pay for medical relief. But he (Colonel Nolan) said that every one of the men who paid £6 or £7 rent for the land they farmed did pay for it. They paid for it in the shape of poor rates to the extent of 5s. or 6s. a-year; and if any of them only drew to that extent for medical aid, he contended that they were independent men. And the right hon. and learned Gentleman would shut out a man who got five or six shillings' worth of advice, although he paid a large sum for poor rate. Since he (Colonel Nolan) was a child, the old system of medical relief for the poor had been superseded by the present dispensary system. That system had been established in Ireland, and the people had been trained up to it. But for that system, medical aid clubs might have been established in Ireland; but they had not grown up there, and it would take 40 or 50 years to build them up. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman would say to the people—"Because you have not established these clubs, you shall be shut out from the franchise altogether." If the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman were adopted, the most frightful confusion would be created; clerks of Unions and apothecaries would have to be summoned before the Revising Barristers to say whether they had given tickets and medicine or not; people would be called upon to produce their books and documents to satisfy the requirements of the Act; and all that, he need not say, would cause an enormous amount of trouble. Speaking with regard to his own county of Galway, if the clause which the Amendment proposed to strike out were retained, he did not believe there would throughout the county be two contested cases before the Revising Barrister; whereas if the Amendment were adopted, it would be very easy to have 20,000 such cases. If this clause was not passed, the Committee would be upsetting the whole Poor Law system in Ireland, and they would go a long way towards reversing the principle on which the Franchise Bill rested.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he thought his right hon. and learned Friend who moved the Amendment before the Committee was under a total misapprehension as to the operation and scope of the Medical Act in Ireland. That Act, before the passing of the Medical Charities' Act, constituted the system of relief in Ireland. It provided for dispensary districts administered by subscribers, and the present law was simply engrafted upon it and adapted to it. The Committee would find that in the Act the words "poor persons" were most carefully used, and that the words "persons in receipt of Poor Law relief" were as carefully avoided; and he would point out that the reason why this was done was simply this—that not only were the circumstances of the great mass of the people in Ireland totally different from those of the great mass of the people in England, but that the Poor Laws of the two countries were likewise different. The number of people who could receive outdoor relief and medical relief in England was much larger, in proportion to the rest of the population, than it was in Ireland; and not only were laws in Ireland much more restricted than in England, but the administration of them was more restrictive. When the present law was made, the Guardians were left to decide whether individuals came within the meaning of the words "poor persons" or not. Not only was there a different practice in respect of some Unions, but it was easy to see that John Smith, for instance, might be a poor man in the eyes of people in his neighbourhood, while he would not be considered to be so by persons who lived a few miles off. If, therefore, they were to disqualify persons who received medical aid free, Parliament would not only be doing a respectable class of persons a great injustice by excluding a large number of them from the exercise of the franchise, which right had been just conferred upon them, but it would lead to inextricable confusion in view of the varying rules and practice prevailing in the different Unions of Ireland. How it could ever have entered into the mind of his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin to make the proposal that was now before the Committee, he (Colonel Colthurst) was unable to conceive; and he could only suggest that he had never thoroughly considered the Medical Charities Act, what it was intended to do, and what it had done in Ireland.

MR. BRODRICK said, it would appear, from the views expressed by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), that he thought that the acceptance of medical relief almost amounted to a qualification for the exercise of the franchise. That was a sufficiently startling proposition; but when the hon. and gallant Member proceeded to argue that because officers in the Army and Navy were entitled by the Regulations of those Services to medical advice they also ought to be disqualified—why, he (Mr. Brodrick) thought the hon. and gallant Member might have gone the length of proposing to disfranchise convicts in gaol, who also received medical relief; and it would do to talk about at election time quite as well. He thought the question of equality as between the two countries was worthy of consideration; and if any inequality should exist in that respect hereafter, it would surely be greatly to the disadvantage of the hard-working English labourers who had been admitted to the franchise, who had subscribed, and were subscribing, considerable sums of money to societies in order to avoid placing themselves in the position of having to apply for free medical assistance. When the Irish labourers did the same thing, that would be about the period when it would be desirable to give this class of people in Ireland the vote; and Parliament would avoid doing what he and others on the Opposition side of the House had protested against all along—namely, the giving to a class of voters, the equal of which did not exist in England, the entire preponderance of the Irish franchise, a preponderance which was pointed out, when the Franchise Bill was under discussion, to be as large as 458,000 in 760,000. The houses of these men were under £1 valuation. It would be an exceedingly good thing if, by the absence of this clause, every one of these men were cut off from the franchise; and it was upon that ground, and largely in the hope that a considerable number of the constituents of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), or those who would be the constituents of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, would be prevented from outvoting the intelligent classes of the community—those who had a stake in the country—that he (Mr. Brodrick) would vote against the inclusion of this clause. He hoped the Government intended to listen to reason. The hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) pathetically appealed to the Government not to allow this Bill to be dealt with adversely by another Chamber owing to its being sent up so late. If the hon. and learned Gentleman really felt the force of his own appeal, he would support him (Mr. Brodrick) in objecting to the inclusion in the Bill of provisions which no Chamber was likely to consider proper or right. It was exceedingly likely that the House of Commons would see the Bill again if they sent it up to the House of Lords containing such a monstrous and unequal provision as that which was now included in it. If the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) retained this clause in the Bill, it would be very desirable, when the proper time came, to change the name of the measure from “The Registration of Voters (Ireland) Bill” to “The Registration of Voters and Paupers Enfranchisement (Ireland) Bill.” Before he sat down he wished to say that it was perfectly well understood, during the progress of the Franchise Bill last year, that even the Prime Minister most strongly objected to leaving Ireland out of the Bill, on the ground that, although he did not profess the class of voters was the same as in England, he thought that there should be absolute equality of franchise. If that rule were to be observed on this occasion, the Government could not fail to strike out this clause. If, on the other hand, they retained the clause, it was a breach of the most positive statement of intention on the part of the Government. He hoped that the Government would see fit to exclude this clause from the Bill.

MR. GORST said, he was not quite so ferociously virtuous as the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Brodrick). No doubt, it was a very attractive and general principle, and one that he (Mr. Gorst) had always supported in the House of Commons—that England and Ireland should be treated exactly alike, in all matters of principle, at all events. In England it was the law that persons who were in receipt of parochial relief, in which medical relief was included, were not entitled to enjoy the franchise; but he understood from the admirable speech delivered by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the County Cork (Colonel Colthurst) that in Ireland the administration of medical relief was entirely separate from the ordinary administration of poor relief. It, therefore, seemed that in England and Ireland the receipt of medical relief did not stand on the same footing. If a person received medical relief in England, he received ordinary parish relief, because parish medical relief was dispensed in England exactly in the same way, and under precisely the same conditions, as common parish relief. There was no doubt that in the incidence of the franchise in England, this fact had led to great abuse; indeed, he had heard great complaints made that the power of dispensing medical relief had been used by unscrupulous politicians in English parishes for the purpose of disfranchisement. He remembered well a case in which a doctor, who was paid by the parish for attending the accouchement of the women of the lower classes, attended indiscriminately the wives of voters upon both sides of politics; but he put down on his list only those who belonged to the Party to which he was opposed, thereby disfranchising all the husbands; whereas the husbands of the women on his own side of politics retained their votes. This showed in itself how the dispensation of medical relief was abused. Of course, there were cases in which a man might be driven into the receipt of medical relief whether he pleased or not; and, therefore, it was clear that this was a kind of relief that could be abused, and could be used for political purposes. If it was possible, even in England, to separate the receipt of medical relief from the receipt of ordinary poor relief, he should be much inclined to support such a separation; but in England it was not possible, whereas in Ireland it was. It appeared that in Ireland, owing to Act of Parliament, the administration of medical relief was separated entirely from the ordinary distribution of public charity. Now, he would like to call the attention of the Committee to the way in which the English poor, in a precisely analogous case—that was in the case of the receipt, not of medical relief, but of educational relief—were treated. Where an English labouring man was not able to pay the school fees for the attendance of his own children at school, he was entitled to go to the Guardians, and from the Guardians to obtain out of the Poor Law funds the amount of the fees to be paid for the education of his children. Now, that was a case of the receipt of public money, receipt in a certain aspect of Poor Law relief, but it was receipt of a kind of relief which was not the ordinary poor relief; it was not connected with the administration of the ordinary Poor Law relief. A man was bound by law to send his children to school, and to pay certain fees; educational relief, therefore, was not at all the same thing as relief in the shape of food and clothes. Under these circumstances, was a poor English labourer disfranchised? No, because, by the Elementary Education Act, it was specifically provided that the parents who were unable, by reason of their poverty, to pay the fees of their children in public elementary schools, could apply to the Guardians, and the Guardians, being satisfied with the inability of the parents to pay the fees, should make such and such grants, and then it was expressly enacted—

“That the parents shall not, by reason of any payment made under this section, be deprived of any franchise right or privilege, or be subjected to any disability or any disqualification.”

He was entirely with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) in treating the poor in Ireland exactly as they treated the poor in England; and finding that they did not disfranchise the poor in England who obtained, by reason of their poverty, additional relief, he was inclined to vote against the disfranchisement of the poor of Ireland who, by reason of their poverty, received medical relief.

DR. LYONS said, he did not believe the Medical Profession in Ireland had any desire whatever to stand in the way of the enlargement of the franchise. This clause, however, raised a difficulty of long standing, and one which it was to be regretted had not hitherto been dealt with. It was to be regretted that Her Majesty's Government had not condescended to take the advice of one or two persons thoroughly acquainted with this matter, because, if they had done so, the difficulty might easily have been removed. It could not be properly said, or said with a shadow of truth, that the Irish people had not received very generous assistance, under all circumstances, from the Medical Profession. The people themselves were the first to recognize that fact. The remuneration of the medical men was not at all adequate to the amount of assistance they rendered in very many cases. The real difficulty in the case arose from the system of “red tickets.” That system had been made for a series of years an engine of oppression and extortion upon the Medical Profession. Unfortunately, in many instances, persons of the farming class considered that, in times of prosperity, they were entitled to enforce the gratuitous attendance of the doctor just as they did in times of adversity. The habit of receiving gratuitous medical relief grew upon the people, and they remained under the impression that they were always entitled to receive that relief, no matter how great their prosperity might be. As an instance of the “red ticket” system being used, as he had said, as an engine of oppression, he might tell the Committee that if a medical man was disliked in his district, the expression had become common—“We will soon red-ticket him out of the place.” “Red tickets” were very easily given;

there was no sort of control with regard to the issuing of them; everyone liked to be generous in that which cost him nothing, and the small shopkeeper was always ready, on the slightest pretence, to tell a customer—"Oh, I will send the doctor to you." It often happened that doctors were sent many miles to attend the most trumpery cases. Of his (Dr. Lyons') own knowledge, he knew of a case in which a patient living at a considerable distance expressed a great desire to see a new "iron horse" the doctor had got. A "red ticket" was issued to the applicant, and the doctor—who used a bicycle, his salary not enabling him to keep a horse—was sent seven miles, with the result that he saw the so-called patient standing at the door, who, then and there, frankly stated the circumstances under which the "red ticket" had been issued. The system of "red tickets" was one he had always looked forward to devising some means, with the consent of the House, of remedying. There was no insuperable difficulty in the matter. The clerk of the Union and the relieving officer had full knowledge of the circumstances and financial position of all persons in their districts, and nothing would be easier than to classify those at all times entitled to gratuitous relief, and those whose position enabled them to pay a fixed moderate charge. He thought that in times of prosperity the well-to-do people of Ireland should be obliged to pay a fair amount for medical assistance; and he asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) whether he could not, on this occasion, give some pledge that he would, on an early day, take steps to prevent the abuse he (Dr. Lyons) had indicated?

MR. HEALY, interrupting the hon. Gentleman (Dr. Lyons), asked whether it was in Order for an hon. Gentleman in the House, who was supposed to be addressing the Chair, to speak to himself?

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons) had not condescended to tell the Committee who were the one or two persons whom the Government ought to have consulted on this matter; but, if he was right in assuming that the hon. Member was one of those persons, he (Mr. Charles Russell) was exceedingly glad that the Government had not consulted him. He thought it would be a source of great injustice in Ireland if this clause were not retained in the Bill. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) mixed up with the question of the retention of this clause, and so did the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons), the question of the possible abuse of the system of giving white or red tickets. There might be the abuse indicated; but that was not the question before the Committee; that was a matter which could be redressed, and ought to be redressed, by the action of the Local Government Board, to whom application could be made, if any hon. Members would put them in possession of the facts. Dismissing the question altogether of the supposed abuse in the distribution of medical relief, upon the general question he had only one word to say. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the county of Cork (Colonel Colthurst) and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had made this matter very clear. His hon. and gallant Friend near him (Colonel Colthurst), who understood the actual working of the system well, and who therefore was entitled to speak on the matter, had pointed out how the system worked, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had made it clear to the Committee that the relief was such that it was not in truth considered by the people of Ireland as parochial relief. He was sure that no one who knew the feeling of Ireland would suppose that the person who received outdoor relief in Ireland, or parochial relief inside the Union, was regarded at all in the same category as the small farmer who, in the case of necessity, applied to the medical officer to put down disease, which was not only a matter of relief to a particular individual, but also a matter of great concern to the public generally. He could not but think that a great deal of the argument that had been addressed to the Committee, although it had not been disclosed, was really dictated by the kind of feeling which was obviously in the mind of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodrick), who, in truth, wanted by this side-wind to undo, to some extent, the effect of the Franchise Bill itself.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, there was one aspect of this question on which he should like to address a few words to the Committee. It was perfectly clear from the debate that this was really not merely a question of registration, but a question of the extension of the franchise in Ireland. It had been argued by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that without this clause the extension of the franchise in Ireland, which had been already assented to by Parliament, would be largely inoperative. That being so, the question naturally occurred why this matter was not dealt with by Her Majesty's Government in the Franchise Bill, rather than in the Registration Bill, and whether it was reasonable or not to ask the House of Commons, after the question of the franchise had been settled by common agreement, that this question should be re-opened, so far as it affected Ireland, by the clause that was now before the Committee? Now, Her Majesty's Government had themselves, in previous debates during this Session, adopted the principle that it was not right to re-open the question of the franchise, because, when Amendments upon that point were moved by various Members in the Committee on the Redistribution Bill, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), while admitting in more than one instance his own sympathy with the Amendments proposed, declared the Amendments could not be considered, as the question was already settled. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) suggested, a fortiori, that it ought not to be re-opened by a Registration Bill which purported to be merely a measure for enacting such alterations in the law as might be necessary to carry out the Franchise Act which had been already passed, and the Redistribution Bill which was now passing through the House of Commons. But it was contended that the circumstances of the Medical Charities Act in Ireland and the Poor Law system of England were so essentially different, that if the alterations now proposed were made in the Irish law, they would be no precedent for any similar change in the English law. No one in the House could speak with more knowledge on the subject than the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Cork (Colonel Colthurst), and he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) admitted what the hon. and gallant Gentleman had said with regard to the different administration of the Medical Charities Act in Ireland, and the system of Poor Law medical relief in England. No doubt, in Ireland the medical charities were not administered by officials of the Poor Law. It was a separate system altogether, and therefore it had come, as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) had said, to be looked upon by not a few of the population of Ireland as really no system of Poor Law relief at all. Well, that was the strongest testimony that could be given by any hon. Member to the truth of the facts alluded to by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), and subsequently dwelt upon by the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons)—namely, that there was considerable abuse in the administration of the Medical Charities Act in Ireland. It was admitted by high authorities that abuse of the system did exist. [Mr. HEALY: What is the supervising authority?] The authority supervising was unquestionably the Local Government Board; but when persons who were legally appointed to administer the system, and those who came under it, looked upon it from the point of view of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) did not think it would be possible for the supervising authority to check the abuse. He did not agree with the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Cork as to the essential difference between the Irish and English systems. The essence of both of them was that they consisted of relief paid from public sources—paid by the ratepayers—whether it was administered by those who were intrusted with the administration of medical relief, or by the Poor Law Guardians; and in his humble opinion, if Parliament agreed to this change in the law with respect to Ireland, it was striking a very dangerous blow at the whole electoral law of the United Kingdom, which made the receipt of relief a disqualification for the franchise. It had been urged by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham, that the arguments which had been used should not preclude the adoption of the clause, for the reason that the administration of medical relief in England could not be so separated from the administration of other relief as to leave the acceptance of other relief a disqualification, while the acceptance of medical relief remained no disqualification. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) did not wish to put his opinion on a question of law against that of the hon. and learned Member; but he could not help thinking that it would be almost as easy to repeal the law in England which made the acceptance of medical relief a disqualification as to repeal the law which applied to Ireland. It was a matter of great social interest whether the acceptance of relief under the Poor Law system in England, or under the Medical Authorities in Ireland, should be felt by those who received it to be of the nature of relief from public sources, or should be looked upon from the point of view suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell). Any hon. Member who had watched the progress of Poor Law outdoor relief in Ireland for the last 15 or 20 years, would know that this idea of relief—being in the nature of a charity rather than a relief from public sources—was not without considerable danger in Ireland. It was a great danger in England, too. On looking at a late Report of the Irish Local Government Board, he had seen that the amount expended in outdoor relief in Ireland had doubled during the last 10 years, whilst the expenditure on medical charities had increased 20 per cent during that period. He thought that if the disqualification for the exercise of the franchise was a bar to anyone who could really do without it from seeking for relief of this kind, it was a good thing from a social point of view to retain that; but, at any rate, he did not think that a change should be made in the law without the whole system of disqualification for the franchise being seriously considered by Parliament. He believed that it would be generally admitted by the Government and the House that the acceptance of what was called medical relief was not consistent with that independent frame of mind on the part of the voter to which the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had alluded in his speech. He thought it ought to be a disqualification for the franchise; and, therefore, he very much regretted that Her Majesty's Government should have felt it necessary to raise this important question, and propose this important change, in this Bill, which, he ventured to submit, had no proper connection with the subject. If Her Majesty's Government intended to effect this alteration in the law, the question should be raised directly, and on its own merits, and not brought forward in a measure of this sort.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would first allude to the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons). He knew several dispensary doctors in Ireland, and was aware that they occasionally had patients who paid them; but he could repudiate that they were willing to purchase immunity from the grievances they had to complain of by the disfranchisement of a large portion of their fellow-countrymen. He believed no body of men could be more surprised or indignant than they would be on finding their case mixed up with the question of the disfranchisement of their fellow-countrymen. He was convinced that they would endure ten times more rather than lend their sanction to the efforts of the hon. Member, or of anybody else, to bring about the disfranchisement of a large portion of the Irish people. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) would say this to the Committee generally—namely, that there was no proposition which could come before them in connection with this Bill, or any other Bill this Session, which could more clearly test the legislative capacity of this Assembly and its legislative grasp and its statesmanship than its method of dealing with this question. This was one question which would show the people of Ireland whether or not there was an awakening intelligence in this House as to the manner in which Irish questions should be dealt with. For what did the arguments against this clause all mean? The hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodrick) deserved the gratitude of Irish Members and of the Committee generally. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) that the hon. Member for West Surrey was the one speaker on this occasion who had given the real reasons of the Party to which he belonged for the attitude they had taken up. The real reason—and let the Committee face it and know of this hostility—was not a desire to raise the social status of the Irish citizen, but to keep down that social status by depriving the people of a voice in the destinies of their own country. The real reason had been stated by the hon. Member he had mentioned, who had been candid enough to say that, if he could have his way, 50 years would elapse before the mass of the Irish people would have any voice in the control of their own affairs.

MR. BRODRICK: I said I hoped it would be long before those persons in receipt of medical relief in Ireland were admitted to the franchise.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Yes; but the hon. Member had connected that with a statement that the persons holding small portions of land in Ireland were unfit to exercise the franchise. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) put the two statements together, and interpreted them by saying that the hon. Member's opposition to this proposal was based on a desire to deprive the poorer classes of the Irish people of any voice in the control of their own affairs. The right hon. Gentleman—a late Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach)—had disclaimed all hostility to the measure; but the right hon. Gentleman would be inconsistent with his whole career if he did not offer most vigorous hostility to everything like Irish reform. What were his arguments? He proposed to go round all the arguments of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst); but he was careful to overlook the most pregnant of those arguments. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham had pointed out that a large number of the people of this country were receiving what was practically out-door relief by having their children educated in the Board schools, although no one proposed to make that a bar to their exercising the franchise. Nothing could be more fallacious or more absurd than to suppose that things called by the same name in England and Ireland meant the same thing in the two countries. They found this fallacy existing in connection with almost every proposal which had ever been made in the interests of Ireland. With regard to land-

lordism, a mistake of that kind had been made. The landlord of Ireland and the landlord of England were so totally different that they might almost be called by different names. So was it also with this system of medical relief. In England there was a variable scale of all doctors' fees. The hon. Member for the City of Dublin said that nothing could be more mythical than the supposition that a guinea was given as a fee in all cases to a doctor in Ireland; but, in spite of that observation, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) maintained that every medical man in Ireland who would accept anything less than the ordinary fee of a guinea would be "Boycotted" by the rest of his Profession. What was the case in England? Why, if they went into the poor parts of London, they would find open dispensaries where a bottle of medicine and advice was given for the small sum of 6d. Anyone acquainted with the relations existing between medical men and their patients in this country would know that it was possible to get medical assistance in England at a price infinitely below that charged by the doctors in Ireland. Some people said—"Why do not the Irish form clubs for medical assistance?" The answer was that there was not that system of social education among the Irish people to enable them to do it which existed in England. [MR. BRODRICK: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member cheered that observation. He had found fault very much with these poor people for being paupers, and had said that because they held small portions of land they should be deprived of the Parliamentary franchise; but he had not observed that the hon. Member had accompanied that observation with any reproach to the landlords, who were content to take a considerable amount in the shape of rack rent from these poor people. In England they had this system of clubs, and of opening practically free dispensaries, and they had a variable scale of medical fees; and they compared a system of that kind with the system prevailing in Ireland, which required a medical man to charge no less than a guinea under penalty of being "Boycotted" by the rest of his Profession. He should be very much surprised if the majority of the English Conservative Party followed the lead of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) on this occasion. The right hon. Baronet, an ex-Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, had asked why this had not been brought on in the Franchise Bill? Well, it would be more convenient if right hon. Gentlemen in the responsible position of the right hon. Baronet would pay a little more attention to the history of questions like this. If he had paid a little more attention to that history he would know that the proposal was made in the Franchise Bill, and was ruled out of Order, and as not germane to the Bill, by the Chairman. That was the reason why the clause was brought forward in the present measure. Finally, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) must altogether object to what he might almost call the hypocritical plea—that this clause was opposed because of a desire to improve the social status of the Irish people. He had said before that the object was to keep the status of the Irish people as low as possible by depriving them of any voice in the control of their own affairs. He would go further, and say that this Bill, if passed in an unamended form, while producing an apparent equality in regard to the franchise between the people of Ireland and the people of England, would be an absolute mockery and a delusion when accompanied by the disfranchisement of so many voters.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, they had had two separate estimates of the value of this clause; the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had said—and he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) was disposed to agree with him—that it lay in a very small compass indeed. But the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had taken a much higher ground, and had told them that this was a supreme test of the legislative grasp of the House of Commons, and of its statesmanship. He (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) did not deny that that was one aspect of the case for which there was something to be said, though it was his experience in the House of Commons that the words statesmanship and statesmanlike were always applied to that particular line of conduct which the hon. Gentleman speaking at the time happened to prefer. He himself did not profess to have an accurate criterion as to the conduct of any Member of the House; but, to come to the point, it seemed to him that they ought to consider what was the rationale of the disfranchisement of those who might seek to obtain medical relief in Ireland, if it were not because they were supposed to be in a position of dependence. A man who received parish relief in an ordinary sense—and there was no indoor or outdoor pauper, as no doubt all would agree, who was in a position of independence—could not be admitted to the franchise. It would be against public policy to admit him; but then came the question, was the kind of relief they were now discussing of such a nature as to interfere with the independence of the person who received it? The Government had come to the conclusion that it was not; otherwise, of course, this clause would not have appeared in the Bill. The system in Ireland had been sufficiently explained to the House to-night, and whatever might be the merits or demerits of that system about which they had heard so much, it appeared to him nothing to do with the question before the Committee; and this, at all events, was certain—that, if any accusation was brought against the present system in Ireland, it was this—that persons of too high a class of the community took advantage of the system; and therefore, from that point of view, it was not so liable to the imputation of interfering with the voter's independence as it would be in other cases. It was said, indeed, that the system was bad; but if it was so bad, this, at any rate, was not the way to improve it. If it was a bad system, injurious to the community and so forth, then, in the name of reason, let them set about reforming it; but do not let them try to reform it by a side-wind in this way by imposing the penalty of disfranchisement upon those who were obliged to take advantage of it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had spoken of this as introducing a change in the law. (He Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) did not know that that point had been taken up; but it was a very open question whether it was a change in the law at all; it was rather, in the view of many competent and qualified persons, a declaration of what the law now was.

If that question had not been raised, he was not disposed to raise it himself; but, even if it were a change in the law, he should not be averse to it on that account. What was the object of the opposition to this clause? The hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodric) had, with most captivating frankness, told them a good deal upon that point. He (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) could admire and appreciate the consistency of the hon. Member, because he believed he was himself opposed to the extension of the franchise to a lower class of voters in Ireland; and, therefore, he was willing to take advantage of any means which could keep them out of it. But the House of Commons could not take that line at all. All of them who were willing and consenting parties to the Bill passed at the end of last year surely could not now by this subterfuge—because it was nothing less—disfranchise those to whom it had been understood to be one of the objects of the Bill to give a vote. On the other hand, the object might be—and he could appreciate the motives of those who acted under that contention—to bring pressure to bear upon the people in order to prevent what seemed to him to be an abuse of the present system. That, he maintained, was a thing not to be done in this particular way. If it were to be done, let the Local Government Board see to it, and if they were unable to do what was necessary, then let the Legislature be resorted to. Do not let them in this roundabout way use the electoral arrangement of the country for the purpose of effecting this object. He did not think it was necessary to go into the matter any further. As the right hon. Gentleman opposite had said, the matter lay in a very small compass, it had been now well discussed, and he trusted that they might be allowed to take a division upon it.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 76; Noes 20: Majority 56. — (Div. List, No. 126.)

Clause 4 (Appeal where Chairman or Revising Barrister refuses to state a case. 41 & 42 Vict. c. 26, s. 37) agreed to.

Clause 5 (Polling districts).

MR. HEALY said, he would like to ask whether the Government had considered the question of providing polling districts, and whether they would consider the necessity of providing also additional Revision Courts? In the case of the county of Dublin last year, they had offered, if necessary, to pass an Act to enable the Lord Lieutenant to make additional provision for the county of Dublin. Now they would be having a tremendous number of new voters coming in, and it would be perfectly impossible to have them properly attended to unless there were an additional number of Revision Courts. He believed the Lord Lieutenant had power in some cases, with the consent of the Privy Council, to appoint additional Revision Courts; but there was great difficulty in getting the consent, and, unless pledges were given that money which was available would be used for this purpose in Ireland, they would be placed in an unfortunate position in regard to this subject. They had provided for additional Revising Barristers, and, that being so, there was no reason for their not providing that they should do the work in one district and then in another.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, there was sufficient power under the Act of 1873.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to point out that they had now arrived at a new state of things, owing to the large increase that was being made in the constituency. He wished, therefore, to ask whether the Lord Lieutenant would reconsider the entire question, and whether also the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland would give the matter his attention? It was important in a large number of cases, in which the number of voters upon the lists would be enormously increased, that a sufficient number of Revision Courts should be provided—say, one Court for every 1,000 voters—so as to render them easily accessible to the new voters.

MR. CALLAN said, he thought the Government ought so to arrange that the voters should, if possible, be able to attend Revision Courts within seven miles of their own residences. Although he himself represented the smallest county in Ireland (Louth), he found that in the Southern Division of that county voters would have to walk a distance of 17 miles for the purpose of maintaining their right to be upon the Register. If it was necessary, under the old system, that the electors should have polling places within four miles of their residences, he did not see why, under the new Act, which so largely increased the number of electors, it should not be necessary to have Revision Courts within a distance of certainly not more than seven miles. Unless some such suggestion were carried out, and some pledge given on the part of the Government to the Representatives of the Irish people that the labourers should not be compelled to walk a distance of 17 miles for the purpose of maintaining their rights, in the face of some threepenny objection, a large number of voters would be subjected to very considerable hardship. As far as the Lord Lieutenant was concerned, they had very little hope of obtaining what they required from that authority. Attention had been drawn in that House time after time to the injustice perpetrated under the existing system; and they certainly had a right now to ask the Government to consent to such an enlargement of the number of the Revision Courts in Ireland that the agricultural labourers, who would now be placed on the Electoral Roll, should not be compelled to walk enormous distances in order to maintain their right to vote. It would be a great scandal if such a thing were permitted, for if men had to walk a distance of 17 miles one day, they would hardly be in a condition to do any work the next. He thought, therefore, that something more was required than the mere assertion of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland that the matter was one in which sufficient power was given to the Lord Lieutenant under the existing law. The Act referred to had been in operation for 11 years, and during all that time the Lord Lieutenant had had ample opportunities of considering the matter; but in no single instance, as far as he (Mr. Callan) was aware, with the exception of the county of Dublin, had the Lord Lieutenant increased the number of Revision Courts.

MR. HEALY: Yes; in the county of Monaghan.

MR. CALLAN said, Monaghan was another exception.

MR. HEALY: It was for the benefit of the Tories.

MR. CALLAN said, his hon. and learned Friend was right. What was done in Monaghan was on behalf of the Tories, and no such enlargement was ever made in any other part of Ireland than those mentioned. Under the Act of Parliament, the Revising Barristers would receive £100 additional salary for holding their Revision Courts, and they were only called upon to sit an average of two days in the 12 months. They could not, therefore, complain if they were inconvenienced to some extent by holding additional Courts; and certainly it was they, and not the electors, who, if anyone, ought to be inconvenienced.

MR. HEALY said, he would remind the Committee that they were now considering line 25 of the clause, which proposed to revise certain Acts referred to in the Schedule. It should be remembered that the Ballot Act gave a Revision Court to every polling or Petty Sessional district—he was not quite sure which—and what he wished to suggest was that they should revert back to what had been done at the time of the passing of the Ballot Act, that they should repeal the clause which had repealed the section of that Act dealing with the Revision Courts, and having regard to the tremendous number of electors which would now be thrown upon the Register, that they should enact that the Revising Barristers should hold Revision Courts in every Petty Sessional district, which, he believed, had been the case under the Ballot Act. He would urge that this suggestion should be adopted, and made applicable to the 1st Schedule of the Bill. He thought also that line 25 of the clause required amendment by putting in the number of the Schedule. There would be a series of Schedules in the Bill, and line 25 had reference to what would be the first of those Schedules, all of which, he suggested, ought to be numbered or defined by letters of the alphabet.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he assured the Committee that the Act of 1873 gave ample power for the appointment by the Lord Lieutenant of any Revision Courts that might be thought necessary. With regard to what had been said about the Ballot Act, he thought the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) was under a misapprehension, and that the section he had referred to gave power to appoint Revision Courts in all the polling districts.

MR. SYNAN thought there had been some confusion with regard to the operation of the Ballot Act. Under that Act there was power to increase the polling districts. These districts were fixed at the Quarter Sessions. The revision of the registration was also a matter belonging to Quarter Sessions. The question that now arose was whether, in consequence of the increased number of voters who would be placed upon the Register, they would have sufficient facilities afforded them for maintaining their rights as electors under the revision provided at Quarter Sessions. He did not think they would be sufficient, and was of opinion that further provision ought to be made under the 4th clause of the Bill, and not by an Amendment relating to polling districts, which would have nothing to do with the revision of registration. The revision of votes at Quarter Sessions was one thing, and the fixing of polling places at Quarter Sessions was another. Under the Ballot Act the polling places were increased to such an extent that every polling place was brought to within four or five miles of the electors' residences; but the revision of the Register was not similarly dealt with, and he thought that some provision ought to be made under the Bill—by which the number of voters in Ireland was almost doubled—for an increase in the number of Revision Courts. He thought the matter was one with which the Government ought to deal. The hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) seemed to think that the Ballot Act had provided for what was needed; but this was not so. The Ballot Act merely left the question of revision where it was, at Quarter Sessions, and the only way to increase the facilities for revision was by an Amendment of this Bill increasing the number of Revision Courts.

MR. CALLAN said, the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) laboured under a great mistake in attaching to the Quarter Sessions both the revision and the polling. It might have been so in the olden time, when the hon. Member first came into Parliament; but, at the present day, the registration and polling questions were settled at separate Sessions altogether, and wholly apart from the Quarter Sessions. Each of these matters was dealt with at separate Sessions.

MR. KENNY said, his hon. Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Callan), while technically correct, was essentially wrong.

COLONEL NOLAN said, the main point at issue was whether there was any reason why the electors should be under the necessity of walking a great many miles for the purpose of attending the Revision Courts. In a county like that which he represented (Galway), where there was no contest at all about registration, he did not see why the Government should be put to the expense of appointing a number of additional Revision Courts. In cases where, as in Galway, under ordinary circumstances, there would be no fighting at all, it would be a farce and a ridiculous expenditure to institute a number of new Courts. His own experience was that the calling over the Roll at Quarter Sessions was a thing that only occupied five minutes or so, and the matter was settled. But in cases where large additions of voters were made to the Register, where, for instance, there might be a supplementary list of 4,000, 5,000, or 6,000, and where every Liberal objected to every Conservative, and every Conservative to every Liberal, and any voter who happened to keep his own counsel on political subjects was objected to by both Parties, it became a totally different matter. In those cases he considered that a multiplication of the Revision Courts would be found necessary, and he hoped that means would be taken to provide the requisite facilities.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, that, to his own knowledge, there were cases in which electors would have to walk a distance of 15, 16, and even 17 miles to get to the nearest Revision Courts. He was in the recollection of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), and of other hon. Members, when he stated that in many counties in Ireland several thousands of notices of objection were served upon electors on both sides at every revision; and unless a sufficient number of Revision Courts was provided, it would be next to impossible for the voters to be able to attend them and maintain their rights.

MR. GIBSON said, he agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) that there was ample jurisdiction at present for the appointment of Revision Courts, to be held at such times and places in the course of the year as the Lord Lieutenant might deem fit. The Act of 1877 gave the power of holding Quarter Sessions more often than those already fixed; but he had no doubt that the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland would look into the matter and satisfy himself as to the existence of the necessary powers, as it was obvious that if sufficient power did not exist for the provision of the requisite number of Revision Courts some further provision ought to be made for the purpose of insuring that result.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, the Ballot Act of 1872 provided certain machinery for the appointment of new polling districts, and that Act was amended by the Act of 1873, which latter Act also provided machinery for the appointment of Revision Courts. The two things were perfectly distinct.

MR. HEALY said, he quite agreed that the 3rd section of the Act of 1873, which amended the Ballot Act of 1872, gave the Lord Lieutenant power to provide Revision Courts where necessary; but what he complained of was that this power was never exercised by the Lord Lieutenant. In the case of Dublin it was only after a tremendous struggle that the Lord Lieutenant was induced to give some additional Revision Courts, and he gave them with a most meagre hand. The greatest possible pressure had to be brought to bear on that occasion; several Memorials were sent to the Lord Lieutenant on the subject, and the result was that he did not give half the Courts that were wanted. When, however, the Tories found that they had not a sufficient number of Revision Courts in Monaghan, and the magistrates sent up an application for additional Courts, the county being formerly a Tory county, they were able to get what they wanted. Why, he asked, did not the Government undertake to deal with this matter? There ought to be some hard-and-fast line laid down for the appointment of a certain number of persons to hold Revision Courts, or the Lord Lieutenant should be compelled to give a Revision Court for every 1,000 electors. As the matter at present stood, the section of the Act of Parliament which gave the existing power said the Lord Lieutenant might by Order in Council appoint Revision Courts, and so forth. He (Mr. Healy) would not say that there ought to be a Court in every Petty Sessional district; but he thought there ought to be one in every town of any size—say, with a population of 2,000, or having Town Commissioners. Revision Courts ought to be held in all such places—at any rate for the present year. He would not carry his proposition beyond this—It was proposed to appoint a greater number of Revising Barristers, and to take other additional means to provide for the registration necessitated by the Franchise Act; and he thought, therefore, the Government ought to be anxious to see that the new law was properly, fairly, and efficiently carried out in every respect.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the circumstances connected with the present legislation would necessarily require a much larger scheme of revision than would be requisite in ordinary years; and he would promise, on behalf of the Government, that the matter should be carefully considered in the spirit indicated by the last observations of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy).

MR. CALLAN said, he was afraid the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan did not go far enough. That hon. and learned Gentleman would be content with having a Revision Court in each town where there were Town Commissioners; but, if this recommendation were adopted, it would leave a large number of small towns that had not Town Commissioners without any means of revision at all. In his own county (Louth) there were only two Courts, which, he contended, were not enough. There ought to be one at least in each barony, which would give five instead of two Revision Courts to the county.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to know, before the clause was agreed to, whether the Government did not think it necessary to indicate the Schedules referred to in the Bill by numbers or initials?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he was afraid they could hardly amend the Bill in that way at the present moment; but he would consider what it would be best to do on Report.

On the Motion of Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, the following Amendment made:—In page 2, line 25, after "the," insert "Second."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Remuneration of officers. 13 & 14 Vict. c. 69. s. 73; 31 & 32 Vict. c. 49. s. 23).

MR. R. POWER moved an Amendment to the effect that the power of fixing the remuneration of collectors of Unions and poor rate collectors for their services in carrying the Registration Act into effect should be vested in Boards of Guardians, and not in the Local Government Board for Ireland, as was proposed by the clause. He said he was at a loss to understand what it was that induced the Government to put such a power in the hands of the Local Government Board as would be given to them under this section if it were carried without amendment. Of all the public Boards in Ireland, he did not think there was any so unpopular as the Local Government Board. He should like to know on what ground they were to be asked to place in the hands of a more or less irresponsible authority the disbursement of those payments, an expenditure to which they did not contribute, while those who actually did contribute the means of paying the money were to have no voice in the manner in which it was to be expended? The ratepayers had no control whatever over the Local Government Board in Ireland; and this fact sufficiently showed how differently the two countries were treated, because in England the ratepayers had perfect control over the manner in which the money they contributed was to be spent. He found that in England it was necessary that a certificate should be given to the overseers by the Revising Barrister, under Section 57 of the principal Act, for expenses incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of the Act, this certificate to be final and conclusive, provided it was signed by the Revising Barrister in the open Court. In Ireland, however, there was no open Court in the case. In addition to the provision he had just quoted, the ratepayers in England had a right to inspect the accounts and object to any items before they were allowed by the Revising Barrister. Therefore, in England the ratepayers had a perfect right to object to any item of expenditure brought before the Revising Barrister for his signature; but under the present Bill the Local Government Board might expend ten times too much or ten times too little, and the unfortunate ratepayers would have no voice whatever in the matter. Another point was, that in this instance the Government had departed from the course pursued in regard to former Registration Bills. By the Bill of 1850 he found that the Guardians had the power of fixing the salaries of all the officers, and paying them for any expenses they might have been put to; and he should like the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to say why he had departed from this precedent, and thrown the power into the hands of the Local Government Board in Dublin? He (Mr. R. Power) might say that he thought it would have been much better if the expense had not to be taken from the local rates at all; but the Government had determined not only that the money was to be contributed by the ratepayers, but that those who made the contribution should have no voice whatever in regard to its disbursement. If the Local Government Board were to retain the power of paying those salaries, and the ratepayers were to have no voice in the matter, the Government ought to have brought forward some different scheme by which the Local Government Board would be guided, and not leave it to that body to pay twice as much in one place as they might pay in another.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 12, to leave out the words "Local Government Board for Ireland," in order to insert the words "Board of Guardians,"—(Mr. Richard Power,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'Local Government Board for Ireland' stand part of the Clause."

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, it was the opinion of the Government that the Local Government Board was the best qualified body to secure a reasonable and not too high a remuneration being paid to those public servants for the performance of these duties.

MR. LEWIS thought that if there were need for the intervention of the Local Government Board, or some other sufficient authority, for the purpose of seeing justice done between the clerks and collectors of Unions and the rate-payers, this was the case in which it had arisen. He had to remind the Committee of an instance he had brought before the House on the second reading of the Bill, only two days ago. He had then informed the House that the Athy Board of Guardians had proposed to appoint certain gentlemen who were secretaries of the National League for the purpose of making out the list of voters in the various Unions. This proposal was brought before the Board without any previous notice; and although the attention of the Guardians was called to this fact, and they were asked to postpone the matter in order that due notice might be given, they had declined to do so, but had there and then, on the spot, appointed as fit and proper persons to make out the new lists seven gentlemen whose special qualification was that they were secretaries to the National League. At the next meeting it was proposed to fix their remuneration. Now, if this sort of thing were to be tolerated elsewhere in Ireland, it would be easy to imagine what sort of a remuneration would be given. One particular class of persons they would remunerate handsomely, while another class would hardly be remunerated at all. With respect to the Amendment before the Committee, he regarded it as utterly unintelligible and unworkable, and, moreover, wanting in point of definition. It was an essential matter, in which the independence of a Government Board was necessary, to see fair play between the ratepayers and the officers. In England it was a different matter; the business of making out the lists lay with the overseers, who were not entitled to receive anything but their expenses. No doubt they could remunerate any sub-official for manual labour; but the "bills" referred to on these occasions were not bills for remuneration, for he believed, as a matter of law, they were not entitled to remuneration. But they were allowed expenses, which were audited in the public accounts, the overseer, however, giving his services just as the Sheriff did in other matters, without receiving remuneration. He hoped the Government would be firm in holding to their clause.

MR. SEXTON said, it was but a trivial opposition which had been offered to the Amendment. Though the terms of the Amendment were not perhaps those a cultured lawyer would use, still the object was quite clear; it was to take away from the central body the power of fixing the remuneration of clerks and others concerned in the business of registration, giving that power in each Union to the Board of Guardians; and he thought the Board of Guardians would be a more fitting body to fix the remuneration than the Local Government Board in Dublin. In the first place, the Board of Guardians would provide the money; and generally, unless some incapacity could be shown, the people who had to provide the money for the discharge of a public duty ought, through their representatives, to be allowed to say the extent to which their money should be expended. The Local Government Board had not that knowledge of what would be the work under the new franchise to enable them to fix a scale with adequate speed. If the clause were agreed upon in its present form, and the Bill in due course was sent up to the House of Lords, where, after a time, it might pass and ultimately receive the Royal Assent, then, and not till then, the Local Government Board set about fixing the scale of remuneration. This would be productive of something very like disaster to the public interest. The demand on the time of the public rate collectors would be overpowering; and if they were left in doubt for a month or six weeks as to what remuneration they would receive for their extra duty, they would go about that duty in a careless apathetic manner, instead of with that energy the public interest required. He took it to be a prime requisite that the collectors should know immediately or very soon how much they were to get; and if the Government accepted the Amendment allowing the Boards of Guardians to fix the amount of remuneration, the Boards would at once, from their knowledge of local circumstances, knowing the number of people to be put upon the Register, the extent of work from each collector, their knowledge of the rate-producing Returns and their funds in hand, take a full view of all the elements of the case, and fix a fair scale of remuneration. If, on the other hand, out of an obstinate desire to leave all power in the hands of a central body, taking it out of the hands of Boards having only a limited representation, if the Government persevered in that, then the result would be that nothing definite would be known for weeks to come as to the amount of remuneration to collectors, and necessarily the effect would be that collectors would not interest themselves as they ought; they would know you could not really recover penalties, though they were in the Act; and thousands or tens of thousands of people entitled to be on the Electoral Roll would have their names omitted.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, he hoped the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) would not be accepted. He thought it most undesirable to throw upon Boards of Guardians, among whom in Ireland, as was well known, strong Party feeling existed, delicate work of this kind in connection with the registration of voters; and that rate collectors and clerks of Unions should be solely dependent on Boards of Guardians. He did not think the latter wanted any such power, and he knew that rate collectors and clerks of Unions wished to have the scale of remuneration fixed by the Local Government Board; and he also believed that rate collectors knew already that they were to be paid for the work, and he believed they would enter, and were entering, on the work with pleasure. Hitherto they had done the work and were paid nothing, and it would be most undesirable to accept an Amendment, the result of which would probably be great inequality in the scale of payment throughout the Unions in Ireland, some Unions paying highly, others paying very little. He thought a fixed scale, such as was the case in preparing the jury lists, should be arranged by the Local Government Board, and then collectors would know how they were to be paid.

MR. CALLAN said, he was surprised at the grounds upon which the hon. Member (Mr. T. A. Dickson) objected to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power). The hon. Member spoke of irregularity in payments; he was surprised that an hon. Gentleman should hand himself over to the interest of a narrow class to the detriment of the constituency he represented. He stated that it was undesirable that Boards of Guardians should have the power of fixing the remuneration, and he said rate collectors were paid nothing for the work now. But then, when they proposed to collect the rates in certain parishes, they were well aware of the duty that would devolve upon them in connection with Revision Sessions; and therefore, in making their estimate for what they would do the collection, they took into consideration the duty of preparing the Electoral Roll. He said the Board of Guardians did not wish for the power; but he would ask the hon. Member, was there any Petition from any Board of Guardians asking the House not to impose this duty upon them? Was there any Resolution expressive of the wish that the Local Government Board should take this power from them? He (Mr. Callan) stated, with all the authority that attached to the Representative of a large county, that the Boards of Guardians did not wish to have the power of fixing the remuneration; but he would ask the hon. Member to state in the House, could he point to a single vote of any Board of Guardians in Ireland expressing directly, indirectly, or by implication, any such wish? He knew the hon. Member had been entrusted with a number of letters from officials of the Poor Law Board; but he had yet to learn that the hon. Member had representations from Boards of Guardians, in Tyrone or elsewhere, suggesting that any Board wished to have this power taken from them. If so, then perhaps the hon. Member would avail himself the opportunity, and give the name of any Board of Guardians, to substantiate his assertion he had ventured to make in opposition to the Amendment.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, from his own knowledge he was certain that Boards of Guardians did not wish this work cast upon them.

MR. CALLAN said, he accepted that explanation. The hon. Member's expression was "Boards of Guardians did not wish it." But to turn to the objections of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis). First, he must say the clause contained that to which Irish Members for years had objected—the levying of taxation without representation. One of the great objections to the Grand Jury Laws was that they gave the power of levying rates without the representation of the ratepayers; and so this Bill would withhold representation from the ratepayers, while imposing taxation. Some two years since, there was a Bill before the House, and referred to a Select Committee on which he (Mr. Callan) sat, a Bill in reference to the superannuation of Poor Law officers; and what substantially killed that Bill in Committee so effectually that the Government did not bring forward the question now was the demand by Mr. Robinson, Chief Commissioner and representative of the Local Government Board, that the Board should have the power of fixing the retiring allowances of Poor Law officers, overriding the authority of the elected Guardians, and now there was the attempt made by the Government, under cover of this Bill, to take away from the Poor Law Guardians the power of fixing the remuneration of those officers. The hon. Member for Londonderry said the Amendment was an attempt to give power to Boards of Guardians such as they had never had; but the hon. Member, though representing an Irish constituency, could not have read the Irish Poor Law Act, or he would know that under the existing law power of fixing salaries was given to the Poor Law Guardians. Every item of expense, however, was audited by the Government auditor, and unless this official sanctioned the expenditure, he surcharged the unfortunate Guardians who signed the cheque. Nothing could be paid that was not approved by the Government auditor. He (Mr. Callan) certainly strongly supported the Amendment for many reasons, and was surprised that it was resisted by the President of the Local Government Board, who he believed had never attended a Board meeting on a single occasion; or if he had done so, he (Mr. Callan) would be glad to be corrected. On the other hand, let the right hon. Gentleman bring forward any single instance of neglect by Boards of Guardians of the duty that fell upon officials under the existing Registration Act. If such could be shown, there might be some reason for introducing this clause into the Bill. Until a sufficient reason was shown, he certainly thought Irish Members were bound to support the hon. Member for Waterford. The Local Government

Board of Ireland—in fact, the Irish Executive—knew that in the near future there would be some extension of local self-government, and so they wished to absorb and gather to themselves all the power they possibly could, so as to leave County Boards, when appointed, as little as possible to control. He was most anxious that Poor Law collectors and clerks of Unions should be properly remunerated for the work imposed upon them; and unless a case could be made out showing the incapacity or disinclination of Boards of Guardians to fix the scale, he should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he rose to offer a suggestion. He was in favour of the principle that those responsible for raising the rates should have the ordering of their distribution; and, certainly, he was not in favour of putting all control over the remuneration in the hands of the Local Government Board; but he thought there were certain possible difficulties that, in dealing with particular work of this kind, might create some inconvenience. It was desirable there should be remuneration provided for these officers for work done, and it should also be provided that there should be some uniformity of payment, some system, so that one set of Guardians should not proceed on one principle, and others upon a principle totally different. It seemed to him the power of the Local Government Board, in reference to the appointment of officers, suggested an analogy which might be followed in the present case. The clerks and collectors were appointed by the Guardians, but in each case subject to the approval of the Local Government Board; and he would suggest that, in the present case—of course, the language of the clause would require alteration—the action of the Guardians should be subject to the approval of the Local Government Board. That would bring matters into exact analogy with the power of the Local Government Board at present, and would effect something like an uniformity of payment all over the country. An hon. Friend near him said the Board of Guardians gave no remuneration; but that point was answered by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan). Undoubtedly, the collectors knew of the conditions when they accepted office; they knew the character of the work expected from them. So much for the general question; but he took the opportunity of asking the Chief Secretary for Ireland a question upon another point. This clause provided for the remuneration of a new set of officers under new circumstances; but he did not know whether representations had been made to the right hon. Gentleman, as they had been to himself and other hon. Members, in relation to the case of those who had performed corresponding work, or a great part of it, in relation to boroughs now disfranchised—whether these officers had a fair claim for compensation? He knew that in some instances the remuneration of clerks and county officials had been fixed in consideration of work done in connection with revision when they accepted office. He did not know that this was strictly germane to the present discussion; but he desired to mention it.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, as to the last question of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Charles Russell), he did not think it arose under this clause; but, as a matter of fact, representations had been made by town clerks of boroughs about to be merged, but he could not say the claim could be allowed—they must follow the fate of their brethren elsewhere; he was almost sure it never had been done. As to the new proposal of his hon. and learned Friend, as he said before, he was very much in the hands of the Committee. He preferred himself the Bill as it stood. He could assure hon. Members—though, perhaps, they would not accept that assurance as worth much—that the Local Government Board were not so gluttonous of authority that they desired to assume a duty of this sort; but the Government thought they were an independent body, to whom might be entrusted the interests that had to be considered. Next to that, to provide for the payment of clerks of Unions by the Boards of Guardians, subject to the approval and control of the Local Government Board, would, perhaps, be better than leaving them absolutely at the mercy of the Guardians, who were often—he did not wish to say anything against them, but in matters of this sort, touching politics, were apt to be swayed by political Party feelings. If he found a strong expression of opinion in favour of the compromise, he should not be disposed to stand out against it; but still he would prefer to leave the clause as it was.

MR. GIBSON said, he did not understand the tone of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. A Minister of the Crown came there, and threw his discretion on the floor of the House for any Member to pick up, abandoning that reasonable independence he was bound to assume as Minister of the Crown. ["Oh, oh!"] He (Mr. Gibson) expressed his opinion as it presented itself to his mind on this as on other questions; but he passed to the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), which, of course, was ingenious, as would be expected. But did it hold water? Would it not be open to this broad objection of a substantial kind—that the Local Government Board, as the Bill stood, was the central body to lay down the rule for the whole of the Boards of Guardians in Ireland?—that was clear and authoritative, speaking from a neutral standpoint, and laying down a rule for the guidance of all Ireland. But supposing the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member adopted, then Boards of Guardians—it might be several sets of them in the same county—would have very different standpoints. One Board would have a very different standard from another Board; and the Local Government Board, instead of laying down one scale, might have to consider and adjust from 40 to 80 scales for the whole of Ireland. Suppose from the North of Ireland—he did not know whether they were more liberal there than in the South—but suppose the Local Government Board found that in the North or the West, or elsewhere, there was one scale laid down for the payment of clerks and collectors of Unions—a high scale, which, with modification, the Local Government Board approved—and then suppose from another part of Ireland an entirely different scale was presented for exactly the same work, what would the Local Government Board do? Were they to drop the rate agreed on to the lower scale, or were they to raise the lower scale to the figure agreed upon? They must level up or level down, and if that was the way the Amendment would work, would it not be doing the very same thing the Bill would do as it stood? What would be gained by the proposed alteration? As he understood the right hon. Gentleman, he declared to stand by the clauses of the Bill.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, what he stated was that there were two ways of providing payment—by the Local Government Board and by the Guardians. He pointed out the pros and cons, and, of the two, thought the method proposed in the Bill was the best.

MR. GIBSON said, he understood, however, that the right hon. Gentleman, in his original speech, stated he was then prepared to remain of the opinion of those who approved of the Bill, and to stand by the clauses as drawn; and he rather reprobated the statement from the Opposition Benches, that the way in which he presented his views was weak-kneed. It was rather surprising, then, just now, to find the right hon. Gentleman had lapsed into a moral position that beggared all description. He was unaware what course would be taken now by the right hon. Gentleman; he had left the Committee in that atmosphere of doubt hon. Gentlemen were so familiar with in relation to greater questions than an Irish Registration Bill. If there was a division, he should certainly support the wisdom that suggested the original draft of the Bill; and he awaited with curiosity and painful suspense to know what would be the ultimate action of the Irish Executive.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

COLONEL NOLAN said, that when a Minister went out of his way, as the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had done, to say that he would pay some little attention to the opinions of private Members, he was doing a rather good thing in departing from the usual fashion of Ministers, and ought to be encouraged. The point at issue was who should settle how much should be paid to those clerks and collectors; and it seemed to him that both sides had proved their case. One side said the Poor Law Guardians should settle it, and the other that the Local Government Board should do so. But one party proved that the Local Government Board was a very bad authority, and the other that the Guardians were a bad authority; and, so far as he was concerned, he thought both parties were right. The Guardians were a bad authority because they might be on one side or the other in politics, and, therefore, there would be no uniformity over the country. The fact was that the question was not local, but Imperial; and it was a bad thing to leave it to local bodies to settle how much should be paid for what really was an Imperial work. The Guardians might say—"We do not care how the list of voters is cut down; they can cut it down to nothing at all if they like." Then the people who argued that the Local Government Board was an equally bad authority were quite right, because it was unreasonable that, the Guardians having to pay the money, the Local Government Board should settle the amount. Speaking generally, he thought it was a very wrong thing to extract this money from the Guardians at all. It was making the localities pay for Imperial purposes; and so strongly did he object to the proposal, that, on a future occasion, he should have to move an Amendment on the point. Whether the Boards of Guardians settled the salaries or the Local Government Board, both systems, it had been proved, would give rise to great inconvenience. The money should be taken from the Imperial taxes. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) had proposed a compromise about as good as they could adopt, to the effect that the Guardians should settle the money in the first place, and that the Local Government Board should have some power of revision. That was a practical way to carry out the scheme—an excellent compromise for getting out of the difficulty. Very often the Boards of Guardians would be anxious to over-pay the collectors and clerks, or, at any rate, to increase their salaries unduly, and then the Local Government Board would come in and say that too much was being paid, and cut down the salaries. He knew cases in which the Guardians fixed salaries at much too high a figure, and where the Local Government Board had to cut them down. The Guardians had to give reasons for fixing salaries so high; but, as he had said, the real difficulty was as to who should pay this money. No matter who fixed the salary, the sting of the thing would remain; the payment was the real sting. If they went to a division, he should support the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), more because the hon. Member had moved the Amendment than anything else. As a matter of fact, he did not think his constituents cared one halfpenny about the whole matter.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he rose for the purpose of saying a word which he thought should be said by someone. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, in dealing with the Amendment, in the first instance, had pointed out what must be obvious to everyone who considered the matter at all—namely, that it involved no very grave principle on which the fate of a Government might depend, and that it was not a matter which should excite any very great heat in the breast of hon. Members. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary objected to have it said that he had a preference personally for a particular course; he would be quite willing to defer to the general view of hon. Members representing Ireland who were interested in the clause. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) thereupon thought himself justified, forsooth, in getting up and condemning what he called the weak-kneed, and what the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) called the flabby, expressions of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. He (Mr. Charles Russell), however, thought the Irish Members ought to be extremely grateful to the Chief Secretary for doing that which it was the obvious duty of every Minister to do, whatever Department he represented, in consulting, as far as he could, those who were especially interested in the question. The question was asked—What would be the result of this Amendment if carried? Why, the result of it would be this. One Board of Guardians might fix one scale of remuneration, while another Board of Guardians might fix another, although practically the amount of work to be done by the officers of the Boards would be almost the same.

Colonel Nolan

The Local Government Board would have, and ought to have, regard to the local expression of opinion of those who had to raise the money, but that they should not be absolutely bound by that expression of opinion in case they found it taking the form of giving extravagant remuneration for a small amount of work. The practical result would be that a uniform scale would be arrived at, as would be the case under the Bill as it stood, with this difference, that the influence of the local bodies would practically prevail. As the clause stood, it would appear that hereafter the Local Government Board would have no influence in the subject, whereas in the other case effect would be given to local opinion.

MR. CALLAN said, that there were different scales of payment in Ireland at present, and that in such counties as Galway and Mayo larger sums were paid than in such rich districts as Meath and Louth. If the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) were accepted, the remuneration might be made commensurate with the duties performed. For instance, in Mayo and Galway, where a large amount of work was to be done, the salaries might be made higher than in Meath and Louth, where there was comparatively little work to do. In the rich districts the expense would be less than in the wilds of Connaught, where, perhaps, ten times as many people as were on the voters' list at present would have to be included. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) proposed to substitute the Boards of Guardians for the Local Government Board; and if that hon. Member was not present, he (Mr. Callan) thought he might accept for him the arrangement proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell). In that case the Amendment would read—

“The Board of Guardians may from time to time, subject to the approval of the Local Government Board, fix the scale upon which the clerks of Unions and poor rate collectors shall be remunerated.”

That would meet the only objection raised. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) had told him that he should be quite prepared to accept that modification of his Amendment; and he (Mr. Callan) hoped that, for the sake of making everything satisfactory, that proposal would be accepted by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, that before the Solicitor General for Ireland rose he would make a suggestion as to the wording of the clause. He thought it would be more convenient in this form—

“ The several Boards of Guardians in Ireland, subject to the control of the Local Government Board,” &c.

MR. CALLAN said, he would suggest that the word “approval” should be used instead of “control,” because it was in a measure subjecting the action of the Poor Law Guardians to the Local Government Board.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he had made his suggestion because the Boards of Guardians might not give remuneration where it ought to be given, and the Local Government Board should have power to say that they should.

MR. PARNELL said, he thought the discussion as to what authority should fix the rates of remuneration of the collectors and clerks of Unions was carried on under some disadvantage, seeing that they had not yet decided out of what source that remuneration was to be paid. Until they had decided that question it was rather putting the cart before the horse to decide what authority should control the fixing of the remuneration. The Government proposed by this Bill that the remuneration should be paid out of the local rates, and they also proposed that a Governmental authority in Ireland—namely, the Local Government Board—should direct what the scale of remuneration should be. He (Mr. Parnell) certainly thought that a very objectionable principle to proceed upon, and one which they were bound to oppose. At the same time, if the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) were in the House, he should suggest to him whether it would not be as well to withdraw the Amendment for the present, in order that they might come to a decision upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) lower down as to the source out of which the expense should be paid. He referred to the Amendment to Clause 6, page 3, after line 17, insert—

“ All expenses so incurred shall be defrayed out of the Consolidated Fund.”

THE CHAIRMAN: I think I may save time if I point out to the hon. Member that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), to which he refers, will not be in Order.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that upon the point of Order he would remind hon. Members that the arrangement he proposed would practically come to the same thing. His proposal was to leave out from “Guardians” to the end of the clause. The effect of that would be to strike out that part of the section which provided that the Guardians should pay the money. There would then be nothing in the Bill to settle who was to pay the money, and the Government would have to put in words to the effect that it should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund.

THE CHAIRMAN: We have not arrived at that point yet, and I think we are rather complicating matters by referring to it. What I say now is merely to save hon. Members the trouble of going into this matter. The proposal would involve a charge upon the Consolidated Fund, and it is not competent for a private Member to make such a proposal. It could not be put in the Committee.

MR. SEXTON: Will you, Sir, rule out of Order the Amendment in the name of the Chief Secretary?

COLONEL NOLAN: No; the right hon. Gentleman is a Privy Councillor, and is privileged.

THE CHAIRMAN: The same remark would apply to the Amendment of the Chief Secretary. Until permission to bring forward such a question be obtained it would not be in Order for the right hon. Gentleman to move it, and I understand that he has not taken the necessary preliminary steps yet.

MR. PARNELL said, that, at any rate, he could raise the same question on the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan). The Committee would be in an unfortunate position if it were not allowed to settle this matter before it came to the discussion of the question raised by the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Waterford (Mr. R. Power). Until they knew out of what source the remuneration was to be paid, it would be impossible for them fairly to decide the authority which they should appoint for the purpose of fixing the rate or scale of remuneration ; and he would submit to the Committee whether they should not raise that point on the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), which proposed, in Clause 6, page 3, line 18, to leave out from "Guardians" to end of clause. If that Amendment were carried the Government would undoubtedly be compelled on Report, unless they reversed the decision, to introduce a clause, the assent of the House having been obtained in the meantime to pay the charges out of the Consolidated Fund. They would be placed in a better position to discuss the merits of the question raised by the hon. Member for Waterford's (Mr. R. Power's) Amendment if they had first decided the question as to the source out of which the remuneration was to be paid. He would also suggest to his hon. Friend, with regard to the special merits of his Amendment, that it was of the utmost importance to the success of the lists in Ireland that the collectors of rates, who had to make out the initial lists, should know as soon as possible what they were going to get. If it were left, according to the proposal in the Bill, to the Local Government Board to announce hereafter, in all probability when the work had been all done, and the time had elapsed for performing it, what the collectors and other officials interested in the work were to get, the motive of self-interest would be naturally wanting, and the work would be imperfectly and unsatisfactorily performed. The Amendment of his hon. Friend would leave the matter to the Board of Guardians, and there was a great deal to be said in favour of that. It would certainly be a better principle from every point of view, and an improvement upon the proposal of the Government, because in all probability the authorities would meet almost immediately and decide what they were going to give to the poor rate collectors and the other officials. He (Mr. Parnell) had placed a new clause on the Paper ; but he proposed to move to leave out Clause 6, or so much of it as it might be necessary to leave out for the purpose, in order to substitute for it the clause of which he had given Notice. His proposal was to put in the Bill itself what the poor rate collectors should receive. Those collectors were really important officials in the matter, and he (Mr. Parnell) followed the precedent set by the Jurors' Act with regard to the rate of remuneration given to the rate collectors in reference to the placing of names on jury lists. He would make it compulsory on Boards of Guardians in Ireland, free from the action of the Local Government Board, to give so much per head according to the scale for the number of voters returned. The Guardians, however, would have it within their competence to fix the rate of remuneration to the clerks of the Unions also without the Local Government Board having anything to do with it. The question would be divided into two halves. The rate collectors would be collected according to the scales in the Act, and their compensation would be compulsory, and the Boards of Guardians would have discretionary power as to how much they should give the clerks of Unions. He thought, as regarded the action of the rate collectors, that it was of the utmost importance that they should set to work as soon as possible. He was credibly informed that up to the present they had done next to nothing, and had made no preparations to meet the trouble and work which would be thrown upon them. He doubted whether it would be possible to get them to take the enormous trouble which would be involved in making out correct lists unless they were told how much they were to get, and unless the principle of paying them by results were adopted. He thought that, on the whole, his hon. Friend (Mr. R. Power) might fairly withdraw his present Amendment, and allow them to discuss the proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), for after they had decided the source out of which the remuneration should be taken they would be in a better position to decide as to the body to control the payment.

MR. WARTON said, he wished to ask a question which was almost a question of Order. It seemed to him that if they looked at the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) at the top of page 635 they would see that, owing to the curious way in which it had been printed, it was in the shape of a new clause, though differing from all the other new clauses, because it said "leave out Clause 6 and insert the following Clause." He (Mr. Warton) apprehended that it would not be possible for the hon. Member to make that proposal if Clause 6 were passed unamended; and he would submit, therefore, that the new clause of the hon. Member was really an Amendment, and not a new clause in the correct sense at all. It was really an Amendment to the clause they were now on; and he, therefore, submitted to the hon. Member that unless the Amendment they were now discussing were withdrawn he would not be able to move his clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) would be entitled to move his Amendment as a new clause. I am not at all prepared to say that he would be out of Order in the course he proposes. The Amendment before the Committee at the present moment is that of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power). I do not know whether it is withdrawn.

MR. CALLAN said, the difficulty the Committee were in would be met by dividing on the proposal of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), and then afterwards those who were in favour of the proposed new clause could vote against the adoption of the clause itself. That would enable them, in the first instance, to obtain a fixing of the rate of remuneration by the Boards of Guardians, subject to the approval of the Local Government Board. Afterwards they could divide upon the clause itself.

THE CHAIRMAN: At the present moment the Amendment before the Committee is that upon the Paper. I have listened very attentively to what has taken place. I have heard a great deal about the Amendment the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) intends to move, and Amendments to that Amendment. What, however, is before the Committee is the Amendment on the Paper. I understand that the hon. Member for the City of Cork suggested that that Amendment should be withdrawn, in order that the Committee might consider the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan).

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he would point out that the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) seemed to proceed upon a false assumption, because the hon. Member proposed to leave out Clause 6, and to substitute the clause which stood at the top of page 635. The hon. Member's ground for that was, as he (Mr. Russell) understood it, that they had not yet fixed the fund out of which the remuneration was to be paid. But if the hon. Member would look at his own clause he would see that, so far from saying that the payment should be made out of the Consolidated Fund, which was the object of the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) proposed to pay it out of the rates. The proposed new clause of the hon. Member said—

"The guardians of the poor of each union shall, by order, make an annual allowance out of the rates to the poor rate collectors, as compensation for the duty by the Registration Acts imposed upon them, in accordance with the following scale:—Two pounds ten shillings per annum to each collector for any number of names up to twenty-five, and two pounds for every additional hundred names up to five hundred, and one pound for every succeeding hundred: Provided, That no collector shall receive a greater sum than fifty pounds in any one year. The said guardians shall allow clerks of unions under the said Acts such sums as they think reasonable."

MR. PARNELL said, that what he suggested was that they should at first decide the question as to the source out of which this remuneration should be paid—whether it should come from the Imperial Exchequer or local rates. That apparently could only be done under the Rules of the House by taking a division on the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan). That having been decided, and the words of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) having been added to the Bill, he (Mr. Parnell) should not move his subsequent Amendment.

MR. LEWIS said, that if the Amendments before the Committee were not withdrawn the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) could not be put, as it would make the clause absurd. It would make it read—

"The Board of Guardians may, from time to time, by order, fix the scale or scales according to which the poor rate collectors and clerks of unions should be remunerated for their services."

He understood that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R.

Power) was not withdrawn. If it were not withdrawn and was incorporated in the Bill it would lead to utter confusion.

THE CHAIRMAN: There seems to be a question whether the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), as it stands on the Paper, is in Order. The hon. Member merely proposes to substitute for the "Local Government Board" the words "Board of Guardians."

MR. GIBSON: The Amendment says "Board of Guardians;" but there are a great many Boards of Guardians in Ireland—over 100 I should think.

MR. LEWIS: Yes; the clause would be nonsense.

MR. GORST: But the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) may add something after his Amendment is accepted which would make it sense.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. Member for Waterford present?

Several Irish MEMBERS: No.

THE CHAIRMAN: If he is not we cannot put it.

MR. R. POWER said, he intended to withdraw his Amendment, although he must say he thought it would be much better to accept it, though verbally wrong; before they settled where the money was to come from. Some of his hon. Friends, however, thought differently; and he would, therefore, withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he would now move his Amendment to leave out from the "Boards of Guardians" to end of clause.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he wished to move an Amendment earlier in the clause than that, and it was in page 3, line 12, before the word "the" to insert—

"Several Boards of Guardians, subject to the control of the Local Government Board of Ireland, may from time to time," &c.

He wished to move this and certain verbal consequential Amendments—for instance, the omission of the words "by order," and the omission of the words "by the Local Government Board" in lines 19 and 20. He did not propose to add anything to what he had already said on this subject.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 12, to insert, after the word "The," the words "Several Boards of Guardians, subject to the control of."—(Mr. Charles Russell.)

Mr. Lewis

MR. SEXTON said, the reason why he thought it would be desirable that the source from which the money was to come should be settled before they decided upon the relative measures of authority to be vested in the Local Government Board and the Boards of Guardians was this—that if the money was to come from the Imperial Treasury it might then be deemed to be reasonable that the Central Board in Dublin, representing the Government, should have some control over the money, or guidance over the expenditure of the money so provided; but if it was to come out of the local rates, then he and his hon. Friends thought his hon. Friends around him would be disposed to resist any proposal to give control or even guidance to the Local Government Board in regard to the expenditure of the money, because they thought that if the Guardians contributed the money out of their local rates they were entitled to control it. He thought that at the present moment they were putting the cart before the horse, and that it would be better that they should at first say from what source the money should come before they proceeded to consider as to whether the responsibility for the expenditure should be vested in the Local Government Board or the elected Boards of Guardians in Ireland. The objection he had to any reference to the Local Government Board was the grave objection of delay. In this matter time was of the utmost importance. Every day was now of great value; and if the Local Government Board were to have this function under the Bill of fixing the remuneration, nothing would be done until the measure was passed into law. If the Local Government Board saw that it was proposed to confer the function upon them, they would not move a finger until the Bill was passed; and his contention then was, that it would be too late to do the work properly. On the other hand, if they indicated to the Guardians by a Motion in that House that they were to have the authority vested in them, then he presumed those Bodies would immediately act on the indication contained in the Bill, and would proceed next week, or in the course of a few days, to fix the rates of remuneration. At present, the whole thing in Ireland was in a state of chaos. The Guardians did not know whether they were to pay the money, and the collectors did not know what they were to receive. Not long ago the Sligo Board of Guardians asked their clerk whether it was the duty of the collectors to make out these lists, and he answered in the negative. The collector had said that he would not proceed with the work until he knew what remuneration he was to receive. The Guardians asked him if he would not go on with the work for a fortnight; to which he replied that he should not like to do so unless he knew what remuneration he was to receive, pointing out that the work would be extremely heavy. A Guardian then said—"Won't you trust our honour for a fortnight?" And the reply was that the collectors could hardly do that after the manner in which they had been treated by the Guardians under the Seeds Supply Act. One of the Guardians then suggested to the collector that he should go on with the work behind the backs of the Guardians—that the Guardians should know nothing about it—and the clerk then exclaimed—"Say you will pay the collectors if the Government do not." To that a decided negative was given. The collector stated that if the Board would give him £40, he would at once proceed with the work; but the Guardians could not promise to do that. That was what had taken place in Sligo, and the same thing was going on all over Ireland every day. The important work of making out the lists was therefore delayed, and every moment was of the utmost importance in connection with such an important matter. The Guardians did not know what they were to do; and until the matter was settled in a definite manner, no satisfactory Return would be made. He agreed that the first step which ought to be taken should be to decide from what source the money was to come. He thought it would be inadvisable to leave the Local Government Board any power in the matter, because of the tendency in connection with that Office to bring about delay—because in all probability several weeks would elapse before anything was done, and the present chaotic state of things would continue.

MR. CALLAN said, he was sorry the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) had not acceded to the proposal of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), to which suggestion the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) had at once given way. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, after a conference with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, had taken up this matter. [MR. CHARLES RUSSELL: No, no!] Well, after an apparent conference with the Solicitor General for Ireland, the hon. and learned Gentleman had moved a modification of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), which involved almost all the objectionable portions of that hon. Member's proposal. He (Mr. Callan) begged to move, on the proposed Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, that the word "control" be left out, and the word "approval" be inserted. He made that proposal on the ground of precedent, because he found that in the Act of 1850, and in the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 69, intituled "An Act to amend the Laws which regulate the qualification and registration of Parliamentary Voters in Ireland," that altered the law for rating in certain boroughs, the language used was such as he proposed. He did not know why the Government should pretend to think that the wording of an Act of Parliament which had existed 35 years was unsatisfactory. The 73rd section of the Act stated—

"Be it enacted, that the guardians of the poor of each union shall, by an order, make such annual allowances out of the rates to the clerks of the unions"— the very words used in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork—

"as compensation for the duties imposed upon them as the said guardians shall think proper . . . but no payment shall be made thereunder unless the same shall be approved of by the Poor Law Commissioners"— that was to say, by the Local Government Board. Why should they change the wording of that Act? Why not make the proposed Amendment read so that the payment should not be subject to the control of the Local Government Board, but subject to their approval? He begged to move that the word

"control" be left out for the purpose of inserting in place of it the word "approval."

Amendment proposed, to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the word "control," and insert the word "approval."—(Mr. Callan.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'control' stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

MR. LEWIS said, he had understood the reference of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) to the proceedings which had taken place before the Sligo Board of Guardians in a very different manner to the hon. Member himself. The hon. Member seemed to think that what he had said showed the necessity of having some independent body to stand between the Guardians and the collectors. It seemed to him (Mr. Lewis), however, that the very last body to whom the collectors were inclined to give their confidence were the Guardians. The collectors appeared to distrust the Guardians altogether.

An hon. MEMBER: The Guardians cannot make terms with them.

MR. LEWIS said, that if this alteration were not made the power given to the Boards of Guardians would be beside the question entirely. Many of them remembered what was the result of giving the Boards of Guardians power to increase the remuneration of the teachers under the Education Act. They knew what a great difficulty there had been in obtaining additional remuneration for teachers in spite of that provision; and it seemed to him that that was rather a warning why the present matter should come under the specific form of the proposal in the Bill, or why in some way or other control should be kept over those payments. The discussion which had been going on for the last two hours and a-half was entirely owing to the indisposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant to show any inclination to stand by his own clause.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that as between the two words "approval" and "control" he did not think there was much to choose, though personally he should prefer the word "approval." He found "approval" used in almost every case of the kind.

Mr. Callan

In the Bill on the subject of registration, two years ago, which measure was sent up to the House of Lords, a proposal was made on this very subject that the Guardians should fix the remuneration, subject to the approval of the Local Government Board. That was an additional reason why he was inclined to think that the Committee should accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell). He (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had enjoyed the benefit of a frightful wiggling from the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gibson); but, after all, he certainly did not think there was anything very unreasonable in his desiring to arrive at what was the general feeling of hon. Gentlemen from Ireland on this subject. He had explained what the object of the Government on the whole matter was; and he thought, on the whole, that the object might be sufficiently met—that was to say, that of the interests of the persons affected would be sufficiently secured, together with uniformity, by the adoption of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman, even with the word "approval." He should be very glad to give the Local Authorities any additional power it was thought they ought to exercise.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he did not care in the least to defend any particular words in his proposal, and if the right hon. Gentleman desired to have the word "approval" in place of "control," he should not defend his own word. He would point out that if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) were adopted, there would be a consequential Amendment necessary—that was to say, that the word "may" would have to be substituted for the word "shall."

MR. DEASY said, he had frequently heard the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Charles Russell) speak strongly against the control of such a Board as the Local Government Board in Ireland. On a question of this kind the hon. and learned Gentleman came in and made a proposal which would have the effect of giving the Local Government Board the control over an enormous annual sum of money which was paid by the unfortunate ratepayers of Ireland. There was a very strong feeling on this point in the South of Ireland from the district he (Mr. Deasy) came from. He had had frequent conversations with collectors on the subject in one of the largest Poor Law Unions in Ireland. The tendency of the Local Government Board, for some years, had been to get as much control as they could in their own hands in regard to the administration of local affairs in that country. Seven or eight years ago the Secretary to the Poor Law Board had given evidence in that House in favour of allowing the Boards of Guardians to fix the amount of superannuation of Poor Law officers; but last year a change came over that gentleman, and he gave evidence of a different character. He was now in favour of giving the control of everything of this kind to the Local Government Board, and of taking it out of the hands of the representatives of the ratepayers. He (Mr. Deasy) considered that evidence extremely vexatious. It had very much annoyed the people of Ireland. Certainly, the Local Government Board deserved no consideration whatever at the hands of the Irish Members; and no one in the habit of attending that House Session after Session could fail to observe that on every occasion on which the Irish Members had obtained the opportunity they had brought forward and substantiated charges of incompetency against that Board—charges of gross favouritism in the carrying out of the laws. He hoped the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) would withdraw his Amendment, and that the Government would not show any favour to the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Charles Russell). He trusted that they would carry out the principle they had always been advocating—that was to say, to place the control over the expenditure of the rates, wherever they could properly do it, in the hands of the representatives of the ratepayers. He had never known in any Union in the South of Ireland any Poor Law officer inadequately paid by the Guardians; and as for the likelihood of their paying salaries unduly large, there could not be much fear of that when they took into consideration the large number of ex officio members on all the Boards. He could not understand why it was that this proposal had been made, or the course which had been taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would withdraw the Amendment, for the reason that the hon. Member for the City of Waterford (Mr. R. Power) had withdrawn his Amendment, on the understanding that a vote would be taken for or against the clause. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Charles Russell) had evidently been a party to that understanding; and why he should have jumped up to propose the Amendment now before the Committee, he (Mr. Deasy) could not understand.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, that after he had proposed the Amendment, which he considered a fair compromise, he was assured by the hon. Member for the City of Waterford (Mr. R. Power) that he was ready to accept it. The hon. Member subsequently left the Committee, and he (Mr. Charles Russell) had understood from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) that he had been asked by the hon. Member for Waterford to state that he was prepared to accept the Amendment.

MR. CALLAN: I did not say anything about accepting it; but I said I believed the hon. Member would accept it. To save discussion, I will withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment to proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Amendment again put.

MR. CALLAN said, he now begged to move, as an Amendment, to leave out the words "Local Government Board of Ireland."

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not appropriate to the present Amendment. The Amendment still stands to insert "several Boards of Guardians, subject to the control of," &c.

MR. CALLAN: Then I beg to leave out the words "subject to the control of."

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid that would not make sense, for the clause would then read—

"Several Boards of Guardians. . . . the Local Government Board may from time to time," &c.

MR. CALLAN said, his desire was to leave out the words "Local Government Board of Ireland," and to provide simply that the "several Boards of Guardians may from time to time," &c.

THE CHAIRMAN: The proper way to do that would be to negative the present Amendment, and then to propose, instead of those words, "the several Boards of Guardians."

MR. CALLAN said, that for the purpose of saving time, he would move at once the omission of the words "subject to the control of," his object being to leave the Guardians uncontrolled in this matter by the Local Government Board. He had a precedent for that, and he was in Order, seeing that it was his declared intention that he intended later on to move a consequential Amendment to leave out other words.

MR. HEALY said, that on the point of Order, he wished to remind the Committee that it had been distinctly ruled by the Speaker that Amendments might be moved, having the effect of leaving the Question before the House merely the word "That." Of course, "that" was not sense in itself; but it was possible to move to add words to it which would make sense. They had the famous case where the word "That" once remained on the Journal of the House.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the question of Order is to be disposed of first, it is true that the word "That" has been left the Question before the House, because "that" can be added to. It is always possible to add to "that" to make sense. In the present case, however, two Amendments would be necessary to make sense.

MR. CALLAN said, he had a right to move his Amendment according to his discretion, and he contended that if the Amendment he proposed were carefully read it would be seen that there would be no difficulty in making sense of it.

MR. PARNELL said, the Amendment, as he understood it to have been moved by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), was as follows:—

"That the several Boards of Guardians in Ireland may, subject to the control of"—

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL: The word "may" does not occur.

MR. PARNELL said, "subject to the control of" occurred. There appeared to be little sense in that if it stood by itself; but, taking it in connection with what followed, it would read—

"The several Boards of Guardians in Ireland, subject to the control of the Local Government Board in Ireland," &c.

He wished to ask the Chairman if that statement of the premises were a correct one? It was their desire that the several Boards of Guardians in Ireland should not be subject to the control of any authority—either of the Local Government Board or any other Central Board. They were, however, willing to adopt the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk, for the sake of peace and quietness, and for the purpose of raising a question they desired to raise subsequently; but only so far as this—namely, "several Boards of Guardians in Ireland." Then they would not be shut out from raising the subsequent question of the control which was not made. No doubt, there must be a control of some kind. If they agreed to the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman, the Committee would have decided on some control; and Irish Members objected to any control being agreed to at present.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no doubt that "subject to the control of" is consistent with what follows for the purpose of making sense. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) is to strike out words without which the Motion would not make sense. The object aimed at would be perfectly accomplished by rejecting this Amendment, and then moving, subsequently, to omit the words "Local Government Board of Ireland," and to insert instead, "the several Boards of Guardians of Ireland." That, I take it, is the object of the hon. Member for Louth, which the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) desires to support. We must first, however, dispose of the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. PARNELL suggested that, as the two questions were involved, it would be advisable for the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) to withdraw his Amendment and move it in a more simple form.

MR. LEWIS said, the proposition now made had been already suggested, and had been discussed for two hours, after which the Amendment had been withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, he would ask the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk whether he would withdraw his Amendment in order to move one to the following effect—to which the Irish Members, generally, would be prepared to assent—that the words “several Boards of Guardians in Ireland” should be inserted?

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he could not properly do that, as it would be inconsistent with the view he had taken and had submitted to the Committee.

MR. CALLAN pointed out, that if the hon. and learned Gentleman accepted that proposition there would be no difficulty in the case, as the words would read—

“The several Boards of Guardians in Ireland, subject to the control of the Local Government Board in Ireland.”

He put it to the Chairman—having had some experience in the House—that it was not necessary to consider any future portions of the Bill. It was proposed by an hon. Member to strike out certain words, and it would be in the discretion of the Committee afterwards to say what words should be added. He (Mr. Callan) would like a distinct ruling on the matter, so that they might have a record of what had taken place hereafter. The Amendment, “The several Boards of Guardians subject to the control of,” had been proposed, and he (Mr. Callan) had moved an Amendment to leave out “the control of,” with the intention, subsequently, of inserting “the Local Government Board for Ireland.” That would make sense of the Motion. He thought he would be within his right in moving that. At any rate, before he was satisfied he would ask to have it distinctly ruled that he was not entitled to move to leave out the words “subject to the control of.” If the Amendment made nonsense of that which preceded it, then, no doubt, it would not be competent to move it. But here he wished to leave out certain words, in order, subsequently, to make another proposal which would make sense. He wished to know whether an hon. Member could be deprived of his right of moving an Amendment to an Amendment sprung on them, and not on the Paper?

MR. GORST said, that with great respect to the Chairman, he wished to say that he had always understood the Rule of the House to be this—that no hon. Member could move an Amendment which would make nonsense of that which the Committee had already determined should stand part of a clause.

But the Amendment the hon. Member had moved would not necessarily make nonsense of the Bill, because the Committee had not yet determined what should follow the words proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk. The Committee was entirely at liberty to make sense of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Louth by the determination they might arrive at on the subsequent words. He (Mr. Gorst) thought he was right in saying that Amendments to clauses which did not in themselves make sense, but which required consequential Amendments to make sense of them, were constantly admitted.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment proposed could, no doubt, be made to make sense by a subsequent Amendment. The hon. Member for Louth, indeed, has suggested words which he could afterwards move, which would make the clause intelligible; but it is unfortunate that this method of proceeding involves the consideration of two Amendments together. If it is the sense of the Committee that we should take that course, I will put the Amendment.

MR. HEALY said, this question had been raised by the Poor Law Superannuation Bill. They had wrangled over it for some days; and the Government, owing to the strong objection to the system originally proposed, decided that the matter was within the competence of the Guardians. The Government now proposed to throw the whole thing over again on the Local Government Board, and they had accepted an Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) which was really worse than nothing, because it was simple hypocrisy. The consent of the Local Government Board meant this—that the Local Government Board were in full charge, and could upset any Union Guardians they did not like. It would be more respectful to the Boards of Guardians if this species of control were not given to them at all. Whatever they might do, they knew that the Local Government Board might, or might not, agree to it. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) professed to be most anxious to place increased responsibility on the local bodies. Very well, Irish Members made a proposal to intrust local affairs to the Local Boards, of which the landlords generally formed three-fourths; and yet the right hon. Gentleman mistrusted those bodies. The landlords, as ex officio members, formed half of the Boards of Guardians; and then, by reason of the proxy or multiple vote, they generally managed to get a fourth of the elected Guardians. Notwithstanding that, the Government declined to intrust them with so small a matter as the payment of their collectors. This was really a matter upon which nothing could be fairer than to except the Boards of Guardians, and for the very reason that upon those Boards the Tories and the Nationalists were represented; the landlord Party would see, by means of the ex officio members of the Boards and the gentlemen they elected by the multiple vote, that the collector did his duty to the Conservative section of the people. The Nationalist Party, by means of the elected Guardians, would see that the collector did his duty fairly by the popular Party; and therefore he considered that the Boards of Guardians were ideal bodies for this purpose. He was far from saying that Boards of Guardians generally were ideal bodies; but for this purpose they were exactly the bodies competent to deal with this question. He and his hon. Friends objected to the principle of leaving this matter to the Local Government Board for another reason. When a Bill similar to this was before the House in 1883, he moved an Amendment leaving out a clause similar to this, and he induced the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) to accept a clause dealing with the remuneration on the basis given under the 9th section of the Juries Procedure Act of 1877. What was the remuneration? It was a capitation allowance, and the Conservative Party supported him on that occasion. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the county of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) cordially supported his Amendment, because, as they all knew, those officials in Ireland, as a general rule, belonged to the Tory Party. The Government had allowed capitation allowance in the case of jurors; and it was equally the view of the Irish Members that there should be some distinct incentive to the clerks of the Unions and rate collectors to put voters upon the list. He thought that a higher pay ought to be given to the rate collectors—he did not care much about the clerks of the Union, because their work was less important. If a collector received a capitation grant he would see that a full complement of voters were put upon the list. That was the principle Parliament had adopted in the case of the jury list, and why not adopt it in this? He would leave the clerks of the Unions to the Guardians, but he strongly objected to the amounts allowed to the rate collectors being curtailed; unless the collectors got so much per head they would not be stimulated to as active energies as they otherwise might be. Seeing that the Government considered that a sound principle in the case of juries, he could not understand how they could object to apply it in this instance. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) could not take a different stand to that he did three years ago. The Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) might say that the same principle could not be applied in this case as in the case of the jury lists, because the numbers were so very disproportionate. He (Mr. Healy) would suggest to meet that by proposing only a proportion of the amount given under the Juries Act. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had a series of Amendments on this point; but if they were to get at that principle at all, it would be necessary that this proposal about the Local Government Board should be completely abandoned. He did not see why the Government should see fit to depart from what it agreed to in 1883, especially that now there was far more necessity for care on the part of the rate collectors, seeing that there were such large numbers of voters to bring in.

Mr. PARNELL said, he had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) would have stated what the views of the Government were with regard to the remuneration, and the way in which the collectors of rates and other Poor Law officials were to be remunerated in connection with their duties under this proposal. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that he would get through this Bill more easily by shrouding himself in perpetual silence.

Mr. Healy

and by leaving to such Members as the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) the duty of representing the Government on this occasion. He (Mr. Parnell) did not think that the interposition of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk had been advantageous or useful to the Government, or calculated to help the Committee in its proceedings, or calculated to save or economize the time of the Committee. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk had not put down a single Amendment to this Bill, so far as the Committee knew; and, if they were to believe the announcements in the public Press, the hon. and learned Member did not intend to stand at the approaching General Election for an Irish constituency; it would, therefore, appear that the hon. and learned Gentleman's interest in the Irish Franchise Bill was not even one of a very remote or limited description; in fact, that it amounted to nothing at all. He (Mr. Parnell), therefore, thought that the hon. Gentleman's action in taking advantage of the course adopted by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), who withdrew his Amendment on the understanding that the question, as to the source from whence these expenses were to be derived, should be discussed first—the action of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Charles Russell) in taking advantage of the withdrawal of an Amendment upon such conditions to take up the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. R. Power) immediately afterwards, and move it as his own, was not creditable to the hon. and learned Gentleman. It was, however, not altogether an unprecedented action on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman, because the Committee would remember that on a certain celebrated occasion he tried to appropriate a clause in the Land Act which went by the name of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy). The subsequent course of the hon. and learned Member in refusing to allow the Committee to discuss the principal portion of his Amendment was not at all a convenient course. For his (Mr. Parnell's) part, he had endeavoured, during the progress of this Bill, to facilitate its course as much as he could; but if they were landed very often in such entanglements, and placed at such disadvantage as they were placed in by the action of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), he did not see how they were to make any progress at all. The hon. and learned Member had evidently not studied the Bill—he had not placed a single Amendment on the Paper. He (Mr. Parnell) and his hon. Friends had studied the Bill, and they had placed on the Paper Amendments calculated to carry out their views; and he thought they should have been entitled to place their views with regard to the remuneration of collectors, and the source from whence that remuneration should be taken, before the Committee, instead of being pounced upon by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, and cut off from all discussion, and all opportunity of expressing their opinions upon those points, by his action. He (Mr. Parnell) was bound to say he did not think the course chosen by the hon. and learned Member would be found one convenient to the Irish Members, or to the hon. and learned Member himself, or to the Committee in general. But now with regard to the immediate question of the authority of the Local Government Board over the doings of the Poor Law Guardians. He thought the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk should do one thing or the other—he should either trust the Poor Law Guardians or the Local Government Board. He (Mr. Parnell) did not see in what way the registration of voters was likely to be benefited by this mixing up of authority. As he had said before in the discussion on the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), speed was of great importance in this matter. There were very large numbers of men to be added to the voters' list, amounting, according to the calculations of those best qualified to judge, to something like 600,000. There was a very limited number of officials to do the work, and it was of importance that those officials should know, on as early a date as possible, what remuneration they were to receive. They would not go to work with any appetite for the work, or any desire to complete it thoroughly and effectually, until they knew what they were to get. What did the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Charles Russell) propose? The hon. and learned Member proposed that after the Board of Guardians had got over their natural sluggishness, and after they had fixed the rate of remuneration, a further delay should take place until the approval of the Local Government Board was obtained as to the rate of remuneration. He (Mr. Parnell) would have liked to see the remuneration of the collectors fixed by the Act, so that the officials, who ought to be now at work in order that there should be any hope of their completing their task, should get to work, even before the Act was passed, with the knowledge of what they were to receive. The hon. and learned Member proposed as the first delay that the Boards of Guardians would have to wait until the Act was passed before they could hold a meeting. Now, that meeting might not take place for a fortnight, or, in some cases, for a month after the passing of the Act; indeed, it might not take place at all, as there was nothing in the Act to compel the Guardians to fix any rate of remuneration. In some of the most critical counties in Ireland, in counties where it was absolutely necessary that the officials should go to work at once, the time might elapse within which the work was to be done before the officials interested would have any opportunity of knowing how much they were to get for their work. After the Boards of Guardians had taken action, supposing they did take action, would come the further delay occasioned by the necessity of the rate of remuneration fixed receiving the approval of the Local Government Board. Suppose the Local Government Board disapproved of the rate of remuneration, then another meeting of the Boards of Guardians would have to be held. The meeting would have to be summoned by notice, and, therefore, a further delay would have to take place. Perhaps the Board of Guardians would get into a long correspondence with the Local Government Board with regard to the merits of the case, and the question of the rate of remuneration might not be settled until the time allowed had elapsed. Those were serious considerations; they were considerations which would have occurred to the mind of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) if he had taken the trouble to look into the matter. Unfortunately, he had not taken that trouble. He (Mr. Parnell) asked the Government whether, if this was a case in which they were interested, they would not provide efficient machinery for the purpose? What did they do under the Juries Act. They fixed the rate of remuneration by Act of Parliament; they gave power to the Lord Lieutenant, in Council, to make his Order, and they settled that that Order should be of such a practical nature that the rate collector would have an interest in returning a full list of men fit to serve on juries. If it was a question such as that connected with juries, where the Government might easily hang, or imprison, or send some unfortunate peasant into penal servitude, the Government would set their wits to work and produce a complete Bill; they would not be drawn aside by such catchpenny Amendments as that of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell). He also objected to the proposal on other grounds than that of delay. If they were going to trust the Boards of Guardians, why not trust them altogether, why give to the Local Government Board power of which they had got too much already? He entirely objected to this trammelling by the Local Government Board. Parliament had a right to trammel local bodies; Parliament had undoubtedly a right to fix the rate to be paid to the collectors. But what was this Local Government Board in Ireland? It was a Board which was composed of the nominees of Earl Spencer, men who were perfectly notorious for their hatred of Irish national life; for their desire, first of all, to starve the people of the country into submission and then to banish them out of the country altogether. Such was the Local Government Board to whom it was proposed to hand over this important duty connected with the registration of voters. The Committee knew what the result had been of the action of the nominees of Earl Spencer in the case of the Irish boundaries. He (Mr. Parnell) objected to follow the precedent set in that case. He objected to handing over the counties in Ireland to be again manipulated by the nominees of Earl Spencer, especially where Parties were equally divided, and where it would be of importance to obstruct and delay the preparation of the register of voters. He objected to the interference of the Local Government Board in this matter.

because they would adopt methods of procedure which would have the effect of rendering it impossible for the peasantry of Ireland to be placed on the voters' lists. The sooner those initial proceedings were taken the better. A great deal too much time had been lost already by the dilatory proceedings of the Government. Why did not the Government follow the precedent set by the Registration Bill of 1883, which the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) agreed to? In that Registration Bill Parliament decided that so much per head of the persons placed on the list should be given to the rate collectors. What had happened in the meantime to induce the Government to change their mind? Surely, if such a provision was good in 1883, it was good now? The Committee had heard no argument whatever from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), or the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan), or the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) against the merits of that provision. Why, if it was good then, was it not left open to the Committee at least to move the introduction of a similar provision on the present occasion; why was this Bill framed upon entirely different principles with regard to the remuneration of rate collectors to the Bill of 1883? The Government knew very well that if they did agree to the addition of a beneficial provision in the Registration Bill of 1883, they might rely on the House of Lords throwing the whole Bill out. They were not quite so certain of the co-operation of the House of Lords on the present occasion. It might be that the House of Lords would refuse some of the provisions, but it was certain they could not throw the Bill out in its entirety. He protested against the conduct of the Government upon the present occasion. It was not fair to the people of Ireland that the Government should take advantage of every side-wind to prevent the peasantry of Ireland obtaining their just electoral rights.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that if the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) seriously believed that the object of the Government, and his (Mr. Trevelyan's) object in coming down that night, was to do their best so as to diminish the number of Irishmen who were to give votes at the next General Election, he was quite welcome to his belief. He (Mr. Trevelyan) certainly never heard a speech which went so little home to his conscience as that which the hon. Member for the City of Cork had just delivered. His (Mr. Trevelyan's) only object on the Representation of the People Bill, on the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill, and on the Registrations Bills which he had the honour of bringing forward in that House, or in supporting in the House, and in the support he was now giving to this Registration Bill, which he hoped might soon become an Act, was that the greatest number of Irishmen who were entitled to votes should enjoy the vote. Why was it that the Government were supporting the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell)? It was because it was in the form which had commended itself to previous Governments, which had worked well in Ireland, and which, in the opinion of the present Government, was the form which would work the best. The Registration Act of 1864 contained a provision of this exact nature—namely, that the Guardians of the poor of each Union might, by an order, make some annual allowance out of the rates to the clerks of such Unions respectively as the Guardians might think proper, but that such order should not be acted upon, or any payment made, until the same was approved by the Poor Law Commissioners, and payment sanctioned by them. He was not aware that any complaint had been made against the operation of that Act. The hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had quoted the Bill of 1883. Now that Bill, as brought in, provided that the Guardians of the poor of each Union, might, by order, make such annual allowance out of the rates to the poor rate collectors as the said Guardians might think right, but no such order might be acted upon, or payment made thereunder, until the same should be approved of by the Local Government Board for Ireland. Pressure was put upon the Government, and the fixed scale of payment was agreed upon. That, however, was not the original proposal of the Government; but the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) and the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) must remember that the constituencies to which that provision was applied were extremely different constituencies to which this Bill applied. To what extent would the county constituencies of Ireland be increased? The hon. Member for the City of Cork himself had said that the Franchise Act would cause an addition of 600,000 men to the Register.

MR. PARNELL: I do not think they will add half that number under the registration proposals of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that according to the statement of the hon. Gentleman, 600,000, or some large number of men, would have to be dealt with under this Act. Now, that was a different thing from the miserably and scandalously small number of county electors who would have to be dealt with under the Bill which he (Mr. Trevelyan) had the honour to introduce to the House in 1883. He thought it was extremely important that there should be some Supervising Body who could remove from the minds of rival politicians in Ireland the suspicion that the overseers and rate collectors could in any way be influenced by the politics of the Boards of Guardians. He did not think the Local Government Board would find it very necessary to interfere. He felt certain that the interference would not cause the inconvenience or the delay which had suggested itself to hon. Members opposite. He did not think that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) deserved the hard words bestowed upon it by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell); his own belief was that the Committee would take a quieter view and a more practical view of the question and support the Amendment.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he hoped the Committee would not consider it improper that he should again ask its attention for a moment or two, especially after the observations which the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had thought proper to address to the Committee. So far as the observations of the hon. Member related to his (Mr. Charles Russell's) conduct, apart from the present Amendment, he should certainly not notice them. He did not think that the hon. Member for the City of Cork would, when the heat of the moment had passed away, look back with entire satisfaction to what he had said in relation to him (Mr. Charles Russell); indeed, he doubted whether the hon. Member, even at that moment, was quite satisfied that his observations were just. He did not think it would be becoming that he should occupy the attention of the Committee with personal matters which had nothing to do with the present discussion; but in relation to his conduct as to the matter now before the Committee, he must take leave to correct the hon. Member for the City of Cork. It was not true that he had taken no interest in this Bill. It was true that he had been here during the entire discussion, which had now lasted for a considerable time; and it was equally true that the hon. Member for the City of Cork had not been present during the whole discussion. If the hon. Member for the City of Cork had been present when the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) was before the Committee, it would have been within the competence and right of the hon. Member for the City of Cork to have pointed out that there might be certain inconveniences in the course which was being pursued. If the hon. Member for the City of Cork had been here, he would have known that it was stated to him (Mr. Charles Russell) in the House by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan)—although, as the hon. Member now said, and, of course, he (Mr. Charles Russell) must accept the statement, not by the direction of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power)—he (Mr. R. Power) was prepared to assent to the withdrawal of the Amendment.

MR. CALLAN said, he had made no communication to the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Charles Russell), except across the floor of the House.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL thanked the hon. Member for reminding the Committee that that was his (Mr. Charles Russell's) only mode of communication with the hon. Member. He asked to be allowed to remind the Committee of the course which this discussion had taken. When the discussion was initiated, some hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, prominently his hon.

Mr. Trevelyan

Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson), was insisting upon the Government proposal being adopted; because, he said—and therein he was corroborated by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland—that representations had reached hon. and right hon. Members from clerks of Unions and rate collectors that the Boards of Guardians were making no arrangements for compensating them for the extra labour that would be put upon them. He believed that it would be necessary that there should be some controlling power, not only for the purpose of requiring that remuneration should be fixed, but also to decide what the scale of remuneration should be. Accordingly, on the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Waterford (Mr. R. Power), he had suggested the Amendment standing in his own name in opposition to the Government proposal embodied in the clause. He had said that the principle he was in favour of was that the Boards of Guardians, who raised the money, should have the control of that money, and he said that that was the principle he should like to see carried out. But inasmuch as it had been suggested that in this case the matters to be dealt with were somewhat of a delicate nature, and that complicated considerations might arise which would lead to a want of uniformity of payment—that was to say, a larger payment in some cases than in others, and, in some cases, no provision for payment at all—he said that, while it was necessary that remuneration should be given, there should also be some machinery which would insure uniformity of payment in proportion to the work done; and he had said, in justification, that by that contrivance Parliament would secure uniformity of payment, and also secure the practical control of the Boards of Guardians, who raised the funds, and that, if there were control by the Local Government Board, it would be exercised in the face of the country, and in view of the elected Guardians on the spot. Those considerations, he might add, seemed to have some weight with hon. Members on the other side of the House. But there was one more word which he desired to say. What right had the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) to address to him the language which he had made use of in reference to this question? The hon. Member for the City of Waterford rose in his place and proposed to withdraw his Amendment; and the hon. Member for the City of Cork taunted him (Mr. Charles Russell) as if he were a party to the Amendment being withdrawn on the understanding that his (Mr. Charles Russell's) Amendment should be withdrawn. He denied that. The hon. Member for the City of Cork charged him in effect with having been a party to an arrangement from which he had dishonestly withdrawn, and that baseless insinuation of the hon. Member he repelled with contempt and scorn.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, having listened to the discussion on this question, there appeared to him to be great force in the view taken by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) that the Committee should settle the basis on which these expenses of the clerks of Unions and poor rate collectors should be charged before they settled by whom they were to be regulated. The hon. Member for the City of Cork had more than once insisted on that proposition being admitted; and on that account the hon. Member for the City of Waterford (Mr. R. Power) had been induced to withdraw the Amendment he had moved to the clause. As the Bill now stood he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) could very well understand that Her Majesty's Government should feel some difficulty in adhering to it, for it provided that the expenses in question should be paid by the Boards of Guardians, and that the Guardians should have no voice whatever in deciding what the amount of those expenses should be. It had been suggested that the Local Government Board should be the controlling authority in this matter over the Boards of Guardians. Now, the control must either be real or not—if unreal, it would be of no use; and if it were real, it certainly involved interference with local government, which was an objectionable principle, and one which he thought the Committee ought, if possible, to avoid. He must not be understood to say that some control might not be necessary in this case; but he said it was an unsatisfactory way of settling this question, and he would rather like a settlement to be found in the alteration of the incidence of the charge—that was to say, by placing it upon the Treasury rather than upon local rates. If the expense of registration had been for some time past imposed on the localities, he could not conceive that anyone would propose that it should be so imposed now. These charges related to matters which concerned the nation at large as well as the local ratepayers; and it might be said that they were not a local but a national charge. Therefore, it appeared to him that there was force in the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) that there should be some scale established for the remuneration of the officials in question, and that they should be paid according to that scale by the Treasury. Of course, if that change were to be made in respect of Ireland, it should also be made in respect of England and Scotland; and he could see no reason whatever for continuing the incidence of these expenses upon the rates. He hoped that the incidence might be so altered as that it should be placed on the Treasury.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, he had stated that he preferred the clause in the Bill, but that he would support the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell). He was prepared to do that if the clause were withdrawn and a Schedule brought in fixing the scale of remuneration not only for poor rate collectors, but also for clerks of Unions and Clerks of the Peace, so that the remuneration of all those officials might be fixed. His object was to secure independence of action on the part of those persons. Let the Committee suppose that the poor rate collector or clerk of any particular Union had incurred the displeasure of the Board of Guardians, and that the latter refused them any, or scarcely any, remuneration. Therefore, he said, make the rate collectors and clerks of Unions independent of the Board of Guardians in this respect, so that they might be in a position fearlessly to discharge their duties. Let them be placed in a position of independence with regard to any political Party. He would certainly prefer very much that a scale of remuneration should be fixed in the Bill to which poor rate collectors and clerks of Unions could appeal.

MR. HEALY said, the position they were now in was the result of the Government never accepting the suggestion of anyone, however well acquainted he might be with the subject under consideration. He need not say that hon. Members from Ireland knew more about this question which related to Ireland than any other Members of the House; but, notwithstanding that, they had to come down to the House and hammer away at the Government for hours on a simple question, and then the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) and the Government supporter, the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson), came in and supported the proposal of hon. Members on those Benches. What excuse did the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) give for not accepting their suggestion? The proposal of the Government amounted to this—that the Local Government Board had more intelligence than the House of Commons. It was proposed that they should abdicate their functions in favour of Messrs. Brown, Jones, and Robinson. There were 30 or 40 Members on those Benches in favour of a certain proposal; it had received the support of several hon. Gentlemen representing the Whigs, and the support also of the right hon. Baronet on the Front Opposition Bench (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach); and surely, under those circumstances, their proposal was entitled to acceptance by the Government. But the Government said—“No, we will not accept your suggestion.” The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave it as one reason why the Government could not accept their proposal that they did not know how many voters would come on the list. But he would ask, if the Government did not know, how was the Local Government Board—how was Mr. Robinson—to know how many voters would come on the list? If the clause remained in its present form, there would always be uncertainty, whereas if their proposal were embodied in the Bill, all the Government scruples would be removed, and all difficulty about the matter would be at an end. With reference to the clerks of Unions, he did not agree with the hon. Member for Tyrone in thinking that they ought to take the same trouble over the matter of their remuneration as they did in the cases of the poor rate collectors. His opinion was that Her Majesty's Government should withdraw this clause entirely, and consent to bring up another clause on the Report stage of the Bill, embodying the capitation principle.

MR. LEWIS said, that after the many suggestions made in the course of this discussion, the proposal was now made that the clause should be withdrawn, and a clause based on the capitation principle brought up on Report. Now, he objected altogether to the principle of capitation payment being applied in this case. He thought it would furnish an inducement to overseers to put unqualified persons on the list. [MR. HEALY: They will not be paid.] He did not know that; they would be paid according to the list made up. The list of voters would be very different from the jury list, which was only for the purpose of getting the names of a comparatively small number of persons qualified to serve on juries. This was a totally different case, and, as he said before, he believed the introduction of a capitation grant would lead to a number of unqualified persons being put on the list. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) proposed that the remuneration should be at the rate of £2 10s. per annum to each collector for any number of names up to 25, £2 for every additional 100 names up to £500, and £1 for every succeeding 100; provided that no collector should receive a greater sum than £50 in any one year. It seemed to him that a very fine thing might be made out of that; the collectors might sweep into the list any number of persons for which they would be paid so much a head, and the county would have to be satisfied with it. He hoped that the suggestion to withdraw the clause arrived at after four or five hours' discussion would not be assented to, and that Her Majesty's Government would adhere to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell).

MR. GORST said, that the course taken within the last few minutes seemed to have brought the Committee into a state of unanimity on one point. They had agreed to sink objections and come down upon the Consolidated Fund for the cost of registration. But there was one Member of the Committee who had not spoken, and whose opinion on this matter was entitled to some consideration. He would like to hear what were the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject, because if the expenses of registration, as was now proposed, were to fall upon Imperial and not upon local funds, they must first get the right hon. Gentleman to open the bank for them. His own opinion was that it was not competent to any hon. Member to move such an Amendment; and he supposed that the Members of the Government who had charge of Irish affairs could not assent to it until they had obtained leave of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He should like to know whether that right hon. Gentleman would hold out any hope that the Consolidated Fund would bear the cost of registration of voters in Ireland? If they were informed by the right hon. Gentleman that that would be the case, the Committee could proceed on the line that had been debated; but, if not, he would suggest that the time of the Committee was being thrown away, and that they must look for some other alternative.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he had never been more surprised than when the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) sprung upon the Government the proposal he had made. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) himself had an Amendment on the Paper to leave out Clause 6, and to substitute for it a clause calling on the Guardians of the poor to make certain payments in connection with the registration of Irish voters out of the rates—that was to say, £2 10s. per annum to each collector for any number of names up to 25; £2 for every additional names up to 500, and £1 for every succeeding 100. No one could, after this, have guessed that there was any serious intention to remove these charges from the rates. But the right hon. Baronet suddenly came down and proposed, not only with respect to the incidence of the charge in Ireland, but also with respect to its incidence in the other parts of the Kingdom, that the whole of the registration expenses should fall upon the Consolidated Fund. The right hon. Baronet made that proposal without any Notice whatever, his Friends having made a proposal with respect to County Court Judges in principle similar to that of the arrangement now existing. The Government were suddenly asked with respect to the whole Kingdom, in the course of the discussion on an Irish Registration Bill, to establish a principle throwing a very large charge on the Consolidated Fund. In reply, therefore, to the appeal very properly made to him by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), he at once said that he certainly could not consent to make such a change as was proposed in the Bill, the effect of which would be to cast a very heavy additional charge on the Consolidated Fund at once, and probably a much heavier charge hereafter. He had felt it his duty to make these observations to the Committee, and the question having been put to him by the hon. and learned Member opposite as to whether it would be competent to move an Amendment to that effect, he answered it by saying that no such proposal could be made without the consent of the responsible Minister.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he had never heard a more technical answer given on a large subject. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not been able to argue the question on those broader grounds on which he (Mr. Stanhope) considered it ought to be argued. His right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had raised this question—Were the expenses of registration a matter of local interest, or were they a matter of Imperial interest? And he might point out to the Committee that that question was not a new one. It had been argued in that House on former occasions, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer knew that it would come forward in connection with the Bill; at any rate, if the right hon. Gentleman did not know it, he would know it before the English Registration Bill left the House. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on that side felt that the charges in question were matters of Imperial interest. They believed that it was a gross injustice to charge the enormously increased expenditure that would be incurred under the Representation of the People Act upon the local rates, and that somehow or other they must find a remedy for the evil.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would ask the Committee to carry their minds back to the year 1868, when greatly increased charges were thrown upon the boroughs of England. At that time Parliament enfranchised a large number of new voters, and the boroughs had to pay in consequence greatly increased registration charges; but not one word was said then about throwing those charges upon Imperial funds. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) and the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had nothing to say then in favour of relieving the small towns of the increased burden of registration charges which the Act of that year threw upon them; they were not a matter of Imperial interest then, and the localities were left to bear the charges themselves. But now—17 years afterwards—when Parliament was doing for the counties what in 1868 it did for the boroughs, the county Members came forward, and said—"You must not do for the counties what you did for the boroughs." They were now giving the counties increased representation; and did hon. Gentlemen opposite think it fair or right, in Committee on a Registration Bill, to raise this broad question, and to introduce the novelty of making Imperial taxation pay for the increased representation of the localities? How could they in justice make the boroughs pay their own registration expenses as they had hitherto done, and then say that they should not only pay for themselves, but for the registration expenses of the county?—for that was, practically, what the proposal amounted to. ["No, no!"] Imperial taxation, he contended, did pay for the expenses of representation; but until a week ago there had never been a suggestion that the expenses of registration should be defrayed from any other source than that of local taxation. ["No, no!"] If he was wrong in saying that, why, he asked, was not the same practical view taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite when the boroughs were saddled with increased registration charges? Having allowed the boroughs to pay those charges in 1868, why was it that the county Members now asked that an opposite course should be followed? The proposal was not only novel, but there was a practical objection to the course proposed.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY) said, he must point out the double irregularity that was being committed. The Question before the Committee was whether the Local Government Board or the Boards of Guardians should fix the rate of remuneration to officials for carrying out the registration of voters under the Representation of the People Act. The question under consideration was not as to the source from which that remuneration should come. That was the first irregularity. The second irregularity was the discussion as to whether the registration charges should be thrown on the Consolidated Fund, with regard to which he would point out that the question could not be discussed on this Bill without the consent of a Committee previously set up.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he asked pardon for having transgressed the Rule of the Committee. He was answering the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope).

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, the position taken up by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney Gentleman appeared to be this. Being a borough Member, the hon. and learned Gentleman argued that, because the borough Representatives neglected their duty in 1868—

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): Order, order!

MR. GLADSTONE: We hear now, Sir, of 1868—

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): Order, order!

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he rose for the purpose of appealing to the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) to withdraw his Amendment, in order that the Committee might proceed to discuss the more important question raised in the second paragraph of the clause. He believed it would be very much for the convenience of the Committee if he would take that course.

COLONEL NOLAN said, the Bill had been wrongly drawn. The draftsman had first made them spend a lot of money, but had never said until afterwards where the money was to come from. All that confusion arose from the way in which the Bill had been drafted. He saw the Chief Secretary laughing; perhaps the draftsman had drawn it wrongly on purpose. He hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn, and then they could get to the main question as to where the money was to come from.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, that if it was the general wish of the Committee, he should be most happy to withdraw the Amendment; but he must first have it made clear to his mind that that was the general wish of the Committee; and he was by no means clear upon that point at present.

MR. GIBSON said, the matter stood thus. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) proposed the Amendment as a compromise to the suggestion that the matter should be dealt with by the Boards of Guardians, and not by the Local Government Board. When that suggestion was made, his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Charles Russell) came forward and proposed as a compromise that it should be in the hands of the Boards of Guardians, subject to the control of the Local Government Board. He (Mr. Gibson) assumed that, having regard to the discussion which was going to be raised on the 2nd paragraph, the Boards of Guardians would not be mentioned again at this stage; and therefore he would suggest that the Amendment should be withdrawn, and the whole of the 1st paragraph should remain as it was. They would then be able to make such observations as might occur to them on the 2nd paragraph.

MR. CALLAN said, that if the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk was willing to withdraw his Amendment, he (Mr. Callan) was ready to facilitate that operation by withdrawing his proposal to amend the Amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Callan), by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): Is it your pleasure that the original Amendment be withdrawn?

MR. LEWIS: No, no.

MR. CALLAN: Then, if the original Amendment is not to be withdrawn, I beg to move that my Amendment to it be restored, and that we leave out the words "subject to the control of."

MR. HEALY said, that as the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) had withdrawn his Amendment to the Amendment on the understanding that the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) would withdraw his proposal, surely the Government would not now place the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk in the position of not allowing him to withdraw it. If the Government or any Member of the House intended to take that course, the proper thing to do would have been to have objected to the withdrawal of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Louth.

MR. PARNELL said, he did not see that they could proceed profitably with a discussion upon the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, because after they had arrived at a decision upon it they would really only be at the beginning of the clause, and they would have to discuss further Amendments subsequently, which would undoubtedly come from different sides of the Committee and from different points of view, all of which would take up a great deal of time. He, therefore, thought there were only two courses open to the Committee, if they were to proceed with any hope of making progress,—either that the clause should be withdrawn, to give an opportunity to the Irish Executive to consider the question, with the view of bringing up a fresh clause upon the Report; or else the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis), who had objected to the withdrawal of the Amendment, should take into account the fact that he would be able to raise this particular question in the subsequent discussion on a new clause which would undoubtedly have to be moved, and that he would not debar himself from adopting the principles he wished to adopt with regard to the control of the Local Government Board, or whatever other principles he might be desirous of inserting, and should, therefore, consent to allow the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk to be withdrawn. There was, undoubtedly, a very general wish on both sides of the Committee that they should proceed to the settlement of the question involved in the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), and thus utilize the favourable opportunity which had now presented itself. If the hon. Member for Londonderry did not persist in his refusal to allow the Amendment to be withdrawn, the hon. Gentleman would not debar himself from the assertion of the principle which he wished to assert, because it could be asserted in the discussion of the new clause which would have to be moved.

MR. LEWIS wished to say why he had objected to the withdrawal of the Amendment. During the earlier part of the evening, when there were probably not above 10 or 12 persons in the House, and after they had discussed for two hours and a-half the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), that Amendment was allowed to be withdrawn. But 10 minutes afterwards, it was proposed to be moved again, and when he (Mr. Lewis) raised some question on the point, the Chairman told him that he could not object because the previous Amendment had been withdrawn and not rejected. That was why he had wished to draw attention to the matter, and to point out that the withdrawal of Amendments, when followed by re-proposing them directly afterwards, was most inconvenient. However, he had no desire to press his objection any further.

Amendment (Mr. Charles Russell), by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL NOLAN moved an Amendment to Clause 6, page 3, line 17, to leave out all the words after the word "defrayed" to the end of the clause. He said, he did not intend to go minutely into the merits of this question, for the reason that a large number of hon. Members had already made up their minds, and several had already spoken upon it, although on a different Amendment. Hon. Members' minds were, therefore, full of the subject. But he would just explain one point. He had proposed no charge upon the Consolidated Fund, because he knew that that would be out of Order; but what he did propose was to leave out the charge upon the local rates; and if that were agreed to, it would then be the duty of the Government to propose some other way of paying the people who did that work. He thought the Amendment ought to be carried, both upon its merits and according to the strength of Parties in the House. That was not a question of asking that a local rate should be paid out of Imperial resources, but of refusing to pay an Imperial tax out of local rates. They were asked to pay out of every poor Union in Ireland £200 or £300 to return Members to Parliament. Why should the ratepayers have to pay that? They might as well have to pay the Members. If the payment of Members had to be proposed at any time it would have to be proposed out of Imperial taxes, and not out of local rates. The expense of registration should properly be a rate on the whole country at large. He did not see why barristers and rich merchants, who lived in fine houses, and who were rated to a very small extent on those houses, should not take their share of the burden; and why this charge should not be paid out of Income Tax instead of out of the poor rates of the miserably poor. The Committee ought to be strong enough to carry this Amendment. He did not see why Irish Members on the Ministerial side of the House should not unite with Irish Members on the Opposition side to vote on behalf of the Guardians of the Poor, and probably some of the English county Members would support them. If he could only get the Irish Members on the Ministerial side, or even one-half of them, to vote with him, and if they would stick up for the Guardians, they ought to be able to carry the Amendment, even in a full House. He would now leave the Amendment to the Committee. It was perfectly plain what it meant. Under it, the charges would not have to be defrayed out of the local rates, and the Government would be left to propose some alternative afterwards.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 17, to leave out all the words after the word "defrayed," to the end of the Clause.—(Colonel Nolan.)

Question proposed,

"That the words 'the boards of guardians of the several Poor Law Unions are hereby required to pay out of union funds the amounts so fixed by the Local Government Board :

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. and gallant Gentleman, if I understand him rightly, says that if the Committee negatives the imposition of this charge upon the local rates it will be the duty of the Government to find some other source. It is my duty in some degree to consider what is the duty of the Government, and I differ entirely from the hon. and gallant Gentleman. I give the hon. and gallant Gentleman clearly to understand that he must not reckon upon me to discharge the duty which he seeks to throw upon me. I am not prepared to say that it is the duty of a Government, in considering a Registration Bill, to enter upon the question of the incidence of a particular charge, hitherto paid out of local funds, upon the Consolidated Fund, and I claim for myself entire liberty to decline that responsibility, and to throw upon the hon. and gallant Gentleman—and upon all who may support him, the consequences, as regards this Bill, and any portion of the settlement to which it is directed, that may flow from the vote he intends to give. I will have nothing to do with giving it any countenance, so far as I am personally concerned. [Colonel NOLAN: Hear, hear!] Yes, "Hear, hear." I am glad to see that the hon. and gallant Gentleman understands me. I will give no countenance to the principle that upon a question of this kind, with regard to the incidental consequences of an enlargement of the franchise, with respect to a charge always imposed upon the local rates, that à propos of this clause, the question can be legitimately raised of imposing this charge upon the Consolidated Fund. Therefore, the hon. and gallant Gentleman will clearly understand that I decline to undertake the duty which, by the vote he proposed to give, he desires to impose upon me.

DR. LYONS said, he wished to represent the claims of an important body of public officers. He had had very strong representations from the City of Dublin—

MR. GORST rose to Order. The hon. Member was addressing himself to the 3rd sub-section of the clause. The Question was whether the 2nd sub-section should stand part of the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): The Question before the Committee is to omit both the 2nd and the 3rd sub-sections.

DR. LYONS said, that his attention had been drawn to this matter by a very important body of public officers, who had asked him to represent their claims to that House. No provision whatever was made for the payment of the collectors and the Collector General for Dublin; and yet special provision was made that this section should apply to the Collector General of Rates in Dublin. They were advised—and they had taken care to obtain first-class advice upon the matter—that their position would be indeterminate if the Bill passed as it was now worded; and, therefore, he desired to point out this blot in justice to this body of very responsible public officers, upon whom the collection of the rates would fall.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I should like, if I may, to call the attention of the Committee to what it is that is now proposed. The franchise has been lowered, from time to time, and the localities which have profited by the widened constituency have hitherto borne the burden of the increased expense of registration. While the franchise was being gradually extended in the boroughs, the county Members have never once advised that the localities should be relieved from this increased cost of registration. I would respectfully ask the attention of the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire who has already spoken (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) to this point—that wherever there has been an increase of the franchise given to localities, up to the present moment, those localities have been allowed to bear the increased expense of registration. If he will give an instance to the contrary, I shall be glad to hear it; but, from time to time, when the franchise has been increased, the localities have borne the increased expenditure. There has not been an instance in which there was any suggestion to the contrary. In 1867 we threw upon the boroughs an increased expenditure amounting to a sum of very nearly £1,000,000. Was one word said then about the increased expenditure being borne by Imperial taxation? I must ask the right hon. Baronet and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), who are now representing the counties, to reflect whether there is not a little want of generosity in their proposal? They allowed the boroughs to bear the increased expense. No suggestion came then that there should be aid from Imperial taxation; and, without grudging, the boroughs had borne the cost of the advantage which they had obtained, without a whisper that there should be any aid from Imperial taxation. Now, Sir, progress has been made, and the counties are going to obtain the same benefit this year which the boroughs obtained in 1868; and now the county Members, represented by the right hon. Baronet and the hon. Gentleman, who allowed the boroughs to bear the increased expenditure because it was a local benefit to the boroughs, and not an Imperial benefit, which was then obtained, and who allowed this to go on for 17 years past, come forward and refuse to pay the money. They refused to be placed on an equal position with the boroughs. They say that that which was only local when applied to the boroughs in 1868 is not a local benefit when given with equal hand to the counties, but has become an Imperial matter.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I rise to Order. I wish to call attention to the fact that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General is repeating over and over again the same arguments, in almost the same words; and I wish to ask you, Sir, whether he does not thereby make himself obnoxious to the Rule against tedious and irrelevant repetition?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I am speaking to a different Amendment.

MR. HEALY: Against time. Obstruction.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I am speaking to a different Amendment. The Amendment proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) was that this expenditure should be borne by Imperial taxation. [Colonel NOLAN: No.] Well, at all events, that it should not be borne by the local rates. The Members for the counties allowed the boroughs to bear it in 1868, and for 17 years they have borne it; but directly it is put on the counties the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire say—"You shall hear more of this if you do not relieve the counties from bearing the expense of their own registration." Well, Sir, may I not ask that there should be equal justice dealt out to the counties and to the boroughs? The Members for the counties, having cast upon the boroughs of England the expenses of this registration, now come down to this House and—I will not use the word I was going to use—I will not say what I mean—but why should they not bear the same burden which they willingly cast upon the boroughs in 1868? Are they not as well able to bear it? Have they not the same generosity—the same sense of justice? Why should they cast on the boroughs in 1868 this expenditure, and seek to evade it for the counties now, in 1885? May I point out to the Committee the great danger that they run if once they make one body bear the task of spending money and another body the task of paying for it? The suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member opposite is to allow local bodies to incur this expenditure; and it will be extremely difficult to check them. You will have to deal with Revising Barristers and others, and you will allow all this to be paid for out of the Imperial Exchequer. Thus there will be two elements; one body will have to spend the money, with very little controlling power over it, and another body will have to bear the expense; so that you may produce a reckless amount of expenditure on the one hand, and on the other a burden cast upon those who do not derive immediate benefit from that expenditure. I do not know that anything I can say will shake the present combination between Irish Members and English county Members; but it will be found that the principle is not one which ought to receive the support of any of those who reflect calmly and with justice on the subject.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he did not profess any tender regard for the Consolidated Fund, and he did not see anything objectionable in principle in a charge of this nature, which unquestionably might be said to be a charge of an Imperial character, being met from Imperial sources. But the practical question on which he would like to be informed before he gave his vote was this—supposing this Amendment were carried adversely to the view of the Government, what course would the Government take with reference to the Bill itself? He wanted to be informed on that point, because whatever suggestions might be made in the hurry of the moment about his want of interest in Irish affairs he certainly did take a deep interest in them. The Government were entitled to take this credit to themselves—that on a previous clause which had already been disposed of, and by which it was sought by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite to disfranchise a large body of the people who would otherwise be entitled to the franchise, the Government loyally stood to their guns. He (Mr. Russell) was anxious that the Irish people should have more and more effect given to their vote. He had little doubt about the purpose of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Nolan) in moving this Amendment; but he was certain that that hon. and gallant Member would be unwilling to take this course if he believed it would risk the chance of the Bill being passed, and speedily, into law. He therefore thought the Committee were entitled to know what would be the position of the Bill in case the Amendment should be carried against the Government?

MR. THOROLD ROGERS (who, on rising, was greeted with interruptions from Irish Members) said, he did not understand the meaning of that outrage. His hon. and gallant Friend had suggested that Imperial taxation should be applied for the purpose of meeting the obligations of the local rates; and he was bound to say that it was absolutely irregular that the Committee should be called upon suddenly, without any notice of any provision of the kind, to decide whether it would make a fundamental change in the machinery by which local government and local representation were carried on, and have put before it the issue that there should be a charge put upon Imperial taxation for the purpose of meeting this local obligation. He had entered into an arrangement by which he had paired for the night; but though he should be unable to vote, he would move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Thorold Rogers.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sorry to find that a very serious question has been raised of a nature calculated to interfere in the gravest manner with the purposes of the Government. As stated, as the purposes of the Government, they have very little special claim upon the Committee; but they are purposes connected with a great extension of the franchise in Ireland—a great enlargement of the legitimate Constitutional power of the Irish people. To the whole of the arrangements connected with these purposes we attach a very great value and importance; and it would be to us a matter of extreme regret if any vote given by the Committee—

MR. ONSLOW: I rise to Order. The Motion before the Committee is that you, Sir, do report Progress. The right hon. Gentleman is not addressing himself to that Motion, but to the Main Question.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): The right hon. Gentleman, as far as I have heard, is in Order.

MR. GLADSTONE: I would be the last person, Sir, to disobey the ruling of the Chair, and I hope that the moment you perceive that I am travelling beyond the Question you will call me to Order; and I hope, by my obedience to your call, without raising any question upon it as has now become almost a settled rule, that I shall set an example which I think it my duty to set. But I understood that the hon. Member for Southwark moved to report Progress in order to get rid of a discussion which he deemed to be illegitimate. My desire would be to discuss the matter at no great length, but briefly, either upon this question or upon the Motion when it comes on. If there is any doubt as to whether I should be in Order in objecting to the proposal made on the question now raised, in the present circumstances I would far rather postpone any observations which I should otherwise make.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Before you reply, Sir, to the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman, I would ask leave to draw your attention to Rule 10 of the Standing Orders, which requires that when a Motion is moved for the adjournment of the debate or of the House during any debate, or when a Motion is moved that the Chairman of the Committee do report Progress, the debate thereupon shall be confined to the matter of such Motion.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): I was quite aware of the Rule to which the right hon. Baronet has called my attention. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government opened his argument; but I did not see what the scope of that argument would be.

Mr. Gladstone

As far as it was opened, it was strictly relevant to the Question before the Committee. If the right hon. Gentleman has diverged from the Question before the Committee to report Progress to discuss another question, I should have done what I have done already this evening—I should have called him to Order.

Question put, and negatived.

Question again proposed,

“That the words ‘The Boards of Guardians of the several Poor Law Unions are hereby required to pay out of Union funds the amounts so fixed by the Local Government Board:

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I must again apologize to the Committee for intervening in this discussion. I must ask the Committee to pause before they agree to this proposal, coming as it does upon us in an unexpected manner. The right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) stated that the effect of this Motion would be, in his opinion, to charge upon the Consolidated Fund the whole of the registration expenses of England, Scotland, and Ireland. I repeat, that the Committee should pause before it adopts that proposal, which certainly no one expected would be put forward. I want the Committee to consider what would be the effect of agreeing to this Motion. If the Motion were agreed to, the Committee would then have expressed the opinion that at the present time, when the Government found great difficulty in providing for the increased expenditure of the country, it was right, as the right hon. Baronet proposes, to add to that expenditure something like £120,000 or £130,000 a-year. Now, I ask the Committee to pause before it makes that addition to the charge upon the Consolidated Fund. As I have said before, it is a serious matter at the present time to propose to increase the charge of £100,000 by the additional sum of £120,000 or £130,000. I ask whether on such short notice, on the proposal sprung upon us by the right hon. Baronet opposite, the Committee is to determine, in view of the great difficulties I have alluded to, to increase the expenses of the taxpayer by that sum?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he did not intend to deliver on that occasion any fixed opinion on the question as to whether the burden of the registration expenses should be borne by local funds or should be a charge on the Consolidated Fund. He did not intend to give any final opinion on the question. He thought it was open to discussion. He was not much moved by the observation that the charge was an Imperial matter, because there was hardly any charge to which that expression was not applicable; but he said that that was not the proper occasion for the consideration of the question, whether the burden of registration expenses should be borne by local funds or should be a charge upon the Consolidated Fund. As regarded the Amendment, he protested that it was not the function of the House of Commons to be the originator of a public charge. But there was one thing worse than that. If the House was to be the originator of public charge at all, let it be the originator of public charge openly, and let the country know that this or that charge, which was formerly on the ratepayers, had been transferred to the Consolidated Fund, supported as it was in great part by the labour of the country. Let the country know that that had been done by their own Representatives in the House of Commons on their own responsibility. If the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Nolan) was prepared to propose that change in the Constitution, and if the Guardians of that Constitution, who sat opposite, were prepared to support it, it might be that they could overcome any resistance he could offer. They would have a fair discussion; but at present the principle of the Constitution was that the Government were to be the originators of charge, and were to be responsible for placing burdens on the taxpayers of the country. He told the hon. and gallant Gentleman fairly that he did not accept his instruction; he would not work under his instruction, and he reserved to himself and his Colleagues absolute discretion as to what their course with respect to this proposal should be. The Government could not consent to any such proposal on a Registration Bill, because it was not their duty to accept the responsibility, and because it involved a total revolution with respect to the mode of providing for the expenses of registration, which had been established by a long and undisputed series of precedents, and which had never been the subject of complaint until they came to the sacred question of counties as compared with the boroughs of the country, which former, it would appear, were not to be subject to the same taxation as the latter. He answered his hon. and gallant Friend with the fullest acknowledgment of the fairness and excellent temper with which his proposal had been put, that those who chose to introduce a change of this kind, in the opinion of the Government, illegitimate in principle, and not bearing on the present discussion, into the Bill, must be responsible for the progress of the Bill itself, and that the Government must claim for themselves perfect freedom in regard to the course which they might consider it their duty to pursue in respect to the Constitutional principle involved.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 56; Noes 62: Majority 6. — (Div. List, No. 127.)

MR. GLADSTONE: As the division which has just taken place will make it necessary, in conformity with the distinct intimation previously given to the Committee, for the Government to consider at large the course they should pursue in respect of the further prosecution of this Bill, in order to give us an opportunity for that further consideration. I move, Sir, that you do now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. PARNELL said, he thought that before the Motion was agreed to, which, of course, he regarded as a natural one under the circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister might give the Committee some intimation as to what course he proposed to adopt with regard to the English and Scotch Registration Bills. Did the right hon. Gentleman propose to agree to similar Amendments in the case of those Bills?

MR. GLADSTONE: I propose to go forward with the English and Scotch Bills, and to see whether the House of Commons will give similar votes on those Bills.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [23rd April] reported.

First Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. BIGGAR said, that this Resolution related to a Vote to which Irish Members had taken objection, because the people of Ireland had to pay a very substantial proportion of it without getting anything in return. They thought that if those grants were made for the maintenance of roads in England and Scotland, the same contribution ought to be made towards the maintenance of roads in Ireland; and because that principle was not applied, they considered that a great injustice was done to the people of Ireland which ought to be redressed. They had heard over and over again the argument that this charge was only temporary, and that the matter would be considered when the Local Government Bills for England and Ireland were passed; but they thought that in the meantime, seeing that those Bills had been promised so long, and that there was very little prospect of getting them passed into law, the Government should bring in a Supplementary Estimate during the present Session which would afford the redress claimed by Members for Ireland. If the Government would undertake to do that, they would be well satisfied. They did not, of course, want the large amount now being voted for English roads, but an amount proportioned to the taxation as between the three countries. The rates raised in Ireland for the repair of roads were called county cess levied by the Grand Juries. If a grant were given to Ireland and divided amongst the different counties, the counties would be thus indirectly benefited. For those reasons he opposed the present Vote.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 61; Noes 21: Majority 40.—(Div. List, No. 128.)

Subsequent Resolutions agreed to.

INDUSTRIES (IRELAND).

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Select Committee on Industries (Ireland) do consist of Twenty-four Members."—(Sir Eardley Wilmot.)

MR. PARNELL said, he was sorry that the Government had adopted such an extraordinary course in reference to the nomination of this Committee as that which they had adopted. It was towards the end of last Session that the Government agreed to the appointment of such a Committee upon the Motion of the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot), who had now moved its nomination; and upon one pretext or another they had delayed, since the commencement of the Session, the nomination of the Committee, and refused the just claim of the Members with whom he (Mr. Parnell) was associated for representation upon the Committee. He and his hon. Friends considered that a Committee embracing such a very wide field of investigation as that connected with the industrial resources of Ireland should have upon it a sufficiently strong force of Members belonging to the Irish Nationalist Party as to have enabled them to take a leading share in its deliberations. He admitted to the fullest extent that if the Committee were suitably constituted, and if it had time to pursue its investigations thoroughly, they would be of enormous value, and would result in the obtaining of very much valuable information as regarded the industrial resources of Ireland. But he should look upon an incomplete investigation as a great disaster. In the first place, if the Committee reported that Session, and he had no doubt it would report, if nominated, because if it had not completed its investigation by the close of the Session, it could not claim, from an expiring Parliament, its reappointment the following Session—if the Committee were to make a Report by the close of the Session, it could not be anything but a very incomplete and imperfect Report.

MR. MONK rose to Order. The House had already decided, on the Motion of the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot), that this Committee should be appointed. The Question now put to the House was that the Select Committee do consist of 21 Members. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) seemed to be going a little beyond the Question.

MR. SPEAKER: I have not put the first name of the hon. Members who it is proposed should form the Select Committee; and therefore the wider question is still before the House on the Question that the Select Committee do consist of such and such Members.

MR. PARNELL said, he should endeavour to confine his remarks as much as he possibly could to the immediate Question before the House. Of course, he did not desire to detain the House unnecessarily at that time of the night (12.45). Apart from the question of the probable incomplete nature of the Committee's Report, owing to the fact that so little time of the Session still remained to investigate such a wide subject, he wished to say that he certainly should not like to undertake the responsibility of being a Member of the Committee with only four Colleagues to assist him in overcoming the opposition of 19 English Members, which would almost certainly be exhibited against any proposal of theirs tending to make the operation of the Committee an effective one. If the Irish Party had such a number of Members on the Committee as would be likely to give them their suitable share in directing the issues to which the Committee might come the case would be different. But it was only proposed that the Committee should consist of 21 Members. Of that number the Irish Party were only to be given five. The Committee was, he understood, to consist of 10 Liberal Members, nine Conservative Members, and five Members belonging to the Irish Party. That would leave only five Members of the Irish Party against 19 other Members of the House; and his experience of the working of other Select Committees was that it would be exceedingly difficult for the five, under the circumstances, hampered as the Committee would be by the short period of the Session still remaining, to obtain from the majority of the Committee such a full discussion of the subject, and such a full examination of the subject, as would be satisfactory, or as would render the proceedings of the Committee of any importance or value whatever towards the promotion of the industrial resources of Ireland. He said that, having some knowledge himself of the difficulties which Irish Members had to contend against in Committees of this kind. The difficulties were very much enhanced when there were only a few Irish Members endeavouring to press their views and ideas upon a large number of Members belonging to the two English Parties. The work then became insuperable, and he doubted very much whether, at that period of the Session, the trouble which would be entailed upon the Committee would be justified at all by the results which would attend its labours. He, for his own part, should feel obliged to decline the honour of nomination to the Committee, because he felt he could not be of any real use with regard to the very important object with which the Committee would meet. He therefore asked the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) to consider whether he was really likely to advance the cause of the industrial resources of Ireland by persevering with a Committee from which no good could come? He had always recognized the desire of the hon. Baronet to promote the industries of Ireland. The hon. Baronet's name was distinguished in connection with that matter, and he (Mr. Parnell) was quite ready to acknowledge that the hon. Gentleman was anxious that some of the misery which prevailed in Ireland should cease. Undoubtedly, if the hon. Gentleman could obtain the appointment of the Committee at an earlier period of the Session, and if it were suitably composed, the Committee might do a very considerable amount of good towards disseminating information with regard to important branches of Irish industries. Under the circumstances, he (Mr. Parnell) thought it would hardly be possible for the hon. Baronet, by this Committee, to do much good that Session. They had been treated very unfairly by the Government in this matter. Originally the Government offered them four Members, and, after considerable hesitation, they offered them five. The original claim of the Irish Representatives was that they should have six Members upon the Committee—a very fair claim indeed, and one which he should have thought the Government would have had no difficulty in agreeing to, if they really desired to promote the success of the Committee. Even if they could now obtain six Representatives on the Committee, he doubted whether the appointment of the Committee would be of much value, seeing that such a very short period must elapse before the Session would come to an end. It was obvious that once the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill and the Registration Bills had passed, the Session would come to a speedy conclusion. He thought that, as business men, they were entitled to consider whether they ought to proceed with a hasty and limited inquiry from which no good result could come. He therefore begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. MOLLOY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Parnell.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought it was necessary he should say a word or two with respect to the position of the Government in this matter. He was surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) say that it was proposed to appoint upon this Committee 19 English Members.

MR. PARNELL: Nineteen Members of the two English Parties.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: English Parties! There were 12 Irish Members out of the 24, besides the Chairman of the Committee. Now, what was this Committee? It was a Committee to inquire into the industrial resources of Ireland; and would the hon. Member for the City of Cork exclude from the Committee every Irish Member returned by an Irish constituency who did not belong to his Party? Did the hon. Member mean to say that upon a Committee of Inquiry into the Industrial Resources of Ireland the hon. Members for Belfast, for instance, were not to be nominated, but were to be treated as English Members? Really, the whole argument of the hon. Gentleman was to deny the right of any Member elected by an Irish constituency to be regarded as an Irish Member unless he belonged to his (Mr. Parnell's) Party. ["Oh, oh!"] What else, then, was the hon. Member's argument? Why, then, did he complain if there were 12 Members, who belonged to different Parties, and who sat in different parts of the House, but all of whom were elected by Irish constituencies, to sit upon a Committee of this description? It seemed to him (Sir William Harcourt) that the argument of the hon. Member was one which could not be sustained. If what he had stated was not the hon. Gentleman's argument, what was it? The hon. Member had said that the 19 Members belonged to the two English Parties, and he said that there were only five Members of the Committee who could be recognized as Irish Members. Did he repudiate the Members for Belfast and the Members for Dublin—Members who certainly had something to say on such a subject? That was all it seemed to him (Sir William Harcourt) necessary to say in vindication of the fairness with which this Committee had been constituted. The Irish Members of the Committee and the Chairman of the Committee constituted together the majority, and therefore the assertion that the Committee had been unfairly constituted could not be sustained. The hon. Member had stated that the Session was so far advanced that it was not likely that the Committee would answer any useful purpose. That, of course, was an argument which stood on a very different footing. It was an argument which the hon. Gentleman must settle with the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) who moved the Committee. He (Sir William Harcourt) only rose to repudiate, on the part of the Government, the assertion that the Committee had been unfairly selected. He thought that anybody who looked at the names of the Committee would see at once that the various sections of the Irish Members were very fairly represented.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he begged to thank the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) for the kind manner in which he had alluded to himself. He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) could only say that he had only one object in endeavouring to get this Committee before the House—the same object which had induced him, at a late period of his life, to undergo the toil and labour of Parliamentary work. He had found for a long period that Ireland was part of the United Kingdom to which adequate justice had not been done; and, therefore, with that feeling he had sought a seat in that House, and as the hon. Member had said, he had on many occasions shown his anxiety to serve the interests of that country. Entertaining those feelings, in the month of August last he had put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, asking him whether he would consent to the appointment of a Royal Commission for the purpose of inquiring into the industrial resources of Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman, in his reply, had stated that he had conferred on this matter with the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and that they were both of opinion that the object he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) wished to attain would be better arrived at through the medium of a Select Committee than that of a Royal Commission. Upon that he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had immediately given Notice of his intention to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the industrial resources of Ireland. That, as he had said, was in August last. He had brought the matter forward at such a period that no opportunity presented itself for bringing the question to a conclusion. In the Autumn Session, having given Notice on the 21st of November last, he brought the question before the House, and asked for a Select Committee. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government was present and had listened to his speech, and at his side was the then Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan). After they had heard what he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had to say, and had heard the arguments put to the House by the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Moore) and many Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House below the Gangway—indeed, from hon. Members on both sides of the House—the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster rose to inform him (Sir Eardley Wilmot) that at that period of the Session it was useless to suppose the matter could be thoroughly gone into; but that if at the beginning of the present Session he would renew his question the matter would be favourably considered. Accordingly, on the 10th of March, having given due Notice through the hon. Member for Dublin (Dr. Lyons), he himself having been out of England, the matter came on. On that evening he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had an interview with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, who had not only always treated him, but the subject that he had in hand, with the greatest courtesy and consideration, and the right hon. Gentleman had told him that the Government had consented to the appointment of a Committee. The Committee was assented to on that evening, and he had set about preparing a list of names for the consideration of the Government. He did not hesitate to say that he had included in that list a greater number of Members of the National Party than were now to be found upon it. He had thought that, upon the whole, that Party represented, as he considered it did, the great majority of the people of Ireland, and the feeling and sentiments and wishes of the people of Ireland ought to be considered, and that the number of seven—the Committee at that time consisting of 21 Members—would not be too large for the representation of that Party. He wished to return, on this the first opportunity, his best thanks to the noble Lord the Member for Flintshire (Lord Richard Grosvenor) for the uniform kindness and courtesy with which he had on every occasion assisted him and conferred with him with regard to the appointment of the Committee, the names of the proposed Members of which were now before the House. There had been great difficulties for the noble Lord to overcome no doubt—difficulties which hon. Gentlemen sitting on both sides of the House could well understand; but ultimately, only a short time ago, the noble Lord had told him that the names had been agreed upon. They were those now on the Paper, with the exception of three, who had only been added to the list within the last few days. Two of those names were such as would do honour to any Committee, he did not care how important it might be. He referred to the names of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith)—a Cabinet Minister and an ex-Cabinet Minister headed the list of this important Committee. In addition to those, the name of the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor) was added to the list. He must say he quite dissented from what had been said by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), that this was a Committee that would not do justice to Ireland. As the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt) had said, the number of Irishmen—

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Baronet that the Question before the House is the adjournment of the debate.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he found it rather difficult to confine himself to the Question of adjournment when the whole matter had been so thoroughly dealt with by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, who had gone into the whole history of the question, and thus he had found it difficult to abstain from general remarks. But he respectfully bowed to the decision of Mr. Speaker, and he would confine himself entirely to the reasons why the debate should not be adjourned. They had before them now three good hard-working months, up to the end of July; and he must say that he had received from every part of Ireland a universal expression of a desire that they should commence the inquiry. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for the City of Cork that they could not exhaust such a vast question as this that Session; but, at any rate, let them commence the inquiry. There were Gentlemen in the House who were ready to devote all their time and labour to the prosecution of an inquiry for the purpose of benefiting the Sister Kingdom; and he really was surprised at the observations which had fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork, that owing to want of time and to the near approach of the end of the Parliament that the inquiry would be altogether useless. He could tell the hon. Member that if the House granted the inquiry, Ireland would never allow so distinguished a Member of the House and so distinguished an Irishman to stay away from it. Looking at the magnitude and importance of the inquiry, Irishmen would not consent to the hon. Member holding aloof from it, so well knowing, as they did, that his opinions, his feelings, and his influence with his fellow-countrymen would be of so vast an amount of assistance to the Committee, and would do so much good. Therefore, if the Committee were granted, he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) did not feel any apprehension in his own mind that either the hon. Member for the City of Cork, or those hon. Gentlemen of the Nationalist Party whom he proposed to nominate with him, would abstain from taking any part in the inquiry. He respectfully asked the House not to agree to this adjournment, after all the labour and anxiety he and his Friends had had in endeavouring to put the Committee on foot; he asked the House to give him an opportunity of going to work at once. He saw the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) in his place, and knew how glad he always was to embark in any Parliamentary work when his opinion and service might be beneficial to his country. He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) might disagree with the right hon. Gentleman as to the fundamental principles on which his (Sir Charles W. Dilke's) labours were founded; but he cordially paid a tribute of admiration and respect to the energy, and zeal, and great talent which the right hon. Gentleman had displayed in piloting the Bill for the redistribution of seats through the House. As a private Member, he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) was in a similar, though lesser degree, anxious to devote what strength and power he had to a work which he firmly believed would benefit the country of hon. Gentlemen who sat on his right. Let him have the opportunity he sought, and he thought he would be able to prosecute the undertaking in such a manner that neither the House nor the country would have reason to regret it.

MR. ONSLOW wished to say a word on this subject, for the reason that on Wednesday last he had prevented the nomination of the Committee. Everything, he thought, which had fallen from the hon. Baronet the Member for South Warwickshire (Sir Eardley Wilmot) that night only confirmed him in the action he had taken on Wednesday. The hon. Member (Mr. Parnell), in suggesting the adjournment of the debate, said he did not think a Committee would be of any use, or that its labours could be brought to a termination that Session. He (Mr. Onslow) knew very well the great importance of the Committee, and it was for that reason that he should support the hon. Member for the City of Cork if he went to a division. He (Mr. Onslow) had had great experience in connection with those large Committees, and he knew the larger the

Sir Eardley Wilmot

Committee was the more time would it require to go into all the matters brought before it. It appeared to him to be an absolute farce on the part of the House to appoint a Committee of that kind at that period of the Session, when the interest of every Member was concentrated upon the next Election. There was another objection he had to raise against the appointment of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt) was rather in favour of the appointment of the Committee; but he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, during his whole experience, he had ever known a Committee appointed with only nine of one Party upon it and 15 of another. That was a mode of procedure which, at any rate so far as he was concerned, he had never known before. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to it, and though he did not wish to be out of Order—

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that he is not speaking to the Question of the adjournment of the debate.

MR. ONSLOW said, he was merely replying to the observation of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman said he did not see why the Committee should not be appointed, because everyone knew who the Chairman was to be. Well, it was the first time he (Mr. Onslow) had ever known the Chairman mentioned before the Committee met. If anyone was to be appointed by the Government, or by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, before the Committee met, he was afraid they would be forming a very bad precedent. He thought this would be a wholly useless Committee, so far as the present Session was concerned. The subject was a vast one, and a Committee to properly consider it would have to sit at least two years. It was, therefore, an idle thing to agree to its appointment at that period. The hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had said there were two Members on the Committee he was proud of. Undoubtedly. The names were "Mr. Trevelyan" and "Mr. W. H. Smith." It was only within the last few days that those Gentlemen had consented to serve on the Committee; and it seemed to him (Mr. Onslow) that they had only consented to serve in order to give a colour to this matter. Pressure had been brought to bear upon them to grant the use of their names, and he did not think that was the sort of thing that ought to take place in that House. He deprecated the nomination of the Committee at the present time, and should accordingly support the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell).

DR. LYONS said, the House, he hoped, would support the action of the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) in nominating this Committee without delay. He (Dr. Lyons) could testify there was great anxiety throughout the length and breadth of Ireland for the appointment of the Committee, and that there would be great disappointment if it were postponed any longer. He might be allowed to mention, as a reason for not postponing it, that a very considerable number of persons had been communicated with with a view of receiving their evidence—gentlemen eminent in science and practical arts in Ireland. Although the Committee had not yet been appointed, an expectation had existed which had been operating in Ireland for the last six or eight months; and gentlemen of the greatest experience had been preparing evidence, and making inquiries, and taking notes, with a view of giving the Committee the benefit of their knowledge on the subject. Special inquiries had been prosecuted during the whole of the winter; and not only had the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) been in active correspondence with gentlemen connected with manufactures, with science, and with art in Ireland, but he (Dr. Lyons) himself had been in constant communication with all those gentlemen in Ireland. Therefore, the work of the Committee was prepared, and if it were now appointed it would be able at once, without further delay, to take valuable evidence. As he had already said, immense disappointment would undoubtedly result from further delay. He regretted that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had chosen to take his present action, because he believed that the hon. Member and his Friends could, if they liked, lend very important assistance to the Committee. The House would be able to judge from the number and character of those who were prepared to give evidence rather than from the constitution of the Committee, that he did not underrate the importance of the inquiry, and the necessity of its being a representative Committee. An endeavour had been made to make it as widely representative as possible, and he thought the nomination in the proposal before the House was a fair one. He believed for all those reasons the House would support the Motion of the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot).

Mr. R. POWER said, he agreed with the hon. Member who had just sat down (Dr. Lyons) that the Irish Members and the Irish people ought to be indebted to the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) for the interest he had taken in this subject. Not only ought they to feel indebted to him, but they did feel indebted to him; but, at the same time, he believed at that period of the Session it was too late to commence the inquiry, particularly in view of the statement of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, that so many important witnesses would have to be examined. It had been said, and no doubt with truth, that the inquiry would be of such an important and exhaustive nature that it would occupy fully two years, possibly three. Then, when they looked at the list of Members to be nominated on the Committee, they could not but remember that a General Election was very likely to take place before the end of next Session, and that some of those hon. Members, whose names were down, were not likely to be again returned to the House of Commons. Of course, he did not refer to the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken (Dr. Lyons); but still it would be very inconvenient if Members who had sat upon the Committee and had listened to the evidence, and were familiar with the inquiry from the commencement, were to be replaced by others who would come upon the inquiry in the middle of the evidence. In that way it might be necessary to go over the whole ground again. He really thought that taking into consideration the late period of the Session, and the importance of the subject, and the number of witnesses that would have to be examined, that it would be better to wait until next Session and the new Parliament was elected, and they knew what Members were likely to serve upon the Committee from beginning to end before they made the appointment. Under all those circumstances, he felt bound to support the Motion of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell).

Mr. SEXTON said, there could be but one opinion as to the public spirit and energy displayed in this matter by the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot); but if anything was required to complete the argument of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), it was supplied by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Dr. Lyons). That hon. Member, it appeared, had taken time by the forelock, and before the Committee was appointed had written to important personages in Ireland with a view of securing them as witnesses. The hon. Member had secured them for the inquiry, although he himself was not yet connected with it, and, as a matter of fact, was never likely to be connected with it. Even if the Committee were appointed, and the hon. Member were to bring over those witnesses, a considerable number of them would have to remain unexamined until next Session. It must be remembered that they had now reached the month of April, and that the Session was not likely to last as long as ordinary Sessions. The appointment of the Committee should be put off until next Session, as it was necessary that there should be continuity of action with regard to it. If it were not put off the inquiry would be finished by a personnel different to that which commenced it; and, to his mind, it seemed desirable that they should have the same Members upon it throughout. By next Session the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt) would have received ample response. The right hon. Gentleman did not know who was "the Party representing Ireland" in the House; next Session he was likely to have as much proof as he could desire on that point. He was in favour of the postponement proposed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), because he believed that if the Committee were appointed now it would go into action doomed to failure. At any rate, if it were proceeded with he should respectfully desire to withdraw his name from it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

WATER PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HOLMS, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade, under "The Gas and Water Works Facilities Act, 1870," relating to Barton-upon-Humber and District Water, Chiltern Hills Spring Water, Great Berkhamstead Water, Herts and Essex Water, and Holyhead Water, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HOLMS and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN.

SUNDAY CLOSING (WALES) ACT (1881)
AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. MORGAN LLOYD, Bill to amend the Sunday Closing (Wales) Act, 1881, and the Licensings Acts 1872-1874, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MORGAN LLOYD, Mr. ROBERTS, and Mr. RICHARD.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 141.]

ADJOURNMENT.

EGYPTIEN"—RECALL OF THE FRENCH CONSUL.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House do now adjourn."

MR. MONTAGU SCOTT: Before the House adjourns I wish to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. There is a very general impression throughout the House and the country that there might be an addition made to the information conveyed to the House by the Prime Minister this evening. I wish to ask whether any further information has been received beyond that which the Prime Minister laid before the House, that the Chargé d'Affaires of France at Cairo had left?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have nothing further to add.

MR. MONTAGU SCOTT: May I take it that the information was correct, and that the whole telegram was conveyed to the House from the Foreign Office this afternoon?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I do not quite catch the hon. Member's observation. We have no knowledge—at least I have none—which would induce us to modify in any respect the statement made by the Prime Minister.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY: Has the French Chargé d'Affaires left Cairo?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: My reply must be that I have nothing to say to modify what the Prime Minister said earlier in the evening.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY: Has no other Member of the Government any information to give to the House? The statement was that the French Chargé d'Affaires had left Cairo; is that correct?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have no further answer to give.

MR. MONTAGU SCOTT: May I ask whether the telegram received by the Foreign Office this afternoon was not to the effect that the Chargé d'Affaires had left a note with the Khedive or Nubar Pasha stating that France retired from the Convention?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I must entirely decline to state the contents of a telegram which I have not in my hands. In matters of this importance it is the duty of everybody to be extremely careful in stating facts, and I must decline to make any further answer.

MR. ONSLOW: Can the right hon. Gentleman state whether there was not a mistake made when the Prime Minister read the telegram about half-past 5 o'clock to-day?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I think not.

MR. ONSLOW: The Prime Minister distinctly stated then that Sir Evelyn Baring had sent a telegram stating that the Chargé d'Affaires had left Cairo. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman has not the telegram in his pocket; but can he say whether there was any mistake?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I believe there was no mistake at all in what the Prime Minister said. At all events, I have nothing to add or to modify.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at half after One o'clock till Monday next.

DOMINION OF CANADA—INSURRECTION IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORY.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I should like to ask the noble Earl opposite whether he is in a position to give the House any reliable information with regard to the insurrection in Canada? Various accounts have been published, some better, some worse; but, for my own part, I hope matters are not so bad as described, but we shall be glad to hear the real state of things.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I am glad that the noble Earl has put this Question, and I need hardly say that I shall be quite ready to give him all such information on the subject as I possess. I have none very recent. The latest information from official sources is contained in a telegram received yesterday to the following effect:—

“Part of Middleton’s force attacked yesterday, the 24th instant, on East Bank, South Saskatchewan. Attack repulsed. Our loss three killed, 34 wounded. General Middleton’s force is to continue advance on the 25th. Battleford relieved by Colonel Otter’s force. A third force, under Strange, advancing to Edmonton. No opposition expected in that quarter. These forces are considered sufficient to restore order. Police who left Fort Pitt reached Battleford safely.”

That is the statement which I have received from Lord Lansdowne. I have seen a statement in the newspapers of a second battle having been fought, and of the defeat of the insurgents. I have endeavoured to ascertain what truth there is in it; but I am not able either to confirm or to deny the report. Nothing is known of it at the Colonial Office. I have telegraphed to Lord Lansdowne for information, but have not yet had time to receive a reply. I dare say I shall receive one by to-morrow.

LUNACY ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(No. 60.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^d.”
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN, in supporting the Bill, expressed his great regret at the absence of the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), who had devoted so much of a long and honoured life to the consideration of this question, and to the alleviation of the hard lot of those unhappy beings who were, beyond all controversy, the most afflicted of God’s creatures; and he hoped that at a later stage of the Bill the noble Earl would be able to give the House the benefit of his presence and advice. He also wished, at the outset, to return his thanks to the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack for the very ample manner in which he had fulfilled the promise he made last Session, on the strength of which he (the Earl of Milltown) had withdrawn his Motion of Censure on the existing state of the Lunacy Laws. The Bill before the House was a most able and important one, though it was perhaps capable of some amendment, and he trusted it would effect a lasting settlement of the question. He thought it was to be regretted that the Government had not seen their way to vesting compulsorily private-licensed houses in some public body, and so to get rid of that most objectionable element—profit. As long as the profitable system was allowed to continue he feared the public would never be altogether satisfied. At any rate, he hoped this Bill would eventually and speedily lead to the total suppression of the system. Again, there was an absence of any provision that the proprietors of these houses should be properly-qualified and fit persons. That was a point which was well looked after in other countries, and he thought it ought to be provided for in the Bill. Then, again, the Bill contained no provision that the medical officers should be independent persons; and that was a deficiency which, he thought, ought to be supplied. Great complaints were made that neither the friends nor the solicitor of a patient were allowed to see him during his confinement, and he could not see why that should not be allowed under proper restriction. He thought that some provision should be inserted to meet the case. Against the law now stood, neither a patient nor his friends were allowed to see him of incarceration, nor even to know the grounds upon which it was made. He thought that was a point which ought to be dealt with in the Bill. At present, too, the mode of capture was unfettered by any restrictions whatever. The mode of incarceration was a sufficient to anything; any kind of brutality might take place and the police could not interfere. Such a state of affairs should not be allowed to continue. He could not find any proposal in the Bill to increase the number of the Commissioners, who certainly had too much work on their hands. At present all houses in the Metropolitan district were directly under the Commissioners, and they had to visit each house four times in the year together, and twice singly. In the Metropolitan district there were about 8,000 patients; but the Commissioners had also to visit twice a-year all borough and county asylums containing some 70,000 patients, which would show that the work supposed to be done by the Commissioners was absolutely overwhelming. He could not understand why the Bill did not extend to Ireland. The Lunacy Laws of Scotland differed materially from those of England, and therefore he could understand why the Bill should not extend to Scotland; but there was very little difference between the law in England and Ireland, and therefore he thought it would be very desirable to extend the Bill to Ireland. As to the clauses of the Bill, Clause 2 provided that the order for admission, which at the present time could be signed by anyone, must be signed either by a County Court Judge, a stipendiary magistrate, or a justice of the peace. He thought that was a most admirable provision, and he doubted whether anything short of it would have satisfied the public. At the same time he thought it would have been safer to require the signature of two justices. The provisions of the Bill with regard to urgency orders were such that it would be quite possible for a sane person to be incarcerated as insane for seven days. The certificate in these cases was extremely vague, and need only be signed by one medical practitioner, and the order might be given by anyone. Dip-somaniacs were often treated as if they were insane, and yet nothing could be worse for them. If an inebriate were incarcerated as insane for seven days, as he might be under this Bill, the chances were a thousand to one that he would not emerge from his confinement a sane man. Jealous husbands and wives had been known to abuse the powers conferred by the present law in order to obtain the incarceration of the object of their jealousy, and the law as altered by the present Bill would be also liable to great abuse in the same direction. The measure would confer by another clause an extraordinary power on magistrates, who would be able to lock a man up as a lunatic for seven days, and upon a rumour reaching their ears to the effect that he was insane. There was no proper provision in the Bill for the recovery of penalties. He held that a patient on his discharge ought to be able to sue for penalties himself. Another point requiring attention was as to the examination of patients. Where a person should satisfy two justices that a case was a proper one for examination the patient ought forthwith to be examined. The right which in certain circumstances the Bill would give to relatives to take lunatics out of public asylums and to burden the public rates with the cost of their maintenance at home would be liable to great abuse. He objected also to the proposal to give the Secretary of State power to override, in certain cases, the decisions of county or borough justices. In conclusion he begged to thank the House for the kindness with which they had heard him, and to express a hope that the Bill would tend to the improvement of the law, and would add to the already great reputation of the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, in the first place, he had to acknowledge the courteous manner in which the noble Earl (the Earl of Milltown) had spoken of him. He heartily sympathized with the noble Earl's expression of regret that his noble Friend (the Earl of Shaftesbury) should not be present at that time. There was one circumstance connected with the Bill which would prevent him from feeling that satisfaction he would otherwise experience, however successful the Bill might be. A difference of opinion on a very important part of the Bill had made his noble Friend think that after 50 years of invaluable service rendered to the country as Chairman of the Lunacy Commissioners he had better relinquish that office. If it had not been thought necessary to introduce the authority of a magistrate his Lordship might have been still willing, notwithstanding other reasons which might well justify him in declining the labour, to render the same invaluable services he had hitherto done. He had such admiration for the noble Earl that he could not but regard his resignation of his office as a very serious public loss. During the noble Earl's administration the Law of Lunacy had been completely transformed. The shocking abuses of former times had disappeared, and a system had been substituted which, if not perfect, and if requiring, as he thought undoubtedly it did, amendment in various points, would bear favourable comparison with the Lunacy Law and administration of any other country in the world. At the same time, he and those whom he had consulted thought it was not possible to resist the general opinion of the public, supported by high judicial authority, that the time had come when some intervention of a magistrate was necessary for the satisfactory working of the Law of Lunacy, so as to prevent, as far as practicable, the risk of abuse in treating persons as proper subjects for confinement who might not be so. He did not believe—he had stated it before, and he repeated it now—that such abuses were common; but he did believe that no satisfactory answer had been given to the public sentiment, which required that Parliament should make them as impossible as human regulation could without sacrificing the proper and effective treatment of those who were insane, and especially of those who by early treatment could be cured of their disease. He would now advert to some of the points which the noble Earl had mentioned. With regard to licensed houses, his noble Friend had referred to the opinion which Lord Shaftesbury had frequently expressed as to the vice of the principle on which houses of that kind were conducted for private profit. But he thought he could quote Lord Shaftesbury in favour of the mode proposed in the Bill for dealing with this subject. In 1860 Lord Shaftesbury spoke very strongly against that class of houses. But 17 years later, in 1877, he qualified that opinion to a great extent—he said he adhered to the general opinion which he had formerly expressed; but he was far from thinking that any sudden or violent attempt to suppress those houses would be proper or expedient or for the advantage of the unfortunate class of persons who were to be considered in the matter. Lord Shaftesbury spoke very highly of the best licensed houses, and thought it desirable that they should remain. He thought that measures should be adopted, the tendency of which should be by degrees to get rid of the necessity for that class of houses, and of which the effect would, at all events, be to eliminate the inferior and worse-conducted houses. The Bill before the House had been framed upon that principle; and when the provisions under that head came to be considered he thought they would recommend themselves generally to their Lordships. The reasons for not including Ireland were tolerably obvious. The whole lunacy administration of that country was separate from the lunacy administration of England, and was conducted under its own Acts of Parliament. But when Parliament had approved of amendments in the law of England it would be easy to amend the law for Ireland. At present it would not be convenient to include Ireland in the Bill. With regard to making an order as to the security of the person of a lunatic, the noble Earl had suggested that, as in other cases where authority was given to a stipendiary magistrate, the alternative should be two justices. There seemed to be serious objections to that proposal, one of which was that it might prolong the proceedings in a manner exceedingly undesirable; and another, that if the two justices differed, the whole matter would have to be begun, before other justices, over again. He thought, however, that the Bill might perhaps be improved, by providing that at Quarter Sessions and borough sessions special justices should be appointed to exercise jurisdiction in these matters. He proposed to put an Amendment upon the Paper to that effect unless those of their Lordships who had considered the subject were prepared to point out objections to it which did not at present occur to his mind. He would, when the Bill reached Committee, deal with the other points raised by the noble Earl. Their Lordships would see by the preliminary statement affixed to the Bill that it was proposed to introduce for purposes of reference a Bill consolidating the existing enactments dealing with this matter. That Bill would save their Lordships the trouble of constant reference backwards and forwards to all the Acts of Parliament.

The next stage of the measure now under consideration would be fixed for this day fortnight, and in the meantime he would have the Consolidation Bill printed, so that their Lordships could see exactly what the present law was.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY wished to support the recommendations of the noble Earl who spoke first (the Earl of Milltown) as to the probationary detention of supposed lunatics in hospitals before sending them to asylums. If that were done, friends would have less hesitation in sending cases in time; and much stress had been laid on the necessity of early medical attention in such cases, and the patients themselves would not feel the same reluctance when going to a hospital as when going to an asylum. Moreover, the bias and tendency of the medical men in hospitals was to effect a cure and discharge the patients, whilst the bias of the medical men of an asylum was to retain the patient.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, that while he was entirely in accord with the principle of the Bill, he hoped that it would be placed on the Statute Book in such a form as to remedy, so far as possible, what he believed to be the great defect of the present system—namely, the perfunctory manner in which those who were primarily responsible in cases of lunacy performed their duties.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 11th of May next.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)— AGENTS IN PETTY SESSIONS COURTS. QUESTION.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, or any other authority, save the magistrates of the district, have power to make regulations for procedure in petty sessions courts in Ireland; and, if so, under what Acts; if so, have any Rules of Procedure been issued and circulated; whether any of those rules prevented any one, save complainant or defendant or a solicitor, from appearing for complainant or defendant; if so, considering that frequently no solicitors live within a long distance of petty sessions courts, and consequently their fees are large, whether Her Majesty's Government do not consider that this is in many cases a harsh and injurious rule that should not be enforced?

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, that under one of the Acts dealing with summary jurisdiction the Lord Lieutenant had the power to make general rules to carry into effect the provisions of the Act. He could not find that any rules had been made on this subject. The fact appeared to be that the matter did not depend upon rules, but upon Statute Law. The restriction of the right of any absent party to appear by others seemed to depend upon Statute Law. The Petty Sessions Act of 1851 provided that parties might have witnesses examined and cross-examined by counsel, or by attorney on their behalf. The Act also provided that a party might appear in person or by agent. An Act of 1882 provided that "agent" should include father, son, husband, wife, or brother, if the permission of the Court had been obtained. Beyond this he did not find that it was open to other than professional advocates to appear; and if the doors were opened wider there would be a danger of a class of persons springing up who might abuse the privilege, and whose conduct in the end might be injurious to the poor clients by whom they were employed.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE was understood to say that formerly it had been within the discretion of the magistrate to hear anyone appearing for a complainant or defendant; and without this privilege of being represented by a friend the poor people might as well be deprived of petty sessions for the hearing of petty cases.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, the magistrates were always ready to adjourn cases to allow further evidence to be given rather than do injustice to anyone; but as to the meaning of the word "agent," he could not add anything to the definition of the Statute Law.

ARMY (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)— FORTY-POUNDER GUNS.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS asked the Under Secretary of State for War, (1.) The number of forty-pounder guns, distinguishing between breech and muzzle loading, now in use or store; (2.) the number of carriages in store suited to these guns; (3.) the number of carriages capable of conversion for the use of these guns; within what time such conversion could be effected, and its cost; (4.) the charge of powder, initial velocity, and the range of the 40-pounder guns; the present position of the armament of the Volunteer Force; and what was the charge and initial velocity of the latest pattern of field gun? The noble Lord said that the Questions arose out of a discussion which was going on at the United Service Institution with regard to the arming of the Volunteer Corps; and he asked for the information for the guidance of those taking part in that discussion.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he should be exceedingly glad to furnish any information he could that might be useful to the gentlemen taking part in the discussion at the United Service Institution; but he thought his noble Friend would admit that it was not expedient to give details of special ordnance stores in possession of the Government. That was a precaution always to be borne in mind; and certainly at the present time, and under existing circumstances, he must decline to give an answer as to the number of carriages and guns of a certain character now in store at the Arsenal. But with regard to the guns in the hands of the Volunteers, he should be happy to give all the information in his power. He believed there were at present 106 40-pounder breech-loading guns with their travelling carriages complete in the hands of Volunteers, distributed over the whole country among between 40 and 50 different Volunteer Corps. This was all the information he should be justified in giving, and in the circumstances it was quite as much as he could be expected to give. With regard to muzzle velocity, the 40-pounder was not a new gun; the charge was 5 lbs. of powder, and the muzzle velocity 1,180 feet. The newest of all the field guns was the 12-pounder breech-loading gun. This gun had not yet been issued to the batteries. The charge was 4 lbs. of powder, and the muzzle velocity was 1,715 feet. In the case of the 13-pounder, the muzzle velocity was 1,560 feet.

The Earl of Wemyss

CENTRAL ASIA — RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—DIPLOMATIC NEGOTIATIONS.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am sorry that the noble Earl the Leader of the House has not waited till now. I wish to ask whether it is true, as reported to us, that all decision upon the question at issue between us and the Government of Russia is to be hung up until a gentleman who has got a map and who has left Sir Peter Lumden arrives in England? That is the rumour which comes to us. Of course, rumours are sometimes strangely altered in coming to us through the Central Chamber. But that is what comes to us from the House of Commons. It is stated that this is what Mr. Gladstone has just announced. Is there anything within the knowledge of the noble Earl to justify that statement?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I really cannot answer the Question without Notice. With regard to the question being hung up, I am not aware that there is anything hung up any more than before. It is in precisely the same position as it was yesterday. I think there must be some misunderstanding. I do not wish to be thought mysterious; but the inquiry refers to a statement made in the other House, and I cannot answer it without Notice.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It would have been very improper if I had asked this Question of the noble Earl. But I thought that if such large issues were depending upon a map coming from the Frontier of Afghanistan, the noble Earl might perhaps have heard something about it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The noble Marquess refers to some statement that has been made in the other House. I do not know what that statement is. That is my reason for not giving an answer to the noble Marquess.

QUESTIONS.

PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS—THE PAY- MASTER GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

MR. JOHN REDMOND asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Government have come to any decision as to the abolition of the Paymaster General's office; and, whether he has considered the necessity of having four chiefs of Departments, involving an expenditure of about £3,500 per annum, in so small an office?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-QUER (MR. CHILDERS): A Committee is inquiring into the business of the Paymaster General's Department, but has not yet made its Report. I hope soon to receive it, and in due course the subject must come before Parliament.

ARMY (COMMISSARIAT)—TINNED MEAT.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, In what respect the tins in which "the bulk of the Australian tinned meat comes to this Country" is unsuited for field service; whether, in the event of the Colonial tins being as suitable as the American, the price not greater and the quality equal, preference is given to supplies raised on British territory;

what was the relative amount of American and Colonial tinned meat used in the Army during 1882, 1883, and 1884; and, whether tenders have been invited from Australasian and other British Colonies?

MR. BRAND: Australian meat usually comes in large tins of cylindrical form, whereas for close packing the tins should be four-sided and tapering. Preference would be given, under the conditions the hon. Member names, to supplies raised on British territory, provided the Colonial meat is at the time in England. The relative amount of American and Colonial tinned meat used in the Army was, in round numbers, in 1882, 475,000 lbs.
American, and no Colonial; in 1883,
150,000 lbs. American, and 120,000 lbs.
Colonial; in 1884, 3,465,000 lbs. American, and 648,000 lbs. Colonial. Tenders have been called for from the agents in this country of producers in the Colonies.

SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND BILL.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Secretary for Scotland
Bill is to be introduced in one or other House of Parliament; and, if he will try so to arrange that the administrative part of the Bill (regarding which there is a pretty general agreement) shall not be endangered by the difference of opinion on the education question, but that the latter shall be decided on its merits one way or other, and the Bill proceeded with?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I hope in a few days to introduce the Bill.

TRAMWAYS AND PUBLIC COMPANIES (IRELAND) ACT, 1883—THE MIGRA- TION CLAUSES.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, To what extent the provisions of the Migration Clause of the Tramways (Ireland) Act have been carried into operation; what Companies have obtained money from the Treasury for the purposes of migration; and how many tenants and cultivators of the soil have benefited by migration and by extension of their holdings; whether it is proposed to introduce legislation to enable migration to be carried on to a larger extent, especially from the congested districts of the south-west, west, and north-west; whether he has seen that Professor Baldwin considers that migration operations could be conducted successfully without the intervention of Companies of directors and shareholders; and, whether Government is disposed to supply funds for the purpose to trustworthy persons, such as parish clergymen and others, on terms equally favourable with those granted to Companies?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I believe the Migration Clauses of the Tramways Act have so far not been put into operation at all. I have not seen Professor Baldwin's opinion; but the Government are not disposed to extend the Act in that direction to supply funds for the purpose to trustworthy persons, such as parish clergymen and others, on terms equally favourable with those granted to Companies.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — NEWPORT AND WESTPORT UNIONS—COMPENSATION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Local Government Board for Ireland, on the amalgamation of the Newport Union with that of Westport, to deprive the officers of their situations, without compensation or superannuation, some of them having as many as eighteen years' service; whether such treatment would not be most unjust, and inflict great hardships on the officials who have for many years discharged their respective duties satisfactorily; and, if he will state what the Government purpose doing with reference to these officials?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have nothing to add to the answer which I gave to a Question of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) on this subject on the 14th instant.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—SKIBBEREEN UNION.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Local Government Board have received a communication from a guardian of the Skibbereen Union, objecting to the recent elections of chairman, vice-chairman, and deputy vice-chairman, respectively, on the ground that the elections were irregularly carried out; and, whether the Local Government Board will order new elections for the above officers?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It appears that the voting at the first election was equal, and that, by unanimous consent, the election was postponed to a later date, when the three Chairmen were chosen. Two Guardians have since complained of the course pursued; but the Local Government Board see no reason whatever to interfere.

EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART—ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY—CELTIC MANUSCRIPTS.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What works have been printed by the Royal Academy since 1880 by means of the money received from Parliament under the annual votes "for the researches in connection with Celtic MSS.;" and, what Irish-English MSS. and translations have been published since 1880 by the Royal Academy under the annual grants made to it "for the publication of Celtic MSS.?"

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Secretary of the Academy informs me that since 1880 the grant for researches in connection with Celtic manuscripts has been devoted to the preparation of materials for an Irish-English dictionary, which it will take several years to complete. The Academy have not published any Celtic manuscript since 1880, in which year The Book of Leinster was issued; but very considerable progress has been made with The Book of Ballymote, a very large manuscript which is in course of publication with Dr. Atkinson as editor.

GUARDIANS—COOTEHILL UNION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that the clerk of Cootehill Union made the following statement in his letter to the Local Government Board, No. 14,583—84, in answer to the allegations made against him by Mr. Owen M'Cahe, candidate, and Rev. F. M'Kenna, P.P. his nominator, paragraph 11:—

Mr. O'Donnell

"This property" (Carmeen) "is held in trust by the persons named" (Most Rev. Dr. Donnelly, &c.) "who lodged separate statements of claim on a valuation of £119, on which I allowed four votes, &c.;"

if it is a fact that the clerk confirmed the above statement, with 25 others, by solemn oath at the subsequent inquiry, July 8th, 1884, before Mr. Armstrong, Local Government Board inspector; if it is a fact that the clerk did not allow any property votes on the said property of Carmeen, for which the Rev. F. M'Kenna, P.P. Latton, was proxy, and at whose residence the voting paper was left, inasmuch as the clerk alleged, at the counting of votes, that the property voting papers of the townland of Latton were missing, and could not be produced; that the clerk swore at the inquiry, 8th July, he could not find the property voting papers of the townland of Latton at the counting of votes, and of course did not allow them; that the fact that the clerk did not allow any property votes for Carmeen is notorious, having occurred in the board room in the presence of all interested, and sworn to at a public inquiry, and is in the knowledge of the Local Government Board; and, if it is a fact that Mr. Owen M'Cabe and Rev. F. M'Kenna, P.P., have again and again directed in a special manner the attention of the Local Government Board to the contradictory swearing of the clerk in this matter?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Perhaps the hon. Member will kindly postpone this Question till Thursday next. It has been necessary to communicate with the clerk, and his explanation has not yet reached me.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—KILLESHANDRA.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is he aware that James Grenan, of Aughavaslin, Killeshandra, states that Mr. Wm. Hamilton, J.P. is the person who signed or procured to be signed a voting paper at last election of Poor Law guardians for Killeshandra electoral in the name of Captain Beresford, although it was impossible for that gentleman to have signed it; and, whether, if on inquiry he finds the facts as stated, he will take any proceedings against Mr. Hamilton; and, if so, what action?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not aware of any such state of facts. James Grenan, senior, and James Grenan, junior, both deny that they made any such statement as that imputed, and Mr. William Hamilton, J.P., states that he did not take away the papers, and did not sign them.

FISHERIES (IRELAND)—SALMON WEIR ON THE LENNON, RAMELTON.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, on the River Lennon, near Ramelton, there is a weir over which salmon cannot pass (except in high floods, which are rare in the fishing season) and below this weir a pool about 500 yards in length, in which the owner of the fishery, Sir Augustus Stewart, keeps a boat and net, and whether his employes have for a long time past been in the habit of fishing the pool illegally at night; whether Reports on this subject have been made, without result, to the inspector of the district; and, whether Sir Augustus Stewart is a D.L. of the county Donegal?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The facts are as stated in the Question, except as regards the legality of the course pursued. Sir Augustus Stewart claims to be possessed of a several fishery at the place in question, and that the right has been exercised for the last 50 years, and during time immemorial. There are special exemptions in the Act for cases of this kind, both with respect to fishing within 200 yards of a dam and to fishing at night, which are otherwise illegal.

EXPLOSIVES ACT—ENFORCEMENT OF ACT IN IRELAND.

MR. P. J. POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in view of the fact that the salaries paid to inspectors under the Explosives Act (Ireland) are a heavy and unjust burden on local rates, and that magistrates in Ireland have generally declined to avail of the services of the constabulary for the purposes of this Act, he will recommend that measures be taken to have the duties of inspectors under said Act discharged by members of the constabulary?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: A Circular was issued in October last to local authorities in Ireland—who are not in all cases the magistrates at Petty Sessions—informing them that they may appoint members of the Constabulary to act as Inspectors under the Explosives Act. I am not aware what number of constables have been so far appointed; and in the opinion of the Irish Government a sufficient time has not yet elapsed to enable a correct idea to be formed of the extent to which local authorities will avail themselves of the concession.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ATHY BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, at a recent meeting of the Athy Board of Guardians, the majority of that body appointed as persons to make out the lists of voters for the parishes in the union seven persons, the Secretary of the National League Branches in each parish; whether the Board has not, at a subsequent meeting, agreed to remunerate them; whether such appointment was made in spite of the statement of the clerk that the usual course was to appoint the rate collectors for the purpose, but that the preference was given to the Secretaries of the National League as such; whether the appointment was made without notice, and notwithstanding the suggestion that a fortnight's notice of the intention to appoint the Secretaries of the League; and, whether the Local Government Board in Ireland will take steps to recall such appointment and to secure the appointment of proper parties?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I understand the Athy Board of Guardians have selected persons who are not the rate collectors to assist the clerks of the Union in the preparation of the voters lists, and the Local Government Board have communicated with them, pointing out the irregularity of the proceedings.

LAND REGISTRY OFFICE—RETURNS.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Secretary to the Treasury, What is the number of estates placed on the register on first registration in the Office of Land Registry during the half-year to 30th June, 1884, and the half-year to 31st December, 1884?

MR. HIBBERT: The number of estates placed on the register in the first six months of 1884 was 215, of which two only were on first registration; in the second six months the figures were 230 and four.

NAVY—ARMAMENT FOR SHIPS COMPLETING FOR SEA.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he is assured that a complete equipment of guns and their mountings or carriages, and torpedoes, will be ready in ample time for the fourteen new ships of war in addition to the Conqueror and Colossus, which are to be completed for sea before the end of the present financial year?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: It is fully expected that the guns, gun mountings, torpedoes, and torpedo carriages will be ready in time for the whole of these ships.

NAVY (SHIPS)—COST OF SHIPS BUILDING.

SIR EDWARD J. REED asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he has examined the recent amended Return which sets forth the cost of Her Majesty's Ships laid down since March 1880; and, if so, whether he is able to confirm the statement made by the Civil Lord of the Admiralty to the House, on Monday last, to the effect that "the Return had been very carefully drawn up, and might be accepted by the House as correct," or whether the alleged cost was, in every case, below the actual cost of the completed ship?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The figures have been examined and found to give correctly the cost of hulls and engines, with fittings. Masts, yards, rigging, and stores, and the incidental and establishment charges are not included. The Return is similar to those formerly given on the Motion of the late Mr. Laird.

MR. CARBUTT: I wish to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether there is any truth in the report which appeared in The Observer of yesterday, that the Government have bought an iron-clad from the Italian Government; and, if so, will he state what are the armaments of that iron-clad?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: I cannot reply to the Question of the hon. Member without Notice.

MR. CARBUTT: I beg to give Notice, as the Secretary to the Admiralty does not know whether an iron-clad has been bought, that I shall repeat the Question to-morrow.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

CIVIL SERVICE (PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATURE) — MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON, INSPECTOR OF FISHERIES.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the statement in The Belfast News Letter that Mr. William Johnston, one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Fisheries in Ireland, had written to the Orange Grand Master, "expressing his readiness, if called upon, to contest one of the divisions of Belfast at the General Election," and that an uncontradicted statement has also been published, announcing that Mr. Johnston has been selected as the Tory candidate for one of the divisions of Down; is this the same official from whom a former Irish Secretary stated he had obtained a written pledge that he would abstain from politics while in office; had Mr. Johnston previously been several times cautioned by the Irish Executive for inflammatory speeches; is the Lord Lieutenant aware of the existence of the Treasury Minute of 12th November last, wherein the First Lord, referring to those civil servants who "announce themselves publicly as candidates for seats in the House," states it to be the usage of the Department that a civil servant should resign "as soon as he issues his address to the electors, or in any other manner announces himself as a candidate," and that this regulation has now been made an Order in Council; has Mr. William Johnston resigned office as fishery inspector; is it the fact that, although several weeks have elapsed since the announcement of his candidature, no steps have been taken by Earl Spencer to enforce the Order in Council; and, what is the explanation of the Irish Government?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Mr. Johnston states that he has not announced himself publicly as a candidate for a seat in the House of Commons, nor has he issued any address, nor, as he believes, in any way infringed the Order in Council. He also states that he has not been selected as a candidate for one of the divisions of Down. The case will be dealt with by the Irish Government in strict accordance with the Order in Council should the occasion arise.

MR. HEALY: Has the right hon. Gentleman seen a letter from Mr. Johnston in The Belfast Evening News, in which the following passage occurs:—

"The 12th of July is approaching, and all over Ulster, in view of the approaching election, it will have a national importance. On that occasion I hope to take my place amongst my Orange brethren, and I hope hereafter to give emphasis to my views when Member for South Belfast."

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have not heard of it, and I can only say it is somewhat inconsistent with the letters I have received from Mr. Johnston. I have said that as soon as it appears that Mr. Johnston is taking such a position as a candidate for Parliament as to bring him within the Order of Council the Government will act upon it.

MR. SEXTON asked whether Mr. Johnston had recently broken the pledges which he formerly gave, and had made political speeches?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have not seen anything of the kind.

MR. HEALY asked whether one of the terms of the Order in Council was not to the effect—"As soon as any civil servant issues his address to the electors, or in any other way announces himself as a candidate;" and whether Mr. Johnston had not fulfilled that condition when he stated that he hoped to be the Member for South Belfast?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Mr. Johnston, in his letter, says expressly that he has not announced himself publicly as a candidate for a seat in the House of Commons, nor issued any address, nor in any way infringed the Order in Council.

MR. HEALY gave Notice that he would call attention to the matter.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—REVISED CODE, 1885—EDUCATION IN THE HIGHLANDS.

MR. MUNRO-FERGUSON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether it is proposed, under the Code for 1885, to make any special provision for bettering the state of education in the Highlands, and to lighten the burden of the school rates in those districts?

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes; Sir. We have prepared a Minute, which we shall lay on the Table in a day or two, together with a Memorandum explaining its operation, which will have the effect of promoting education and lightening the burden of school rates in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—EDUCATION LOANS.

MR. ISAAC WILSON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether he has received any remonstrance in reference to the Treasury Minute of the 26th of February relative to Education loans; and, whether he will urge upon the Treasury the importance of some extension of the term of repayment from thirty-five to fifty years?

MR. MUNDELLA: I believe one School Board has remonstrated against the recent Treasury Minute; but I am assured by the Treasury that they are unable, without public loss, to extend the terms of the loans or reduce the rate of interest. Loans can now be made for a term of 35 years at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and for 50 years at 4 per cent. This is a reduction of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on the first, and $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent on the second term.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REGISTRATION OF VOTERS) (IRELAND)—DONEGAL UNION.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with regard to the refusal of the clerk of the Donegal Union to perform the duty of serving notices cast upon him by the Franchise Act, Whether the Irish Local Government Board have sent an inspector to Donegal to secure that persons entitled to the Parliamentary Franchise are not excluded from the register by reason of the default of the clerk, and if an inspector has been despatched, what report has been received from him?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: There is no necessity to send an Inspector to make inquiries into this matter. The clerk is proceeding to discharge his duties under the Act.

MR. SEXTON asked whether the Local Government Board would issue a Circular to the Boards of Guardians pointing out the consequences that would ensue from delay?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the Government had issued a Circular.

MR. SEXTON asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had seen the statement that the clerk of the Sligo Union had refused to proceed unless they paid him first £40.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: No; Sir. I have not.

EGYPT (THE EXPEDITIONARY FORCE)—THE CAMEL CORPS.

COLONEL MILNE-HOME asked the Secretary of State for War, If, now that warlike operations in the Soudan are suspended, the Cavalry portions of the "Camel Corps" will be permitted immediately to rejoin their regiments, or be sent for service elsewhere as Cavalry?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: From communications I have had with Lord Wolseley, I infer that the consideration of this question can only take place after the concentration of the troops towards the North has made a certain degree of progress.

ARMY—HEALTH OF THE ARMY—PHTHISIS.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to an article, which appeared recently in The United Service Gazette, on the subject of Phthisis in the Army; and, whether the statistics quoted in that article, of the serious losses to the Army every year caused by that disease are correct; and, if so, what steps have been taken to test the value of the alleged discovery of a successful scientific treatment of this most fatal disease?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Assuming that the article referred to is one which appeared in The United Service Gazette of the 28th of February last. I have to say that the figures quoted are individually accurate. The measure, however, of the annual loss from phthisis is the deaths plus the discharges from that disease; whereas the writer has added the invaliding home, which is, in effect, taking the invalided soldiers twice over. Regrettable as is the loss to the Army from phthisis, there is no proof given that the loss of life would be materially less among a body of equal strength of men in other employment, drawn from the same class, and at the same ages. The ages for military employment are those at which consumption is ordinarily the most fatal. The Army Medical Staff are only too glad to adopt every measure of proved efficacy in combating this terrible disease; but the nature of the remedy referred to in the newspaper article under consideration is not stated specifically enough to enable the authorities to say whether it has been tried, or should be tried.

NAVY—SCARLATINA IN THE
"BRITANNIA" TRAINING SHIP.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he can state the result of the inquiry into the causes of the late outbreak of scarlatina among the cadets on board the Britannia at Dartmouth; if it is the case that there was, and still is, only one untrained female nurse in the cottage hospital, notoriously ignorant of the proper mode of treating persons suffering from serious illness, inattentive to her duty, negligent of those under her care, and disapproved of by the medical officers; if it is true that this woman was heard to desire a cadet suffering from scarlatina, and who was seized with a violent attack of croup, to stop coughing, as he was doing it on purpose, and whether at this time she had as many as ten cadets under her sole care; if it is the case that there was in the cadet hospital only one trained and competent nurse to attend to twenty cadets, all suffering from scarlatina; whether, during the outbreak, there was any system of daily medical inspection to ascertain whether any further cadets had developed suspicious symptoms, or whether it is true that in many cases those boys who were sickening did not go into the sick bay till the symptoms were fully developed, and till compelled to do so by their comrades; if it is the case that there is only a screen between the sick bay where the suspected cases were located and the parts of the ship to which the ship's crew and other cadets had access, and whether the whole of the cadets were compelled to go into a cold bath each morning, without previously ascertaining whether they were in a fit state for such treatment, and in some cases took the cold bath the very day of being sent to hospital with scarlatina; if it is the case that two boys were sent on shore to hospital at 9 p.m. in an open boat, without any additional covering or clothing, with their temperature at 101 and 102, and with the rash fully developed, while another was kept on board till he was so ill that he fell down when walking up from the boat, and had to be carried into hospital; and, in the case of the last of the thirty cadets who were attacked, whether he was kept under supervision all day, and not sent to hospital till the evening, in consequence of the absence of the medical officer; and, if he will cause a searching inquiry to be instituted into these allegations?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The hon. Member will scarcely look for a categorical answer to the numerous Questions which he has put on the Paper with reference to the recent outbreak of scarlatina in the Britannia. I shall be glad to lay a full Report on the Table. It cannot but be a source of satisfaction to know that, out of 33 cases, none proved fatal.

EGYPT AND FRANCE—SEIZURE OF THE "BOSPHORE EGYPTIEN"—RUPTURE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Ministers have now received information to the effect that the French Chargé d'Affaires has, on behalf of the French Republic, threatened to break off diplomatic relations with Egypt, and to withdraw from the financial agreement and guarantee now before Parliament?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I am happy to state, in answer to the Question of the hon. Member, that Her Majesty's Government are on the point of coming to an arrangement on this question satisfactory to France, Egypt, and themselves. The negotiations between the French Ambassador and Lord Granville have been conducted on conciliatory and courteous terms, without any intimation being given of a character which might have raised serious obstacles on our part.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Will the noble Lord give no further information on the subject?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have already stated that we are about on the point of arriving at a settlement.

MR. O'KELLY: Does that include reparation to France?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have said that I cannot give details.

EGYPT (AFFAIRS OF THE SOUDAN)—
THE KASSALA GARRISON.

MR. MONTAGU SCOTT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any information from Kassala; and, if any measures will be taken to rescue the besieged garrison?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir Evelyn Baring has reported that the garrisons of Amadib, Senbit, and Galabat have been successfully relieved, but that up to the 22nd instant there was no further news of Kassala. I have already stated that the relief of Kassala does not come within the sphere of the projected military operations.

FISHERIES (IRELAND)—BOARD OF CONSERVATORS, COLERAINE
DISTRICT.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the working licensed fishermen of Lough Neagh, upwards of three hundred in number, complain that they have power to elect only four out of twenty-four members of the Board of Conservators of the Coleraine district; whether the total number of licences of all kinds issued annually in that district is not more than about four hundred; what proportion of the funds administered by the Board of Conservators is derived from the licence duty paid by the working fishermen; whether the fishermen represent that some of the Conservators, being themselves the owners of salmon fisheries on the Bann, between Lough Neagh and the sea, are hostile to the industry of the working men who fish the lake, and have caused the institution of regulations which impede and harass the working men to such an extent as to deprive them of the means of subsistence; whether the fishermen claim that Lough Neagh should be constituted a separate district; whether, the voting for elections of members of the present Board being open, the water bailiffs are in the habit of using intimidation to induce the working fishermen to give their votes for certain candidates; whether the fishermen declare that the loss of the lives of four of their body in the Lough, on the 26th November last, was caused by the want of a suitable landing place; and, whether the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries will hold a public inquiry into, and make a report upon, the several complaints in question.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No complaints on any of these matters have reached the Government or the Inspectors of Fisheries within recent years. The proper course would be for the parties who consider themselves aggrieved to address a Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant, setting out the particulars of their complaint, and a decision would then be come to as to whether cause is shown for a public inquiry.

COLLIERIES—EVICTON OF MINERS AT DENABY COLLIERY.

MR. BROADHURST (for Mr. BURT) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the eviction of a large number of miners and their families from their houses at Denaby Main Colliery; whether he is aware that when a workman obtains employment at the colliery named he is compelled to live in a house belonging to the Company, provided the Company have a house unoccupied, even though the workman may be able to obtain a better and cheaper house elsewhere; whether he is aware that the workmen are forced to sign an agreement to allow the rent to be deducted from their wages; and, whether, if the facts be as stated, he is prepared to deal with the subject by fresh legislation, so as to prevent an infringement of the spirit, if not the letter, of the Truck Act?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had received a Report from the Inspector of the district in which this colliery was situated, and it was to the effect that no pressure had been brought to bear upon the colliers to induce them to occupy the houses belonging to the Colliery Company. It seemed to be a condition that if the men occupied those houses the rent would be deducted from their wages. Under these circumstances, it appeared to him (Sir William Harcourt) that there was no infringement of the Truck Act.

NAVY—STATE OF THE NAVY—NOTICE OF MOTION (SIR EDWARD J. REED).

SIR EDWARD J. REED asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will name a day upon which he will enable me to move my proposed Resolution expressive of the anxiety of this House respecting the state of the Navy?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think that my hon. Friend, notwithstanding that he has put this Question on the Paper, will not be surprised if I tell him that I have no such power. At the present time it is entirely beyond my power to name a day for such a purpose in the present state of the engagements of the House. The Navy is largely involved in the debates we have had for two nights, and is also largely involved in the important proposal which will come before the House to-night. After that proposal is disposed of, if my hon. Friend should still think it important, when we come to make our arrangements with regard to the Business of the Session—and the time for that, I hope, is very close at hand—it will be quite open to him to renew the Question.

SIR EDWARD J. REED gave Notice that he would renew his Question after the Vote of Credit.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—DIPLOMATIC NEGOTIATIONS—REFERENCE TO ARBITRATION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in the event of Her Majesty's Government being unable to adjust their existing difficulties with His Imperial Majesty the Emperor and Government of Russia, he will endeavour to bring about a reference of all questions in dispute to the President and Government of the United States?

MR. GLADSTONE: This Question is substantially a renewal of Questions which have been put by hon. Members, and I can only answer in the same general terms. I must ask hon. Members who have put these Questions to be content for the present with that answer, and with the assurance that we are quite sensible of the heavy responsibility under which we lie to maintain the honour and good faith of the country, and, on the other hand, to use every means consistent with that object.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—SIR PETER LUMSDEN'S TELEGRAM.

MR. ONSLOW asked the First Lord of the Treasury, With reference to paragraph 6 of General Lumsden's telegram—

“General Komaroff states ‘Afghan audacity and arrogance increased by degrees.’ Reply: It may have been so, but, if so, it was entirely caused by Russian action, as the Afghans did all they could to avoid collision, and it was solely owing to their patience and forbearance, during two months of incessant irritation, that peace has been preserved so long;”

and, whether the Government had any intimation from Sir Peter Lumsden, or from any other source, of this “incessant irritation;” and, if so, what action Her Majesty's Government took on receipt of this information?

MR. GLADSTONE: My answer is that from inquiry I find that there has been a statement of a somewhat vague and general character of this kind from Sir Peter Lumsden. It is very vague and general, and it has been duly referred to Sir Peter Lumsden for explanation.

MR. ONSLOW: Has there been any answer from St. Petersburg to the representations of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. GLADSTONE: Anything material and intelligible we have endeavoured to make known to the House; but I doubt whether we could go further until the time comes—if it should come—when it would be proper that the House should see the whole mixed matter of these telegrams altogether, and have the entire question before it.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH (IRELAND) THE ARCHBISHOPRIC OF DUBLIN—MR. ERRINGTON'S MISSION.

MR. SEXTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is true, as positively asserted by the Rome correspondent of The Standard, that the British Government have caused representations to be made by Mr. George Errington, M.P. to the Sovereign Pontiff, with the object of preventing the appointment by His Holiness of the Very Reverend Dr. Walsh, Vicar Capitular of the Catholic See of Dublin, to be the Archbishop of that See?

MR. GLADSTONE: In answer to this Question I have to say that the Cabinet have never, so far as I am aware, had any cognizance of any communication between Mr. Errington and His Holiness the Pope, and certainly not upon the occasion to which the Question refers. If I am asked whether any individual Member of the Government has used any such representations, as distinct from the Cabinet, my reply is that I am not aware of it.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to give Notice that I shall call attention, on the Vote for the Foreign Office, to this matter, and endeavour to ascertain whether any Member of the Government has caused representations to be made to the Holy See in reference to the internal government of the Catholic Church.

PARLIAMENT — PUBLIC BUSINESS —
GHANISTAN — DIPLOMATIC NEGOTIATIONS.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to ask the Prime Minister, in regard to the course of Business this evening, Whether he will be willing to agree, as soon as he has made his statement, to the adjournment of the debate, so that there may be time to consider what course ought to be taken?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am in very great doubt whether that request will be made after the statement is made; but I certainly can enter into no preliminary arrangement on the subject. Probably the right hon. Gentleman will ask me whether I have any further intelligence with regard to the telegrams from Sir whether we shall receive any isolated information which it would be desirable to lay before the House on the point. It is with great satisfaction I have heard of the mission of Mr. Stephen. The date of his arrival here I am not able to fix, because I do not know exactly the time the journey may occupy.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he can state now if a despatch by M. de Giers, which appeared in all the English newspapers of the 23rd, and which threw the responsibility for the unfortunate affair at Penjdeh on Sir Peter Lumsden's escort, and on the meeting between the Viceroy and the Ameer—I wish to ask whether this despatch is authentic or not?

MR. GLADSTONE: I believe this Question was replied to on a former day. My noble Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs stated that it would not be expedient for us to give any answer in regard to that subject at the present time.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Are we right in supposing that Mr. Stephen has started from Meshed, or is he still with Sir Peter Lumsden?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not able to answer that Question. The telegram was, I think, stated by me in effect. I cannot tell whether at the moment of the despatch of this telegram he was with Sir Peter Lumsden or not.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when Mr. Stephen may be expected?

MR. GLADSTONE: We will make inquiry about the matter.

MR. RITCHIE: I wish to ask whether the Government propose to suspend and postpone the negotiations with Russia on this question till Mr. Stephen arrives?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND)
BILL.

MR. HEALY: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister if it is intended to take the Irish Registration Bill further in Committee to-night?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDIS-TRIBUTION) BILL.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON asked, Whether, in the event of the Report stage the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill being concluded on Tuesday, the Government intended to take Wednesday for their Business?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was told that there was no probability of the Report of the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill being finished on Tuesday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

VOTE OF CREDIT—DIVISION OF THE VOTE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. GLADSTONE, in moving that the Speaker do now leave the Chair, said: Sir, I think that it would be in accordance with the course usually pursued by the House on these occasions that we should go into Committee on the Vote of Credit, and that upon getting into Committee I should propose the Vote and state to the House such considerations as I think bear upon the question whether the House should grant the Vote or not. I regret that the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) proposes to raise as a preliminary question the division of the Vote of Credit, and to ask the House to affirm that the expenses on account of the Soudan Expedition shall be considered separately from those on account of military and naval expenditure. Having this proposal before me, what I intend to do is as follows—to state very briefly indeed the reasons why I hope that Motion may not be addressed to the House. I may succeed in that object, or the hon. Member may persist in pressing the Motion on the House. If the debate should become general and broader questions are raised, and there is a desire for further information as to the general merits of the Vote, I should have no alternative but to state to the House what I had intended to say on the Vote itself. At present, I will only speak on the question of the division of the Vote. I have no hesitation in admitting that where two Votes are proposed in the nature of Votes of Credit for Services which are not only distinct, but which are likely to remain distinct until they are respectively accomplished, the proper course is to submit those sums as separate Votes of Credit, and to ask a separate authority from the House to deal with each, so that the money granted for each may be applied to that for which it was granted, and not for the other. But the consideration which has led us to submit this sum in one Vote is of an entirely practical character. It is that, although in their apparent objects these Votes are separate, yet in their possible application they are not separate. I have before stated to the House that under no circumstances would the Government take upon itself to apply to the Soudan Expedition the Votes we are about to ask under the head of special preparations; but I reserved entirely, and I hope the House may approve our reserving, the discretion to apply the money taken for the Soudan Services to purposes which would fall under the head of special preparations. The very ground on which we make our proposal with regard to the Votes for the Soudan Services is that the grant admits, and even, to some extent, contemplates, the application of a portion of the money for what we now know as special preparations. Under those circumstances, it would be very inconvenient that we should be tied either to spend in the Soudan money not required for purposes in the Soudan, or else that we should be under the necessity, before we could use any of these moneys granted by Parliament for the special preparations, which we deem to be of the highest material importance, of again giving Notice, again raising debate, and again proposing a separate Vote of Credit for the purposes for which we ask special preparation. Well, Sir, that appears to us to be a reasonable view of the case; and, if it is not, I must put it to the House that if it is not distinctly unreasonable in the view of the House, nothing could be more inexpedient than that, upon a question which is one of practical convenience rather than of distinct principle, we should go to an issue with anything like lengthened discussion, and with division of Party forces in face of the world, and at the present moment, and in the present circumstances of the Empire. I thought, Sir, that I had pointed out that a perfectly unexceptionable way of raising the discussion was reserved to any Gentleman by moving the diminution of the Vote in the Committee; but I do not dwell on that. I hope the House will not see ground for entertaining even that Motion. I sincerely hope that there will not be a disposition to press the Amendment now before us. It would certainly be our duty to resist it; and I think it would be far more convenient that we should be allowed to go into Committee, and that I should be allowed to make my statement. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote), if he saw cause, or any other, would then either demand time or take whatever course he pleases; but we should have, at any rate, a single question before us, and we should not be divided at the very threshold of the matter by discussion on a point of procedure, with respect to which I think it is hardly to be doubted that we have reserved to ourselves reasonable discretion in asking the House to vote this sum in such a way that moneys granted prima facie for the purposes of the Soudan may, should it appear to be practicable, be applied for the purposes of the special preparations. I move that you, Sir, now leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, in rising to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Vote of Credit to be submitted in Committee of Supply on account of the Soudan Expedition should be considered separately from the Vote of Credit to be submitted on account of other Military and Naval expenditure," said, he could assure his right hon. Friend that in putting his Amendment on the Paper he was not at all actuated by Party motives. Nothing of the kind was contemplated. He had no particular personal desire to press his Motion. In order to ascertain whether it was necessary to take any preliminary objections to the Vote, he had consulted the authorities of the House. His only motive in submitting his Amendment was to secure, if possible, a clear and intelligible discussion of the two very different matters proposed to be submitted to the judgment of the House. He objected very much to the Votes being so proposed, because he believed it involved an entire departure from a long line of precedents, and might be fraught with mischievous consequences. There had been, since the Crimean War, an almost uninterrupted series of Votes of Credit; and every single one of them, down to this one, was taken for a separate Service. The present proposal of the Government involved a departure. He instanced the Votes of Credit for South Africa, for the Abyssinian War, and the Vote of Credit in 1870, when there was war in Europe. Votes of Credit in those days were given under rules much less stringent than existed now. His main contention, however, was that the Vote for the Soudan should not be a Vote of Credit at all, but a Supplementary Estimate. The Vote for £11,000,000 was divided into two parts, and these were again sub-divided. As to the £4,500,000 for the Soudan, after making allowances for all the demands that the Prime Minister had enumerated, including even the Nile steamers, there was a balance of £2,750,000. This was for military expenditure; but there was to be no expedition to Khartoum, and there were to be no further operations in the Soudan. It would be easy for the able official accountants to give an approximate idea of what proportion of this balance would be needed for the cost of the occupation of Suakin by the British or Indian troops. Then, as to the £6,500,000 for special preparations. The naval expenditure was to consist of £2,500,000, and the Prime Minister told them how that was to be spent—in torpedoes and guns for the Navy. Now, what the Prime Minister was asking for was that not only should the £4,000,000 under "special preparations" be appropriated to military expenditure, but that, without any definite authorization, he should be able to draw upon the £2,750,000 nominally taken for the Soudan, but which it was calculated would never be wanted for the Soudan. Thus, a sum of £6,750,000 was asked for for the Army, to be disposed of in any way the Government liked. Why? Because their mismanagement of the Army administration had been so grievous and glaring that it was the only way they could possibly find for covering the deficits in the Army Estimates. By the alteration of the rule applicable to this matter, the Government had been able to elude financial scrutiny during the past few years. Upon the authority of the Accountant

General, he could state that when once a Vote of Credit had been agreed to the House parted with all its control over the expenditure of the amount of that Vote. So much was this the case, that in 1879, in a letter printed at the end of the Appropriation Accounts of that year, the Lords of the Treasury said—

“Votes of Credit are not current only for the year in which they are taken, and my Lords make it a rule to substitute for them wherever possible Supplementary Estimates. These latter leave less discretion to the spending Departments.”

In 1879, when a Vote of Credit was agreed to in reference to the war in South Africa, the Comptroller General was unable to certify that the amount of money voted for that war had been actually expended for that purpose, and not for general purposes. From a statement made by the Prime Minister, it appeared to be perfectly competent for the Government to make a reasonably close approximation to the expenditure which still remained to be incurred in connection with the Soudan. The Government had, therefore, all the materials before them for proposing a Supplementary Estimate instead of a Vote of Credit. The presenting of such an Estimate would be in accordance with the advanced financial arrangements of the country, with the strong recommendations of the Public Accounts Committee, and with the rules laid down by the Treasury itself, and to be observed by the spending Departments when asking for sums on account like the present. The Prime Minister had told the House last week that he would give them an assurance that no portion of the Vote of Credit to be taken for the Soudan Service should be appropriated for the other Service. He, for one, feared that the language of the right hon. Gentleman on the present occasion would somewhat detract from that feeling of confidence with which hon. Members might otherwise have been inclined to look back to the right hon. Gentleman's utterances of last week. Before this question was disposed of, he trusted that three right hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were experienced Parliamentarians—some known for their political consistency, and some less remarkable for that quality—would take the trouble to look over the speeches which they had severally delivered in a famous debate in 1878. The right hon. Gentlemen to whom he referred were the Members for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), and for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), and the present Prime Minister. On the occasion to which he referred, the present Opposition brought forward a proposal similar to that now introduced—namely, a Vote of £6,000,000—to enable the Government of the day to make a show, as was thought right and proper, before the world, in view of certain hostilities which they anticipated would occur. He did not know that he should put the House to the trouble of dividing upon his Amendment, because he believed that the end he had in view would be fully satisfied by his drawing attention to the technical question. He had taken the course he had done because he was somewhat afraid that it might be ruled that the Motion he had placed upon the Paper could not be put from the Chair, and that it could not be brought forward in Committee of Supply. He begged to move that, in the opinion of that House, it was desirable that the Vote of Credit to be submitted in Committee of Supply on account of the Soudan Expedition should be considered separately from the Vote of Credit to be submitted on account of other military and naval expenditure.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he begged to second the Amendment. He understood that the hon. Member (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) who had moved it did not desire to go to a division, nor did he (Sir Henry Holland) desire to do so; but he seconded the Motion as a protest against the course—the unprecedented course—adopted by the Government in moving one Vote of Credit for two distinct services, one of which should have been provided for by a Supplemental Estimate. This question of Votes of Credit and Supplemental Estimates had many times been discussed in the House and before Public Accounts Committees, the object, of course, being to give to the House as large a power as possible over the expenditure, and full means of ascertaining and checking it; and in 1880 the point was closely considered by the Public Accounts Committee which sat in that year, and he would venture to read to the House one paragraph of their Report—

"Your Committee have arrived at the opinion that in all cases of special service, where the Department can make a fairly definite Estimate of the Service, and of the general head under which the proposed expenditure will mainly fall, it is desirable that a Supplementary Estimate should be presented, as in the case of the Indian Native troops, and that Votes of Credit should, as a rule, be only resorted to when from the nature of the services to be performed it is very difficult, if not impossible, to give any fairly approximate Estimate of the amount required."

Now, the hon. Member who moved this Amendment with so much ability had shown beyond all question that it was perfectly possible to make a very fair Estimate for the Soudan expenses; and a Supplementary Estimate should, therefore, have been presented, and not a Vote of Credit asked for. He was quite aware that in many cases a Vote of Credit was absolutely necessary, and there was less objection to such a Vote now than there used to be, as the expenditure under it was so much more closely watched; but he feared that a great blow would be struck at Votes of Credit if proceedings of this kind were to be sanctioned. All precedent pointed to this—that a Vote of Credit should be confined to one special and separate Service. He certainly had understood the Prime Minister to say some days ago that though this Vote of Credit applied to two Services, the money asked for in respect of one Service should not be applied to the other; but it now appeared that the money asked for for the Soudan Expedition might be applied for the Special Preparation Service.

MR. GLADSTONE: That, Sir, is a point of very great importance upon which I do not wish to be misunderstood. I will venture to say that I can hardly have been misreported in the very careful words I used on the occasion to which the hon. Gentleman refers. I then gave a most distinct pledge that we should not apply the Soudan any of the money for the special preparation—no pledge whatever in that sense. On the contrary, I stated that our policy was to keep our Forces in the Soudan and not to use them elsewhere.

HOLLAND said, he understood the Prime Minister would not wish to misrepresent him. He had only stated what was understood; and he must not say the Prime Minister said that money might be applied to the other Service, it was not a great stretch of imagination to suppose that the converse treatment of the money voted would also be allowed. He would not detain the House any longer, but he ventured to think that this kind of Vote of Credit for two Services was without precedent, and should not be allowed to pass without a strong protest.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Vote of Credit to be submitted in Committee of Supply on account of the Soudan Expedition should be considered separately from the Vote of Credit to be submitted on account of other Military and Naval expenditure,"—
(Mr. Arthur O'Connor,)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not feel that I am competent to deal with the speech of the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) in regard to the financial argument of which he made use; but if the House should desire that this question should be fully discussed, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and others will deal with that part of the subject. I will now endeavour to state to the House the extreme inconvenience, amounting almost to impracticability, which would ensue from following the course pursued by the hon. Member for Queen's County. Probably the House will be of opinion that the hon. Member has not been very successful in quoting precedents. He referred to the year 1878, when he said there were complications in Europe and in South Africa; but I did not understand him to say that separate Votes were taken in that year. Even if that were the case, the House will perceive that the question of that year was altogether distinct from the present one. In regard to the alleged precedent of 1870, the hon. Member did not say that in that case two separate Votes of Credit were moved. The hon. Member only referred to the Report of the Committee on Public Accounts, which stated that the extremely irregular and objectionable practice had been followed in 1874 of applying sums in the Vote of Credit for the Abyssinian War Votes long before in the payment of the liabilities of that year. Altogether, the hon. Member's argument appears to me to be rather against Votes of Credit than an argument in support of the particular proposition that this Vote of Credit ought to be divided into two parts. Before we laid this Vote of Credit upon the Table we considered the alternative measures of procedure, and we adopted deliberately the course we have adopted, without any political object whatever, and with a view to the financial convenience of the Services and of the War Office. We certainly did not adopt that course with the view of withholding any information from the House. In the statement accompanying the Vote of Credit, the Government has placed the House in possession of as full information as they are able to give. Neither did they adopt this course in order to prevent the House raising any issue it chose, for that that could easily be done is abundantly evidenced by the Notice of Motion given by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). The reasons which influenced the Government are briefly these. The general preparations determined upon by the Government contemplate the employment elsewhere of a very large portion of the Forces either now in the Soudan, or which may have been raised for the operations there. The extra cost of the Force which would thus be released would cease to be a charge in the Soudan operations. Large quantities of supplies and stores have already been ordered and despatched to Egypt. So long as the troops are engaged in Egypt these stores, although the troops may be available for service elsewhere, will continue to be charged for the preparations made for the Soudan. It will be impossible, under the system of the War Office accounts, to break up these charges in the accounts and to distinguish the part chargeable to the garrisons left in Egypt and the troops employed in the Soudan from the charges for the Forces available for service elsewhere. When the accounts of the Army Expenditure of the year are completed, an approximate statement will be made in the form of an Estimate, showing as far as can be done the charges incurred for the two services; but I am informed by the financial authorities of the War Office, it will be impossible to support that statement by vouchers in the way a Parliamentary account is supported so as to satisfy the Auditor General. For instance, the claims of the contractor for the supply of meat at a station is for the quantity delivered in bulk to the Commissariat. No distinction is made between that to be consumed by the Cavalry, Infantry, Artillery, or Militia; much less is there any distinction of the claims for the food of those men who may have been added to the Forces as the result of either the general preparations or the Soudan operations. Similarly as regards stores. The reserves of small arm ammunition have been largely diminished by the issues to these troops, and orders have been given to make up these reserves. It is not possible to distinguish in the charges for wages in the accounts of the Royal Laboratory the extra wages due respectively to these two causes. For the reason therefore that a separate account, in the proper sense of the word, cannot be kept of the expenditure as occasioned by the two causes, one Vote has been asked for; but the Paper circulated with the Vote may be taken as fairly distributing the charge, on the assumption that all extra expenditure upon that portion of the Force in Egypt, which the Government has determined to withdraw as soon as possible, shall, so long as it may remain in Egypt, be regarded as chargeable against general preparations. There are other reasons which prevent the division of the Vote. They are, no doubt, reasons of a highly technical character; but they are the reasons which have influenced the financial advisers, and I doubt whether the requirements of the law can be met if the House were to insist upon the proposed division of the Vote. If no necessity for general preparations existed, if the troops could be brought back from the Soudan, if the establishment which had been increased on account of the Soudan War could at once be reduced to its normal strength, if the provision of supply for the Soudan Expedition could at once be stopped, the money necessary for the House to provide on account of the Soudan Expedition would be near the amount stated in the Papers presented to Parliament; but, in the present circumstances, no such process will take place. The troops who are employed and who are necessary to be employed in the Soudan, will not be brought home. They will be held available either in Egypt or in any other station which may be thought necessary for general service. Supplies for their use will not be stopped, but, on the contrary, increased. Considering, therefore, that the two operations are so closely and inextricably bound together, it appears to me absolutely impossible, and would tend rather to the confusion of the House, and to diminish rather than to increase the real control which the House has over the military expenditure of the country if the course proposed by the hon. Member were taken. I trust the House will not be disposed to agree to the proposal of the hon. Member, but will accept the assurance of the Government that this course has been taken, not by any means with the intention of diminishing the control of the House over the expenditure, or of hiding any information from the House which we have the power to give, but simply from the cause I have stated of rendering the money voted by Parliament most available for the general service of the country, in whatever part of the world it may be required.

MR. CHAPLIN: I hope the House will permit me to say half-a-dozen words in support of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor). I trust myself that the Amendment of the hon. Member will be something more than a protest on this occasion. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for War and the Prime Minister have both informed the House that there is no great matter of principle involved in the question. I am not, therefore, without some hope that the Government will yield to what appears to me to be the exceedingly legitimate and reasonable proposition of the hon. Member; and if the Government are not disposed to take that course, I hope, for my own part, that the hon. Member will press his Motion to a division. I confess that I was much surprised myself at the form in which this Vote was originally presented to the House, and it seems to me that the Amendment of the hon. Member simply places it on its natural and its legitimate footing. What is the position of the House in regard to this question? The Vote which is now before us deals with questions, not only separate in themselves, and which, therefore, as the Prime Minister said, ought to be treated as distinct, but with regard to which we may hold, and many of us do hold, very different opinions as to the course we ought to pursue. Now, as to the first question—that which relates to military preparations—if the Government come forward on their own responsibility and say that this Vote is required for the safety of the Empire, which under their guidance has recently been greatly in peril, I apprehend that there will be very little difference of opinion, and, without hesitation, I have no doubt the House of Commons will grant whatever sums are demanded for securing the safety of the Empire. But with regard to the Vote for the Soudan, that Vote appears to me to stand on a totally different footing altogether. Now, I think there is a great deal to be said on the question of the Soudan, and the Votes which the Government are asking for that Expedition now. I am not going to enter into details upon the question; but before this Vote is granted for the Soudan, the Government will certainly be called upon to reconcile the statement of their policy announced a short time ago with the totally different attitude they are adopting at the present moment. The House will assuredly require some further explanation with regard to the way in which it was induced to sanction the money for the construction of the Suakin-Berber Railway. The House will remember what occurred on that occasion. Many of us, and myself among the number, always regarded the construction of the Suakin-Berber Railway as all moonshine from the first. But what happened? When the noble Lord asked for a Supplementary Estimate on a former occasion, he said that the very first thing Lord Wolseley wanted, after the fall of Khartoum, was the despatch of an expedition to Suakin. And on his responsibility, as a Minister of the Crown, he came forward and told us that the railway was absolutely essential to the safety of the Expedition and the Forces under Lord Wolseley. We now find that the railway is not to be made to Berber, as I certainly thought it never would be, and we shall require some explanation from the Government before this Vote for the Soudan is granted. I think it will probable be the case that while the House will grant whatever money is required, it may be necessary for us to accompany that grant of money with something like a Vote of Censure on the conduct of the Government for the way in which, as far as I can ascertain, they have been making ducks and drakes of the money of the British taxpayer. Our position is this. We desire to do nothing whatsoever to stand for a moment in the way of granting money to the Government for any military preparations that may be necessary to secure the safety of the Empire; but at the same time we are determined to exercise the full right of criticism, and if necessary of censure, with regard to the way, as far as we can gather, the money will be expended in the Soudan. Under the circumstances, I would throw out a suggestion of this nature—that the money should be divided as the hon. Member proposes—that the Vote for military preparations should be taken first; and that having been done, and the statement of the Government having been made in reference to the Soudan, that the debate on the money necessary for the Soudan should be adjourned for further consideration.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he hoped that unless the Government had a better case to put forward they might find it convenient to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member. He did not think he had ever heard a weaker and more confused case put before the House than that stated by the noble Lord. The Government had carefully abstained from committing themselves as to their policy in the Soudan; and until they announced their intention to abandon operations in that country it was manifest that the amount to be expended there should form the subject of a distinct Vote. The Prime Minister had deprecated a discussion of this question in the face of Europe with a great appearance of division in their counsels; the right hon. Gentleman was anxious that they should present to Europe an united front. He maintained that the Government were themselves provoking that division of opinion by resisting the Motion of the hon. Member. What was the inevitable result of the course which the Government were taking? When the Speaker was got out of the Chair the Committee would begin to discuss, first, the Soudan Vote, then the Afghan Vote, next the Soudan Vote again, and then the Afghan Vote again, and, lastly, the military preparations. Hon. Members on the Opposition side who were prepared to support the Government in any course they thought necessary for defending the honour of the country in Asia would be forced against their will to appear as critics of the Government when dealing with the Soudan. It was the action of the Government which compelled them to import into the controversy in Committee of Supply those questions on which there were acute differences of opinion between the two sides of the House. It was really a case of “tacking” on the part of the Government. The Government knew perfectly well that the Opposition were prepared to support them, and to do all they could to help them out of the muddle into which they had got in Afghanistan. They knew very well that if they were to divide this Vote, giving a Soudan half and an Afghan half, the Opposition would be unanimous as to the latter half, whereas on the Soudan portion there would be vehement Party controversy. It was to prevent the country seeing in the clearest manner how they had again “tacked” in regard to their policy of two months ago that the Government had included these two entirely different Votes in one. He hoped the Government would even now think fit to accede to the Motion of the hon. Member. He could assure the Prime Minister that if he would do so he would adopt the best course of avoiding that appearance of division in Committee of Supply in the face of Europe which he was so anxious to prevent.

MR. W. FOWLER said, that the noble Lord, in the course of his speech, had stated that there might be money, previously voted for stores in the Soudan, but not expended on actual service in the Soudan, which would be in hand to be expended for other purposes not mentioned—that was to say, for purposes mentioned in the Vote of £6,500,000. They were asked to vote in a lump money which was really going for two entirely different purposes. Now, although he did not believe that the Government were actuated by the motive attributed to them by hon. Gentlemen opposite, he objected to the idea of money being voted for one purpose and then being used for another. Under the French Empire the system of virements grew up by which enormous sums were voted in one way and applied in another, involving immense abuse. He hoped that in this country they would not enter upon that course.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish, Sir, to support the observations that have been made by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler). From his experience in such matters, I think the House would be justified in attaching very considerable weight to any remark falling from the hon. Member on a financial question. I must say, after what we have heard from the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War, it appears to me to be an extraordinary thing that the arrangements of the War Office should be in such a condition that it is utterly unable to take an accurate account of the stores and provisions of various kinds that may be re-shipped on the Coast of Egypt and transported elsewhere. I believe there is no person engaged in any great operation in this country who would not be prepared to insist that the charge connected with the employment of any number of men and any quantity of materials in any particular service in which he was concerned should be properly computed and ascertained. But I object to the proposal of the Government, because it appears to me to be an entirely new departure. We have had Supplementary Estimates and Votes of Credit to meet a national emergency before; but I do not remember that any single Vote of Credit has been taken to cover the expense of two entirely distinct objects. Can it be necessary that there shall be one Vote of Credit to deal with two totally different emergencies?—for that is the gist of the complaint which is now made. There is one point on which I would particularly insist, and that is that when a service was foreseen, when it became perfectly well known to Her Majesty's Government that troops would be required, that provisions would have to be furnished, and that a railway would have to be made, and when they asked for a Supplementary Estimate, as they did in the last financial year, for purposes in Egypt, they were bound to include in the ordinary Estimates of the year the expenditure which they contemplated and had decided upon. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for War told us that contracts had been entered into, that large payments had been made and liabilities incurred, and all actually without the vote of Parliament. Parliament has not sanctioned these estimates or these liabilities. They are included in this Vote of Credit. If the late Government had attempted to do anything of this kind, great financial authorities on the other side of the House would have told us at once that we were violating all the Rules of Parliament and defeating the proper control which Parliament is entitled to exercise over the national finances, and thereby over the enterprizes in which the Government may embark. I say that if a portion of this money has been paid, if these engagements have been entered into, Parliament ought to have been informed in the ordinary and regular way; they ought to have been included in the Estimates laid before the House in February last; and a proper opportunity would thus have been afforded for discussion. But I object strongly to our being asked in this way to make provision for two distinct services in one Vote of Credit, thus depriving the House of the power of adequately discussing those objects separately, and taking from hon. Members the power of protesting as effectually as they desire to do against one portion of the Vote while they wish to support another.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: My right hon. Friend at the head of the Government took pains the other day to explain the principle applicable to this Vote. The right hon. Gentleman opposite and the hon. Member for Cambridge say—"Here are two Votes for two absolutely separate objects, which have no connection or dependence the one upon the other." That is not an accurate statement of the fact. If it were, I should entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman. I accept altogether his financial doctrine on that subject. But the very basis of the statement of the Government which has already been made to the House is that these two matters are not separate, but that they have to a certain degree a dependence the one upon the other, and that the proposals that have been made with reference to the Soudan have relation to the position of the Empire in other parts of the world. Therefore, the whole foundation of the right hon. Gentleman's argument fails, because the two things are not distinct, but to a considerable degree dependent on each other. My right hon. Friend at the head the Government stated with reference to the Vote of Credit and with reference to the Soudan that certain operations might be undertaken or might not be undertaken in the Soudan according to the pressure of the necessities of the Empire elsewhere. Well, it is obvious to anybody who considers that proposition that there are future contingencies under which the releasing of the Forces in the Soudan—I think that was the phrase employed—for service elsewhere may be greater or may be less. The consequence is that the exigency of the demand for the Vote in respect to the Soudan may be more urgent and larger in one contingency than in another; and therefore it may be possible that the sum asked for the Soudan may not be under the circumstances entirely wanted to be expended in the Soudan. And here I am not alluding to the past expenditure, which alone the right hon. Gentleman referred to in his remarks, for stores and matters of that kind, but to the expenditure which may or may not take place in future. If that be so, and if the policy be such as I have described, is it not most reasonable that if by releasing Forces in the Soudan you do employ those Forces, or have them at your disposal elsewhere, you should have the means, if so it be, to appropriate such surplus as may remain after the Soudan Vote to purposes elsewhere? That is the extent and the only extent of the transfer of moneys now proposed; and the two objects are not independent of each other, but have relation one to the other. That entirely disposes of the objection of the hon. Member for Cambridge, and therefore the question of virements does not arise in this case. It is very desirable that we should at all events come to an early decision on this point. The hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) is not always charitable in his interpretation of the motives of the Government. I am very willing to deal with facts. The hon. Member always knows our motives, and it always seems to him that they are the worst possible. He thinks that our object in making this proposal is not that which we have avowed, and which is patent on the face of the Vote—namely, that if there be a surplus available from the Soudan it should be applied to the general purposes of the defence of the Empire, but that we desire to evade discussion and to escape the Vote of Censure which the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire, with his authority with his Party, has been good enough to announce in the present juncture of affairs. Surely, however, if we desire to evade discussion in regard to the Soudan, we could not do it. When we go into Committee on this Vote, it will be perfectly open to the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire to refuse all moneys for the Soudan as he seems to desire.

MR. CHAPLIN: The right hon. Gentleman has evidently misunderstood me. I said I would do nothing whatever that would stand in the way of the voting of money for special preparations necessary for the safety of the Empire, but that the two things were totally distinct, and it might become a duty to propose a Vote of Censure in regard to affairs in the Soudan.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I do not object to the hon. Member moving a Vote of Censure if he thinks it is a favourable moment. By all means let him do it to-morrow if he likes. But I was answering the hon. Member for Hertford, who alleged that we wish to evade discussion in respect to the Soudan. We could not evade it if we wished, which we do not; and there will be every facility for the hon. Member for Hertford to discuss the question of the Soudan on this Vote. He can say what he likes upon it, and he can refuse the money which is asked for.

MR. GORST said, he thought that it was a great pity that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had made the speech which he had just made, because it was a most unfortunate thing that Her Majesty's Government and the Members of Her Majesty's Government should endeavour to make it appear that there was in that House on that night any difference of opinion upon the main matter before them. He thought that it was a great pity that there had been any controversy at all upon it. It had been caused by the Home Secretary and the Members of the Government who, instead of confining that controversy to the technical question raised by the hon. Member for Queen's County, had endeavoured to give it a wider scope, and to make it appear as if the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire had desired to pass a Vote of Censure on Her Majesty's Government. The fault was entirely that of the Government. The Government wished to propose in the House two Votes for purposes really distinct. They knew that one would be granted by the House without any difference of opinion at all, and as to which it was most important that that unanimity of the House of Commons should go forth to Europe to-morrow. The Government knew that there was another Vote on which differences of opinion must arise, and they had deliberately mixed up these two, and it was they who were to blame if there was any want of unanimity shown. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had told them to wait till the matter was before Committee of Supply; but no one knew better than the right hon. Gentleman that it was impossible really to raise the question there except by moving that the Chairman leave the Chair. Did the right hon. Gentleman think that any Member on that side of the House would take the responsibility of moving the reduction of this Vote? They knew the sort of speech which would be made by the Prime Minister. It was only at this time that the proceedings of the Government could be called in question. Her Majesty's Government had chosen to fly in the face of Treasury Orders, of the Committee of Public Accounts, of the practice of the House of Commons, and of all precedents that had ever been set. He thought that with regard to this Motion the Government would have been in a better position without the speech of the Home Secretary. For his own part, he entirely disagreed with what had been said by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War as to the joining of the expenditure which had been incurred with that to be incurred. It appeared now from the speech of the Home Secretary that there was a reason for mixing them up, and it was a serious one, which the House could not help taking note of. It appeared from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that the Government were still halting between two opinions, and that they were in the future intending to incur expenditure with reference to the Soudan, as to which they had not made up their minds whether it was to be strictly Soudan expenditure or general expenditure. He had ventured to object two months ago to the expenditure of money and the slaughter of Arabs without any distinct policy being stated. His arguments had then been ridiculed by the Home Secretary and other Members of the Government; but since then the slaughter which he had predicted had taken place. The time had now at least come when there should be no doubt in the minds of Her Majesty's Government. If the Home Secretary was really speaking the mind of the Government in this matter, and if there was any doubt or hesitation in their minds as to how the Vote was to be spent, it was most essential that they should have a more certain voice than that of the Home Secretary before the House of Commons should be asked to do that which it was perfectly ready to do—namely to place in the hands of Her Majesty's Government ample funds for the purpose of making special preparations in the present condition of affairs.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in challenging somebody to propose a Vote of Censure, reminded him of one of Dickens's attorneys who had shown a touching anxiety to be kicked before witnesses. He could not but think that the provocative bearing of the Home Secretary was singularly inappropriate in what should have been a business discussion. It had been pointed out by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) that the money asked for in this Vote was for a double purpose. He failed entirely to understand the reasons for the extraordinary reticence on the part of the Government and their mysterious references to special purposes. It appeared to him that this was the same policy as that of the fabled ostrich; it was an elaborate pretence of hiding what could not be hidden. The conduct of the Government gave too much reason for the suspicion that they were trying to evade inquiry into their Soudan policy, and it would provoke the proposal of a Motion in Committee which would plainly and distinctly set their Soudan expenditure upon one side for the special examination of the House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to say a few words especially to the Prime Minister. It appears to me that the sense of the House in this matter is all very much in one way. I have heard a good many speeches in favour of the separation of the Vote, and the absolute silence of hon. Members behind the Treasury Bench shows that they have also felt the force of the observations which have been made. For my own part, I feel greatly the force of these observations; and though I do not go so far as my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) seems to have done in implying that there is an intention on their part of tacking, yet the way in which the Vote is proposed is a way in which the stronger case will carry the weaker. I am unwilling to be put in a position in which we are not to get a full discussion of that part of the Vote which relates to the Soudan. There is a practical unanimity with regard to the special preparations Vote. We have not the same unanimity with regard to the conduct and views of Her Majesty's Government with reference to the Soudan; and before that Vote is passed it is probable that the House will desire to have some more definite and clear assurances of the policy of the Government with regard to the Soudan. We have been waiting until a proper occasion shall arise—which I suppose is to-night—to learn what the policy of the Government is with regard to the Soudan. Now we are placed in this difficulty, that we can only hear the statement of the Prime Minister immediately before we are asked to vote money. I wish, under the circumstances, to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will think it possible to meet the objections which have been raised by making a division of the Vote itself, and proposing first that part relating to special preparations and afterwards that relating to the Soudan?

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman will perhaps allow me to correct him in the supposition that I was about to make a lengthened statement on this subject while the Speaker is in the Chair. My intention has all along been to make that statement in Committee. The right hon. Gentleman appears to think that he will suffer some great disadvantage from a combination of these two services in one Vote; and he seems to think that it is in my power to relieve him from that dilemma by the course he suggested, which he apparently thought would not necessarily involve any fundamental difficulty in the plans of the Government. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that he is in error in both those suppositions. It is competent for any hon. Member to move a reduction of the Vote of £4,500,000 asked for the Soudan, and that will distinctly raise a question on which any objections that may be felt to the conduct of the Government in regard to the Soudan can without prejudice be stated. I will reply to the right hon. Gentleman's appeal by appealing to him to take the opportunity which such a course will present, and so relieve himself of the difficulty which Her Majesty's Government cannot relieve him from without striking at the basis of the policy which we have announced. That policy is to hold the Forces in the Soudan, while they remain in the Soudan, available for service elsewhere. In that policy we ask the House to uphold us. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) must know that the business of concentration in the Soudan is a serious military operation; that the withdrawal of a considerable Force from the heart of the country is a costly and even to some extent a protracted business; and it is totally impossible for the Government to draw that line and divide the Vote. I shall state frankly to the Committee, when that stage is reached, that Her Majesty's Ministers are asking the House to a certain extent to vote money with regard to which, in certain contingencies, the Government will have a choice. I cannot tell to what extent it may be necessary for us to apply the Vote in regard to the Soudan to the purpose of special preparation. It may or it may not be that £2,000,000 out of the £4,000,000 will be spent in the Soudan and the rest elsewhere. If we had not the liberty of applying the £4,500,000 as we required the only course for us would be to continue to ask £4,500,000 for the Soudan, because the money might possibly be spent there, and £12,000,000 for special preparations, because the money may be wanted for that purpose. The result would be that we should have to ask Parliament to spend £2,000,000 more. I do not, however, think it desirable to ask Parliament to authorize the Government to spend £2,000,000 more than they are likely to want. It would not have been right to make such a demand and to require the Chancellor of the Exchequer to add these £2,000,000 to the sum which on Thursday will be asked for in Committee of Ways and Means. That being so, I think I have shown that while on the other side the objection to the course we propose is of a technical character, on ours it is a matter of substance, inasmuch as it enables us to apply money granted for the purpose of the Soudan to other objects. As to the Soudan Enterprize, we have bound ourselves not to prosecute offensive operations or to undertake an early advance on Khartoum; and our Forces remain there only until we can safely bring them home or make them available for employment elsewhere. I cannot but think that our proposal is a reasonable one, and that the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends will have ample opportunity of raising the Soudan question, by moving the diminution of the Vote, and making that Motion the means of censuring Her Majesty's Government for its conduct with regard to the Soudan.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 229; Noes 186: Majority 43.—(Div. List, No. 129.)

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—VOTE OF CREDIT.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £11,000,000, Naval and Military Operations, 1885-6 (Vote of Credit).

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir Arthur Otway, I will, Sir, endeavour to explain, as clearly as I can, the nature and grounds of the Vote which we now submit, trusting to the indulgence of the Committee, because I am conscious—I have, I am sorry to say, for months past, been conscious—of an habitual hoarseness, which may make the function of listening very disagreeable and irksome.

I trust that the Committee, at least in some degree, now understand that, if there is anything unusual in the nature and character of this Vote, it arises, not out of a caprice of ours, still less out of an unmanly intention of avoiding controversial debate adverse to ourselves, but out of the nature of the case. We have before us a case, Sir, for which in a material point there is no precedent known to me. We propose a Vote of Credit amounting to £11,000,000; £6,500,000 being likely to be spent in what we term "special preparations," and being secured from being spent for any other purposes; £4,500,000 being likely to be spent in and in connection with the Soudan, but being in a degree that I cannot at present define capable of being spent for another purpose—that is to say, the same purpose as our special preparations. And I ask leave of the Committee to repeat my words, that, adhering to the policy we have announced to the House of holding the Soudan Forces available for service elsewhere, I believe that we have had absolutely no option except either to ask the House to vote money which may be wanted in the Soudan, with the power to use it for the purpose of the special preparations, or else to vote twice over a very large and uncertain sum of money, to which course, I believe, strong and just and even insurmountable objection might be taken. Moreover I will point out that, until it is shown that there is some other course open to us, the objection with regard to the special nature of this Vote entirely falls to the ground and is worthless.

Sir, the peculiarity in the case to which I refer is, of course, this: I know of no instance, either in or beyond my own recollection, since the financial system of this House was well developed—and, indeed, it hardly had come to be thoroughly developed when I first became a Member of this House—in which it has been the duty of the Government to propose to the House at one and the same time two very large sums of money for military purposes, one of which, the second, may run into the first, although the first is not to run into the second. We ask it upon this ground: It is essentially bound up with the policy of holding the large Force now in the Soudan available for transfer and for service elsewhere. That is the justification of the course which I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) should be taken upon no ground except that of strong necessity, and of making the best choice we can between rival inconveniences. I certainly, for one, would never have dreamed of taking it on any other ground, and I believe that I am speaking for my Colleagues when I so speak.

It is thought by some that we take this course because it evades a Vote of Censure upon us on account of our policy in the Soudan. It appears to be assumed that it would have been competent to Members of the Committee to say, first of all, that they would give us the money for special preparations, and, secondly, give us the money for the Soudan Vote, but that in giving the money for the Soudan Vote they would combine with it a Vote of Censure upon the Government. Sir, I believe that it would not have been competent, either in point of form or in point of substance, for the Committee to have taken that course. I do not think that it is upon record that an attempt has ever been made to take such a course. This the Committee may do with perfect consistency—they may give the money for the Soudan, founding that Vote on the necessity which has been created, and they may reserve to themselves the discretion of censuring the Government, notwithstanding that they have voted the money. Surely that doctrine is sound, because, otherwise, why vote the money for the special preparations until you are satisfied that in everything which touches them we deserve your approval? I do not suppose that you are quite prepared to affirm, as one Gentleman has declared to-night, that we and not Russia are responsible for the difficulty in which we stand. [An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!] Another hon. Gentleman cheers, so that there are two persons, at any rate, who will be in the predicament of either refusing money for special preparations or else of being content to reserve to themselves for some future occasion the power which they undoubtedly possess, and may very legitimately exercise, of censuring us for the wrong principles upon which we have proceeded, or for the want of judgment with which we have endeavoured to apply the right principles.

There appears to be a mistaken idea pervading the minds of young Members of this House, and, indeed, of some old ones, that the granting of a Vote of Credit which it is not intended to refuse is an usual occasion for bringing the Government to trial upon matters to which the Vote relates.
